It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

PREFACE

TO THE

EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.

THAT ST. PAUL was the author of this Epistle, and that it possesses every evidence of authenticity that any work of the kind can possess; or that even the most fastidious scepticism can require; have been most amply proved by Dr. W. Paley, Archdeacon of Carlisle, in his work entitled "Horæ Paulinæ;" or, the Truth of the Scripture History of St. Paul evinced, by a comparison of the Epistles which bear his name, with the Acts of the Apostles, and with one another.⁴

Of this Apostle I have spoken at large in the notes on the preceding book; and especially in the observations at the close of the ninth chapter; to which I beg leave to refer the reader. It will be sufficient to state here, that Saul, (afterwards called Paul), was born in Tarsus, a city of Cilicia, of Jewish parents, who possessed the right of Roman citizens: (see the note on Acts xxii. 28.) that when young, he was sent to Jerusalem for the purpose of receiving a Jewish education: that he was there put under the tuition of the famous Rabbi Gamaliel, and was incorporated with the sect of the Pharisees, of whose system he imbibed all the pride, self-confidence, and intolerance, and distinguished himself as one of the most inveterate enemies of the Christian cause; but, being converted by a most singular interposition of Divine Providence and grace, he became one of the most zealous promoters and successful defenders of the cause, which he had before so inveterately persecuted.

Though this Epistle is directed to the Romans, yet we are not to suppose that Romans, in the proper sense of the word, are meant; but rather those who dwell at Rome, and composed the Christian church in that city: that there were among these, Romans, properly such, that is, heathens who had been converted to the Christian faith, there can be no doubt: but the principal part of the church in that city, seems to have been formed from Jews, sojourners at Rome; and from such as were proselytes to the Jewish religion.

When, or by whom the Gospel was first preached at Rome, cannot be ascertained. Those who assert that St. Peter was its founder, can produce no solid reason for the support of their opinion. Had this Apostle first preached the Gospel in that city, it is not likely that such an event would have been unnoticed in the Acts of the Apostles; where the labours of St. Peter are particularly detailed with those of St. Paul, which indeed form the chief subject of this book. Nor is it likely that the author of this Epistle should have made no reference to this circumstance, had it been true. Those who say that this church was founded by these two Apostles conjointly, have still less reason on their side; for it is evident from chap. i. 8, &c. that St. Paul had never been at Rome, previously to his writing this Epistle. It is most likely that no apostle was employed in this important work; and that the Gospel was first preached there by some of those persons who were converted at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost; for, we find from Acts ii. 10. that there were then at Jerusalem, Strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes; and these, on their return, would naturally declare the wonders they had witnessed; and proclaim that truth by which they themselves had received salvation. Of Rome itself, then the metropolis of the world, a particular account has been given in the note on Acts, chap. xviii. 16. to which the reader is requested to refer.

The occasion of writing this Epistle, may be easily collected from the Epistle itself. It appears that St. Paul had been made acquainted with all the circumstances of the Christians at Rome, by means of Aquila and Priscilla, (see chap. xvi. 3.) and by other Jews who had been expelled from Rome, by the decree of Claudius, (mentioned Acts xviii. 2.) and finding that it was composed partly of heathens, converted to Christianity; and partly of Jews, who had, with many remaining prejudices, believed in Jesus as the true Messiah; and that many contentions arose from the claims of the Gentile converts to equal privileges with the Jews; and, from the absolute refusal of the Jews to admit these claims, unless the Gentile converts became circumcised, he wrote this Epistle to adjust and settle these differences.

PREFACE TO THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.

Dr. Paley, with his usual perspicuity, has shown that the principal object of the argumentative part of the Epistle, is, "To place the Gentile convert upon a parity of situation with the Jewish, in respect of his religious condition and his rank in the Divine favour." The Epistle supports this point by a variety of arguments; such as,—1st. That no man, of either description, was justified by the works of the law—for this plain reason, that no man had performed them;—2d. That it became therefore necessary to appoint another medium, or condition of justification, in which new medium the Jewish peculiarity was merged and lost;—3d. That Abraham's own justification was antecedent to the law, and independent of it;—4th. That the Jewish converts were to consider the law as now dead, and themselves as married to another;—5th. That what the law in truth could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God had done by sending his Son;—6th. That God had rejected the unbelieving Jews, and had substituted in their place, a society of believers in Christ; collected indifferently from Jews and Gentiles.—Therefore, in an Epistle directed to Roman believers, the point to be endeavoured after by St. Paul, was to reconcile the Jewish converts to the opinion that the Gentiles were admitted by God to a parity of religious situation with themselves; and that, without their being obliged to keep the law of Moses. In this Epistle, though directed to the Roman church in general, it is in truth, a Jew writing to Jews. Accordingly, as often as his argument leads him to say any thing derogatory from the Jewish institution, he constantly follows it by a softening clause. Having, chap. ii. 28, 29, pronounced "that he is not a Jew who is one outwardly; nor that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh," he adds immediately, "What advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there in circumcision? Much every way." Having, in the third chap. ver. 28, brought his argument to this formal conclusion, "that a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law," he presently subjoins, ver. 31. "Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid! Yea, we establish the law." In the seventh chap. when in ver. 6, he had advanced the bold assertion, "that now we are delivered from the law, that being dead wherein we were held;" in the next verse he comes in with this healing question, "What shall we say then? Is the law sin? God forbid! Nay, I had not known sin but by the law." Having in the following words more than insinuated the inefficacy of the Jewish law, chap. vii. 3. "for what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemning sin in the flesh;" after a digression indeed, but that sort of digression, which he could never resist, a rapturous contemplation of his Christian hope, and which occupies the latter part of this chapter; we find him in the next, as if sensible that he had said something which would give offence, returning to his Jewish brethren in terms of the warmest affection and respect; "I say the truth in Christ Jesus, I lie not: my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost, that I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart; for I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh, who are Israelites, to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; whose are the fathers; and of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came." When in the 31st and 32d verses of the ninth chapter, he represented to the Jews the error of even the best of their nation, by telling them that "Israel, which followed after the law of righteousness, had not attained to the law of righteousness, because they sought it not by faith, but as it were by the works of the law, for they stumbled at that stumbling-stone;" he takes care to annex to this declaration, these conciliating expressions; "Brethren, my heart's desire, and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved; for I bear them record, that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge." Lastly, having, chap. x. 20, 21, by the application of a passage in Isaiah, insinuated the most ungrateful of all propositions to a Jewish ear, the rejection of the Jewish nation as God's peculiar people; he hastens, as it were, to qualify the intelligence of their fall by this interesting exposition: "I say then, hath God cast away his people, (i. e. wholly and entirely?) God forbid! for I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin. God hath not cast away his people which he foreknew;" and follows this thought throughout the whole of the eleventh chapter, in a series of reflections calculated to soothe the Jewish converts, as well as to procure from their Gentile brethren respect to the Jewish institution. Dr. Paley, drawing an argument from this manner of writing in behalf of the genuineness of this Epistle, adds, "Now, all this is perfectly natural. In a real St. Paul, writing to real converts, it is, what anxiety to bring them over to his persuasion would naturally produce; but there is an earnestness and a personality, if I so call it, in the manner, which a cold forgery, I apprehend, would neither have conceived nor supported." Horæ Paulinæ, p. 49, &c.

From a proper consideration of the design of the Apostle in writing this Epistle, and from the nature and circumstances of the persons to whom it was directed; much light may be derived for a proper understanding of the Epistle itself. When the reader considers that the church of Rome was composed of heathens and Jews; that the latter were taught to consider themselves the only people on earth, to whom the Divine favour extended; that these alone had a right to all the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom: that the giving them the law and the prophets, which had not been given to any other people, was the fullest proof that these privileges did not extend to the nations of the earth: and, that though it was possible for the Gentiles to be saved, yet it must be in consequence of their becoming circumcised, and taking on them the yoke of the law.—When, on the other hand, the reader considers the Roman Gentiles, who formed the other part of the church at Rome, as educated in the most perfect contempt of Judaism, and of the Jews, who were deemed to be haters of all mankind, and degraded with the silliest superstitions; and now evidently rejected and abandoned by that God in whom they professed to trust; it is no wonder if, from these causes, many contentions and scandals arose; especially at a time when the spirit of

Christianity was but little understood; and among a people too who do not appear to have had any apostolic authority established among them, to compose feuds, and settle religious differences.

That the Apostle had these things particularly in his eye, is evident from the Epistle itself. His first object is to confound the pride both of the Jews and the Gentiles; and this he does by showing the former that they had broken their own law, and consequently forfeited all the privileges which the obedient had a right to expect:—he shows the latter, that however they might boast of eminent men, who had been an honour to their country; nevertheless, the Gentiles, as a people, were degraded by the basest of crimes, and the lowest idolatry:—that, in a word, the Gentiles had as little cause to boast in their philosophers, as the Jews had to boast in the faith and piety of their ancestors; for all had sinned, and come short of the glory of God. This subject is particularly handled in the five first chapters; and often referred to in other places.

Concerning the time in which this Epistle was written, there is not much difference of opinion: it is most likely that it was written about A. D. 58, when Paul was at Corinth, see chap. xvi. 23. conferred with 1 Cor. i. 14. and Rom. xvi. 1. conferred with 2 Tim. iv. 20. It appears from chap. xvi. 22. that Paul did not write this Epistle with his own hand, but used a person called Tertius, as his amanuensis; and that it was sent by the hands of Phœbe, a deaconess, (ὑπὸς διακόνου), of the church at Cenchrea, which was the eastern Port, on the Isthmus of Corinth.

From internal evidence, Dr. Paley has demonstrated the authenticity of this Epistle, and its existence in the ancient Antehieronymian versions, and the Syriac, as well as its being mentioned by the Apostolic Fathers, Barnabas, chap. xii. 13. Clemens Romanus, Ep. i. c. i. 30, 32, 35, 46. Ignatius, Epist. ad Ephes. 20. ad Smyrn. 1. ad Trall. 8. and Polycarp, 3 and 6. and by all succeeding writers, put it beyond all dispute.

Of the fourteen Epistles attributed to St. Paul, (thirteen only of which bear his name,) this has been reckoned the first in importance, though certainly not in order of time; for there is every reason to believe that both the Epistles to the Thessalonians, that to the Galatians, those to the Corinthians, the first to Timothy, and that to Titus, were all written before the Epistle to the Romans. See the dates of the books of the New Testament, at the end of the introduction to the Gospels, &c.

In the arrangement of the Epistles, nothing seems to have been consulted besides the length of the Epistle, the character of the writer, and the importance of the place to which it was sent. Rome, being the mistress of the world, the Epistle to that city was placed first. Those to the Corinthians, because of the great importance of their city, next. Galatia, Ephesus, Philippi, Colosse, and Thessalonica, follow in graduated order. Timothy, Titus, and Philemon, succeed in the same way: and the Epistle to the Hebrews, because the author of it was long in dispute, was placed at the end of the Epistles of Paul, as being probably written by him. James, as Bp. of Jerusalem, precedes Peter; Peter precedes John, as the supposed chief of the apostles; and John, the beloved disciple, Jude. The book of the Revelation, as being long disputed in the Christian church, was thrown to the conclusion of the New Testament Scriptures. The surats, or chapters of the Koran, were disposed in the same sort of order; the longest being put first, and all the short ones thrown at the end, without any regard to the times in which it was pretended they were revealed.

There have been some doubts concerning the language in which this Epistle was written. John Adria Bollen, endeavoured to prove that St. Paul wrote it in Syriac, and that it was translated into Greek by Tertius; but this supposition has been amply refuted by Griesbach. Others think that it must have been written originally in Latin, the language of the people to whom it was addressed; “for although the Greek tongue was well known in Rome, yet it was the language of the great and the learned; and it is more natural to suppose that the Apostle would write in the language of the common people, as those were more likely to be his chief readers, than in that of the great and the learned.” This argument is more specious than solid. 1. It is certain that at this time, the Greek language was very generally cultivated in Rome, as it was in most parts of the Roman empire. Cicero pro Arch. 10. says, Græca leguntur in omnibus fere gentibus: Latina, nisi finibus, exiguis sane continentur. “The Greek writings are read in almost all nations: those of the Latin, within their own narrow limits.” Tacitus, Orator. 29. observes, Nunc natus infans delegat Græcæ altius auxilio. “Now the new-born child is put under the care of some Greek maid,” and this undoubtedly for the purpose of its learning to speak the Greek tongue. And Juvenal, Sat. vi. ver. 184. ridicules this affectation of his countrymen, which in his time appears to have been carried to a most extravagant excess.

Formosam, nisi quæ de Tusca Græcula facta est?
De Sulmonensi mera Cecropis? OMNIA GRÆCÆ, Cum sit turpe magis nostris nescire Latine.
Hæc sermone pavent, hæc Iram, Gaudia, Curas, Hæc cuncta effundunt animi secreta. Quid ultra?—*

“For what so nauseous and affected too,
As those that think they due perfection want
Who have not learned to lisp the Grecian cant?
In Greece their whole accomplishments they seek:
Their fashion, breeding, language, must be Greek.”

The Original and Nature of the Jewish Constitution.

But raw in all that does to Rome belong,
They scorn to cultivate their mother-tongue.
In Greek they flatter, all their fears they speak, Tell all their secrets, nay, they scold in Greek."

DRYDEN.

From these testimonies it is evident, that the Greek was a common language in Rome in the days of the Apostle; and that, in writing in this language, which he probably understood better than he did Latin, he consulted the taste and propensity of the Romans; as well as the probability of his Epistle being more extensively read, in consequence of its being written in Greek.

2. But were these arguments wanting, there are others of great weight, that evince the propriety of choosing this language in preference to any other. The Sacred Writings of the Old Testament were, at that time, confined to two languages, the Hebrew and the Greek. The former was not known out of the confines of Palestine: the latter over the whole Roman empire; and the Latin tongue appears to have been as much confined to Italy as the Hebrew was to Judea. The Epistle, therefore, being designed by the Spirit of God, to be of general use to the Christian churches, not only in Italy, but through Greece and all Asia Minor, where the Greek language was spoken and understood; it was requisite that the instructions to be conveyed by it should be put in a language the most generally known; and a language too which was then in high, and in daily increasing credit.

3. As the Jews were the principal objects of this Epistle, and they must be convinced of the truth of Christianity, from the evidence of their own Scriptures; and as the Greek version of the Septuagint was then their universal text-book, in all their dispersions; it was absolutely requisite that the Epistle should be written in a tongue with which they were best acquainted; and in which their acknowledged Scriptures were contained. These arguments seem conclusive for a Greek and not a Latin original of this Epistle.

From the manner in which this Epistle has been interpreted and applied, various most discordant and conflicting opinions have originated. Many commentators, forgetting the scope and design of it, have applied that to men in general, which most obviously belongs to the Jews, as distinguished from the Gentiles, and to them only. From this one mistake, the principal controversies that have agitated and divided the church of Christ, concerning the doctrines of unconditional reprobation and election, have arisen. Men, eminent for their talents, learning, and piety, have interpreted and applied the whole on this mistaken ground. They have been opposed by others, not at all their inferiors either in religion or learning, who, not attending properly to the scope of the Apostle, have rather argued from the perfections of the Divine Nature, and the general concurrent sense of Scripture, and thus proved that such doctrines cannot comport with those perfections, nor with the analogy of faith; and that the Apostle is to be interpreted according to these, and not according to the apparent grammatical import of the phraseology which he employs. On both sides the disputes have run high; the cause of truth has gained little, and Christian charity and candour have been nearly lost. Dispassionate men, on seeing this, have been obliged to exclaim—

Can such fierce zeal in heavenly bosoms dwell?

To compose these differences, and do justice to the Apostle, and set an important portion of the word of God in its true and genuine light; Dr. John Taylor, of Norwich, a divine who yielded to few in command of temper, benevolent feeling, and deep acquaintance with the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures, undertook the elucidation of this much controverted Epistle. The result of his labours was a paraphrase and notes on the whole book, to which is prefixed, "A KEY to the Apostolic Writings; or an Essay to explain the Gospel Scheme, and the principal words and phrases the Apostles have used in describing it." 4to. 1769. fourth edition. This KEY, in the main, is a most invaluable work; and has done great justice to the subject. Christians, whether advocates, for general or particular redemption, might have derived great service from this work, in explaining the Epistle to the Romans: but the author's creed, who was an Arian, (for he certainly cannot be ranked with modern Unitarians,) has prevented me from consulting his book.

To bring the subject of this Epistle before the reader, into the fairest and most luminous point of view, in my power, I think it right to make a large extract from this Key, steering as clear as possible of those points in which my own creed is certainly at variance with that of my author; especially in the articles of Original Sin, the Atonement, and Deity of Christ: but as these points are seldom directly touched in this introductory Key, the reader need be under no apprehension that he shall meet with any thing in hostility to the orthodoxy of his own creed. And it is thus far only I intend to quote or adopt any part of this Key.

A KEY TO THE APOSTOLIC WRITINGS: OR, AN ESSAY TO EXPLAIN THE GOSPEL SCHEME, AND THE PRINCIPAL WORDS AND PHRASES WHICH THE APOSTLES HAVE USED IN DESCRIBING IT.

§ 1. On the Original and Nature of the Jewish Constitution of Religion.

1. God, the Father of the universe, who has exercised his boundless wisdom, power, and goodness, in producing various beings of different capacities; who created the earth, and appointed divers climates, soils, and situations in it, hath, from the beginning of the world, introduced several schemes and dispensations, for promoting the virtue and happiness of his rational creatures; for curing their corruption, and preserving among them the knowledge and worship of himself, the true God, the possessor of all being, and the fountain of all good.

The Original and Nature of the Jewish Constitution.

2. In pursuance of this grand and gracious design, when about four hundred years after the flood, the generality of mankind were fallen into idolatry, (a vice, which in those times, made its first appearance in the world,) and served other Gods, thereby renouncing allegiance to the one God, the Maker and Governor of heaven and earth; He, to counteract this new and prevailing corruption, was pleased in his infinite wisdom, to select one family of the earth, to be a repository of true knowledge, and the pattern of obedience, and reward among the nations. That, as mankind were propagated, and idolatry took its rise, and was dispersed from one part of the world into various countries; so also, the knowledge, worship, and obedience of the true God, might be propagated and spread from nearly the same quarter; or, however, from those parts which then were most famous and distinguished. To this family he particularly revealed himself, visited them with several public and remarkable dispensations of providence; and at last formed them into a nation, under his special protection: and governed them by laws delivered from himself; placing them in the open view of the world, first in Egypt, and afterward in the land of Canaan.

3. The head, or root of this family, was Abraham, the son of Terah, who lived in Ur of the Chaldees, beyond the Euphrates; his family was infected with the common contagion of idolatry, as appears from Joshua xxiv. 2, 3. "And Joshua said unto all the people, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood, (or river Euphrates;) in old time; even Terah the father of Abraham, and the father of Nachor: and they served other gods. And I took your father Abraham from the other side of the flood," &c. And the apostle Paul intimates as much, Rom. iv. 3, 4, 5. "For what saith the Scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness. Now to him that worketh, is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt. But to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness." Abraham is the person he is discoursing about; and he plainly hints, though he did not care to speak out, that even Abraham was chargeable with not paying due reverence and worship to God: as the word $\lambda\epsilon\iota\sigma\tau\eta\varsigma$, which we render ungodly, properly imports.

4. But, though Abraham had been an idolater; God was pleased, in his infinite wisdom and goodness, to single him out to be the head, or root of that family or nation, which he intended to separate to himself from the rest of mankind, for the fore-mentioned purposes. Accordingly, he appeared to him in his native country, and ordered him to leave it, and his idolatrous kindred; and to remove into a distant land, to which he would direct and conduct him; declaring, at the same time, his covenant, or grant of mercy to him, in these words, Gen. xii. 1, 2, 3. "I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing. And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee; and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed." So certainly did God make himself known to Abraham, that he was satisfied this was a revelation from the one true God; and that it was his duty to pay an implicit obedience to it. Accordingly, upon the foot of this faith, he went out, though he did not know whither he was to go.—The same covenant, or promise of blessings God afterward, at sundry times, repeated to him; particularly when it is said, Gen. xv. 5. "And the Lord brought him forth abroad, and said, look now towards heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them: and he said unto him, so shall thy seed be." Here again, "he believed in the Lord, and he counted it to him for righteousness." Also, Gen. xvii. 1—8. he repeats and established the same covenant "for an everlasting covenant to be a God unto him and his seed after him;" promising them the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and appointing circumcision as a perpetual token of the certainty and perpetuity of this covenant. Thus Abraham was taken into God's covenant, and became entitled to the blessings it conveyed; not because he was not chargeable before God with impiety, irreligion, and idolatry; but because God, on his part, freely forgave his prior transgressions; and because Abraham, on his part, believed in the power and goodness of God; without which belief or persuasion, that God was both true and able to perform what he had promised, he could have paid no regard to the Divine manifestations; and consequently must have been rejected as a person altogether improper to be the head of that family which God intended to set apart to himself.

5. And as Abraham, so likewise his seed, or posterity, were at the same time, and before they had a being, taken into God's covenant, and entitled to the blessings of it. (Gen. xvii. 7. I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee, &c.) Not all his posterity, but only those whom God intended in the promise; namely, first the nation of the Jews, who hereby became particularly related to God, and invested with sundry invaluable privileges; and after them the believing Gentiles, who were reckoned the children of Abraham, as they should believe in God as Abraham did.

6. For about two hundred and fifteen years, from the time God ordered Abraham to leave his native country, he and his son Isaac, and grandson Jacob, sojourned in the land of Canaan, under the special protection of Heaven, till infinite wisdom thought fit to send the family into Egypt, the then head-quarters of idolatry; with a design they should there increase into a nation; and there, notwithstanding the cruel oppression they long groaned under, they multiplied to a surprising number. At length God delivered them from the servitude of Egypt, by the most dreadful displays of his Almighty power; whereby he demonstrated himself to be the one true God, in a signal and complete triumph over idols, even in their metropolis; and in a country of fame and emipence among all the nations round about. Thus freed from the vilest bondage, God formed them into a kingdom, of which he himself was king; gave them a revelation of his nature and will; instituted sundry ordinances of worship, taught them the way of truth and life; set before them various motives to duty, promising singular blessings to their obedience and fidelity, and threatening disobedience and apostasy, or revolt from his government, with very heavy judgments; especially that of being expelled from the land of Canaan, and "scattered among all people, from one end of the earth unto the other," in a wretched persecuted state, Deut. xxviii. 63—68. Lev. xxvi. 3, 4, &c. Having settled their constitution, he led them through the wilderness, where he disciplined them for forty years together; made all opposition fall before them; and at last, brought them to the Promised Land.

7. Here I may observe, that God did not choose the Israelites out of any partial regard to that nation, nor because they were better than other people, (Deut. ix. 4, 5.) and would always observe his laws. It is plain he knew the contrary. (Deut. xxxi. 29. xxxii. 5, 6, 15.) It was indeed with great propriety that, among other advantages, he gave them also that of being descended from progenitors illustrious for piety and virtue; and that he grounded the extraordinary favours they enjoyed, upon Abraham's faith and obedience, Gen. xxii. 16, 17, 18. But it was not out of regard to the moral character of the Jewish nation that God chose them; any other nation would have served as well on that account; but as he thought fit to select one nation of the world, he selected them out of respect to the piety and virtue of their ancestors. Exod. iii. 15. vi. 3, 4, 5. Deut. iv. 37.

8. It should be also carefully observed, that God selected the Israelitish nation, and manifested himself to them by various displays of his power and goodness: not principally for their own sakes, to make them a happy and flourishing people; but to be subservient to his own high and great designs with regard to all mankind. And we shall entertain a very wrong, low, and narrow idea of this select nation, and of the dispensations of God towards it, if we do not consider it as a beacon, or a light set upon a hill, as raised up to be a public voucher of the being and providence of God, and of the truth of the revelation delivered to them in all ages, and in all parts of the world; and consequently, that the Divine scheme, in relation to the Jewish polity, had reference to other people, and even to us at this day, as well as to the Jews themselves. The situation of this nation, lying upon the borders of Asia, Europe, and Africa, was very convenient for such a general purpose.

9. It is further observable, that this scheme was wisely calculated to answer great ends under all events. If this nation continued obedient, their visible prosperity under the guardianship of an extraordinary Providence; would be a very proper and extensive instruction to the nations of the earth. And no doubt so; for as they were obedient, and favoured with the signal interpositions of the Divine power; their case was very useful to their neighbours. On the other hand, if they were disobedient, then their calamities, and especially their dispersions, would nearly answer the same purpose, by spreading the knowledge of the true God and of revelation, in the countries where before they were not known. And so wisely was this scheme laid at first with regard to the laws of the nation, both civil and religious; and so carefully has it all along been conducted by the Divine providence; that it still holds good, even at this day, full 3600 years from the time when it first took place; and is still of public use in confirming the truth of revelation. I mean, not only as the Christian profession, spread over a great part of the world, has grown out of this scheme; but as the Jews themselves, in virtue thereof, after a dispersion of about 1700 years, over all the face of the earth, every where in a state of ignominy and contempt, have, notwithstanding, subsisted in great numbers, distinct and separate from all other nations. This seems to me a standing miracle; nor can I assign it to any other cause, but the will and the extraordinary interposal of Heaven; when I consider that, of all the famous nations of the world, who might have been distinguished from others with great advantage, and the most illustrious marks of honour and renown, as the Assyrians, Persians, Macedonians, Romans, who all, in their turns, held the empire of the world, and were, with great ambition, the lords of mankind; yet these, even in their own countries, the seat of their ancient glory, are quite dissolved; and sunk into the body of mankind; nor is there a person upon earth can boast he is descended from those renowned and imperial ancestors. Whereas a small nation, generally despised, and which was, both by Pagans and pretended Christians, for many ages, harassed, persecuted, butchered, and distressed, as the most detestable of all people upon the face of the earth; (according to the prophecy of Moses, Deut. xxviii. 63, &c. see Dr. Patrick's commentary upon that place,) and which, therefore, one would imagine, every soul that belonged to it should have gladly disowned; and have been willing the odious name should be entirely extinguished: yet, I say, this hated nation has continued in a body quite distinct and separate from all other people, even in a state of dispersion and grievous persecution, for about 1700 years; agreeable to the prediction, Isa. xli. 28. "I will make a full end of all the nations whither I have driven thee; but I will not make a full end of thee." This demonstrates that the wisdom which so formed them into a peculiar body, and the providence which has so preserved them; that they have almost, ever since the deluge, subsisted in a state divided from the rest of mankind, and are still likely to do so, is not human but divine. For, no human wisdom nor power could form, or however could execute, such a vast extensive design. Thus the very being of the Jews, in their present circumstances, is a standing public proof of the truth of revelation.

II. The peculiar Honours and Privileges of the Jewish Nation, while they were the peculiar people of God: and the Terms signifying those Honours, explained.

10. The nature and dignity of the foregoing scheme, and the state and privileges of the Jewish nation, will be better understood, if we carefully observe the particular phrases by which their relation to God, and his favour to them, are expressed in Scripture.

11. As God, in his infinite wisdom and goodness, was pleased to prefer them before any other nation, and to single them out for the purposes of revelation, and preserving the knowledge, worship, and obedience of the true God; God is said to choose them, and they are represented as his chosen or elect people: Deut. iv. 37. vii. 6. x. 15. "The Lord had a delight in thy fathers—and he chose their seed after them, even you, above all people." 1 Kings iii. 8. "Thy servant is in the midst of thy people which thou hast chosen, a great people that cannot be numbered." 1 Chron. xvi. 13. "O ye seed of Israel his servant, ye children of Jacob his chosen ones." Psal. cv. 6. xxxiii. 12. "Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord; and the people whom he hath chosen for his own inheritance;" cv. 43. cvi. 5. "That I may see the good of thy chosen or elect, that I may rejoice in the goodness of thy nation;" cxxxv. 4. Isai. xli. 8, 9. xliii. 20. xlv. 1, 2. xlv. 4. "For Jacob my servant's sake, and Israel mine elect, I have even called thee by thy name." Ezek. xx. 5. "Thus saith the Lord, In the day when I chose Israel, and lifted my hand unto the seed of the house of Jacob, and made myself known unto them in the land of Egypt." Hence, reinstating them in their former privileges is expressed by choosing them again. Isai. xiv. 1, "For the Lord will have mercy on Jacob, and will yet choose Israel, and set them in their own land," Zech. l. 17. ii. 12.

12. The first step he took in execution of his purpose of election, was to rescue them from their wretched situation, in the servitude and idolatry in Egypt; and to carry them, through all enemies and dangers, to the liberty and happy state to which he intended to advance them. With regard to which, the language of the Scripture is—1. That he delivered—2. Saved—3. Bought or purchased—4. Redeemed them. Exod. iii. 8, "And I am come down to deliver them out of the hand of the Egyptians, and to bring them unto a good land." So Exod. xviii. 8, 9, 10. Judg. vi. 8, 9. Exod. vi. 6, "I am the Lord, and I will bring you from under the burdens of the Egyptians, and I will rid (deliver) you out of their bondage." So Exod. v. 23. 1 Sam. x. 18.

14. And as he brought them out of the most abject slavery, and advanced them to a new and happy state of being, attended with distinguishing privileges, enjoyments, and marks of honour: he is said,—1. To create, make, and form them.—2. To give them life.—3. To have begotten them. Isai. xliii. 1, "But thus saith the Lord that created thee, O Jacob, and he that formed thee, O Israel, Fear not:" ver. 5, "Fear not, for I am with thee: I will bring thy seed from the east, and gather thee from the west:" ver. 7, "Even every one that is called by my name; for I have created him for my glory; I have formed him; yea, I have made him;" ver. 15, "I am the Lord, your Holy One, the Creator of Israel, your King." Deut. xxxii. 6, "Do ye thus requite the Lord, O foolish people?—Hath he not made thee, and established thee?" Ver. 15. Psal. cxlix. 2. Isai. xxvii. 11, "It is a people of no understanding; therefore, he that made them will have no mercy on them; and he that formed them will show them no favour." xliii. 21. xlv. 1, 2, "Yet hear now, O Jacob, my servant, and Israel whom I have chosen, Thus saith the Lord that made thee and formed thee from the womb." Ver. 21, 24, "Thus saith the Lord thy Redeemer, and he that formed thee from the womb," &c.

15. Thus, as God created the whole body of the Jews, and made them to live, they received a being or existence; Isai. lxiii. 19, "We ARE; thou hast never ruled over them, (the heathen,) they are not called by thy name." Or rather thus; "We are of old; thou hast not ruled over them; thy Name hath not been called upon them." It is in the Hebrew, הוּיָנוּ חַיִּים לֹא מִשְׁמַר בָּם hayinu chaim lo mashalla bam; and are therefore called by the Apostle (things that ARE, in opposition to the Gentiles, who, as they were not formerly created in the same manner, were the things which ARE NOT; 1 Cor. i. 28, "God has chosen things which ARE NOT, to bring to nought things that ARE." Further—

16. As he made them live, and begat them, (1) He sustains the character of a Father, and (2) they are his children, his sons and daughters, which were born to him. Deut. xxxii. 6, "Do ye thus requite the Lord, O foolish people?—Is he not thy father that hath bought thee?" Isai. lxiii. 16. "Doubtless thou art our Father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not: Thou, O Lord, art our Father, our Redeemer," &c. Jer. xxxi. 9, "For I am a Father to Israel, and Ephraim is my first-born." Mal. ii. 10, "Have we not all one father? hath not one God created us?"

17. And as the whole body of the Jews were the children of one Father, even of God, this naturally established among themselves the mutual and endearing relation of brethren, (including that of sisters;) and they were obliged to consider and to deal with each other accordingly. Lev. xxv. 46. Deut. i. 16. iii. 8. xv. 7, "If there be among you a poor man of one of thy brethren, thou shalt not harden thy heart, nor shut thy hand against thy poor brother." xvii. 15. xviii. 15. xix. 19. xxii. 1. xxiii. 19. xxiv. 14. Judg. xx. 13. 1 Kings xii. 24. [Acts xxiii. 1.] And in many other places.

18. And the relation of God, as a Father to the Jewish nation, and they his children, will lead our thoughts to a clear idea of their being, as they are frequently called, the house or family of God. Num. xii. 7, "My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all my house." 1 Chron. xvii. 14, "I will settle him in my house, and in my kingdom for ever." Jer. xii. 7, "I have forsaken my house, I have left my heritage." Hos. ix. 15, "For the wickedness of their (Ephraim's) doings I will drive them out of my house, I will love them no more: all their princes are revolvers." Zech. ix. 8. Psal. xciii. 5. And in other places, and perhaps frequently in the Psalms, xxiii. 6. xxv. 4, &c.

The Original and Nature of the Jewish Constitution.

19. Further; the Scripture directs us to consider the land of Canaan, as the state or inheritance belonging to this house or family. Num. xxvi. 53, Unto these, (namely, all the children of Israel,) the land shall be divided, for an inheritance. Deut. xxiii. 23, "That thy land be not defiled, which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance." See the same in many other places.

20. Here it may not be improper to take notice that the land of Canaan, in reference to their trials, wanderings, and fatigues in the wilderness, is represented as their rest. Exod. xxxiii. 14, "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest." Deut. iii. 20. xii. 9, "For ye are not yet come to the rest, and to the inheritance which the Lord your God giveth you," ver. 10. xxv. 19. Psal. xcvi. 11, "Unto whom I swear in my wrath that they should not enter into my rest."

21. Thus the Israelites were the house, or family of God. Or we may conceive them formed into a nation, having the Lord Jehovah, the true God, at their head; who, on this account, is styled their God, Governor, Protector, or King; and they his people, subjects, or servants. Exod. xix. 6, "Ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation." Deut. iv. 34, "Hath God essayed to go and take him a nation from the midst of another nation?" Isai. li. 4, "Hearken unto me, my people, and give ear unto me, my NATION."

22. And it is in reference to their being a society peculiarly appropriated to God, and under his special protection and government, that they are sometimes called the city, the holy city, the city of the Lord, of God. Psal. xlvii. 4, "There is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of our God: the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High." ci. 8, "I will early destroy all the wicked of the land, that I may cut off all wicked doers from the city of the Lord." Isai. xlviii. 1, 2, "Hear ye this, O house of Jacob, which are called by the name of Israel: for they call themselves of the holy city, and stay themselves upon the God of Israel."

23. Hence the whole community, or church, is denoted by the city Jerusalem, and sometimes by Zion, Mount Zion, the city of David. Isai. lxii. 1, 6, 7, "I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace—and give him no rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth;" xlvii. 18, 19, "I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people;" lxvi. 10. Ezek. xvi. 3, 13. Joel iii. 17. Zech. i. 14. viii. 3, &c. xliii. 1. Isai. xxviii. 15, "Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation," &c. lxi. 3. Joel ii. 32. Obad. 17, But upon Mount Zion shall be deliverance," &c. ver. 21.

24. Hence also, they are said to be written or enrolled in the book of God, as being citizens invested in the privileges and immunities of his kingdom. Exod. xxxii. 32, "Yet now if thou wilt, forgive their sin; and if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of the book thou hast written." Ver. 33, "And the Lord said—Whosoever hath sinned against me, him will I blot out of my book." Ezek. xiii. 9.

25. And it deserves our notice: that as the other nations of the world did not belong to this city, commonwealth, or kingdom of God, and so were not his subjects and people, in the same peculiar sense as the Jews; for these reasons, they are frequently represented as strangers, and aliens, and as being not a people. And as they served other gods, and were generally corrupt in their morals, they have the character of enemies. Exod. xx. 10. Lev. xxv. 47, "And if a sojourner or a stranger wax rich by thee, and thy brother sell himself to the stranger." Deut. xiv. 21, "Thou mayest sell it to an alien." Isai. lxi. 5, "And strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your ploughmen." And in many other places. Deut. xxxii. 21, "I will move them to jealousy with those which are not a people." Isai. vii. 8. Hos. i. 10. ii. 23, "I will say to them which were not my people, Thou art my people: and they shall say, Thou art my God." Psal. lxxiv. 4, "Thine enemies roar in the midst of thy congregation." lxxviii. 66. lxxxiii. 2. lxxxix. 10. Isai. xlii. 13. lix. 18.—Rom. v. 10, "When we were enemies, we were reconciled to God." Col. i. 21.

26. The kind and particular regards of God for the Israelites, and their special relation to him, is also signified by that of husband and wife; and his making a covenant with them to be their God, is called espousals. Jer. xxxi. 32, "Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers, in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt, (which my covenant they broke, although I was an husband unto them, saith the Lord,) iii. 20. Ezek. xvi. 31, 32. Hos. ii. 2, "Plead, (ye children of Judah, and children of Israel, chap. i. 2.) with your mother; plead, for she is not my wife, neither am I her husband;" that is, for her wickedness I have divorced her, (Isai. lxii. 4, 5.) Jer. ii. 2, "Go, and cry in the ears of Jerusalem, saying, Thus saith the Lord, I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals; when thou wast after me in the wilderness, in the land that was not sown;" iii. 14, "Turn, O backsliding children, saith the Lord, for I am married unto you." Isai. lxii. 4, 5.

27. Hence it is that the Jewish church, or community, is represented as a mother: and particular members as her children. Isai. i. 1, "Thus saith the Lord, Where is the bill of your mother's divorcement?" &c. Hos. ii. 2, 5, "For their mother hath played the harlot." Isai. xlix. 17, "Thy children, (O Zion,) shall make haste," &c. Ver. 22, 25. Jer. v. 7. Ezek. xvi. 35, 36. Hos. iv. 6, "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge—seeing thou hast forgotten the law of God, I will also forget thy children."

28. Hence, also, from the notion of the Jewish church being a wife to God, her husband; her idolatry, or worshipping of strange gods, comes under the name of adultery and whoredom, and she takes the character of a harlot. Jer. iii. 8, "And I saw, when for all the causes whereby backsliding Israel committed adultery:" ver. 9, "And it came to pass, through the lightness of her whoredom, that she defiled the land, and committed adultery with stones and stocks;" xiii.

27. Ezek. xvi. 15, xxiii. 43. Jer. iii. 6, "Backsliding Israel is gone up upon every high mountain, and under every green tree, and there has played the harlot."

29. As God exercised a singular providence over them, in supplying, guiding and protecting them, he was their shepherd, and they his flock, his sheep. Psal. lxxvii. 20. lxxviii. 52. lxxx. 1, "Give ear, O Shepherd of Israel:" Isai. xl. 11, "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd." Psal. lxxiv. 1, "O God, why hast thou cast us off for ever? Why doth thine anger smoke against the sheep of thy pasture?" lxxix. 13. xcv. 7. Jer. xiii. 17, "Mine eye shall weep sore—because the Lord's flock is carried captive." See Ezek. xxxiv. throughout; and in many other places.

30. Upon nearly the same account as God established them, provided proper means for their happiness, and improvement in knowledge and virtue, they are compared to a vine and a vineyard, and God to the husbandman, who planted and dressed it; and particular members of the community are compared to branches. Psal. lxxx. 8, "Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt; thou hast cast out the heathen and planted it:" ver. 14, "Return, we beseech thee, O Lord of Hosts; look down from heaven, behold and visit thy vine: and the vineyard which thy right hand has planted." Isai. v. 1, "Now I will sing to my well-beloved a song, touching his vineyard: my well-beloved has a vineyard in a very fruitful hill:" ver. 2, "And he fenced it," &c. ver. 7, "For the vineyard of the Lord—is the house of Israel;" Exod. xv. 17. Jer. ii. 21. Psal. lxxx. 11, "She sent out her boughs unto the sea, and her branches unto the river;" Isai. xxvii. 9, 10, 11, "By this shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged;—yet the defenced city shall be desolate—there shall the calf feed—and consume the branches thereof. When the boughs thereof are withered, they shall be broken off: the women come, and set them on fire: for it is a people of no understanding; therefore he that made them will have no mercy on them;" Jer. xi. 16, "The Lord hath called thy name a green olive tree, fair, and of goodly fruit," &c. Ezek. xvii. 6. Hos. xiv. 5, 6. Nahum ii. 2. and in many other places. (Rom. xi. 17, "And if some of the branches were broken off," &c. ver. 18, 19, "Thou wilt say then, The branches were broken off that I might be grafted in.")

31. As they were, by the will of God, set apart, and appropriated in a special manner to his honour and obedience, and furnished with extraordinary means and motives to holiness; so God is said to sanctify or hallow them. Exod. xxxi. 13, "Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, Verily my Sabbaths ye shall keep; for it is a sign between me and you, throughout your generations; that ye may know that I am the Lord, that doth sanctify you:" Ezek. xx. 12. Lev. xx. 8, "And ye shall keep my statutes, and do them; for I am the Lord which sanctify you:" xxi. 8, xxii. 9, 16, 32. Ezek. xxxvii. 28.

32. Hence it is that they are styled a holy nation, or people, and saints; Exod. xix. 6, "And ye shall be to me—a holy nation:" Deut. vii. 6, "For thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God:" xiv. 2. xxvi. 19. xxxiii. 3. 2 Chron. vi. 41, "Let thy priests, O Lord God, be clothed with salvation, and let thy saints rejoice in goodness." Psal. xxxiv. 9, "O fear the Lord, ye his saints:" l. 5, "Gather my saints together unto me:" ver. 7, "Hear, O my people," &c. lxxxix. 2. cxlviii. 14, "He also exalteth the horn of his people, the praise of his saints; even of the children of Israel," &c.

33. Further, by his presence among them, and their being consecrated to him, they were made his house, or building, the sanctuary which he built. And this implied by his dwelling and walking amongst them. Psal. cxiv. 2, "Judah was his sanctuary, and Israel his dominion:" Isai. lvi. 3, "Neither let the son of the stranger, that hath joined himself to the Lord, speak, saying, The Lord hath utterly separated me from his people," ver. 4, "for thus saith the Lord:" ver. 5, "Even unto them will I give in my house, and within my walls, a place, and a name." Jer. xxxiii. 7, "And I will cause the captivity of Judah, and of Israel, to return, and will build them as at the first."—Amos ix. 11, "I will raise up the tabernacle of David—I will raise up its ruins, and will build it as in the days of old." Exod. xxv. 8, "And let them," the children of Israel, "make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them;" xxix. 45, 46, "And I will dwell among the children of Israel, and will be their God," &c. Lev. xxxvi. 11, 12, "And I will set my tabernacle among you:—And I will walk among you, and will be your God, and ye shall be my people." Numb. xxxv. 34. 2 Sam. vii. 7. Ezek. xliii. 7, 9, "And he said unto me—the place of my throne, and the place of the soles of my feet, where I dwell in the midst of the children of Israel," &c. Hence we may gather, that dwell, in such places, imports to reign; and may be applied figuratively to whatever governs in our hearts, Rom. vii. 17, 20. viii. 9, 11.

34. And not only did God, as their King, dwell among them as in his house, temple, or palace; but he also conferred upon them the honour of kings, as he redeemed them from servitude, made them lords of themselves, and raised them above other nations to reign over them: and of priests too, as they were to attend upon God, from time to time continually, in the solemn offices of religion, which he had appointed. Exod. xix. 6, "And ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests," or a kingly priesthood. Deut. xxvi. 19, "And to make thee high above all nations—in praise, and in name, and in honour, and that thou mayest be a holy people unto the Lord thy God:" xxviii. 1. xv. 8, "For the Lord thy God bleaseth thee—and thou shalt reign over many nations." Isai. lxi. 6, "But ye (the seed of Jacob) shall be named the priests of the Lord; men shall call you the ministers of our God:"—

35. Thus the whole body of the Jewish nation were separated unto God. And as they were more nearly related to him than any other people, as they were joined to him in covenant, and felt access to him in the ordinances of worship, and in virtue of his promise, had a particular title to his regards and blessings, he is said to be near unto them, and they unto him. Exod. xxxiii. 16. Lev. xx. 24, "I am the Lord your God, who have separated you from other people:" ver. 26.

The Original and Nature of the Jewish Constitution.

1 Kings viii. 52, 53. Deut. iv. 7, "For what nation is there so great that hath God so near unto them, as the Lord our God is in all things that we call upon him for?" Psal. cxlviii. 14, "The children of Israel, a people near unto him."

36. And here I may observe, that as the Gentiles were not then taken into the same peculiar covenant with the Jews, nor stood in the same special relation to God, nor enjoyed their extraordinary religious privileges, but lay out of the commonwealth of Israel, they are, on the other hand, said to be far off. Isai. lvii. 19, "I create the fruit of the lips; peace, peace to him that is far off, and to him that is near, saith the Lord, and I will heal him." Zech. vi. 15, "And they that are far off shall come and build in the temple." Eph. ii. 17, "And came and preached to you, (Gentiles), which were afar off, and to them that were nigh," (the Jews.)

37. And, as God had, in all these respects, distinguished them from all other nations, and sequestered them unto himself, they are styled his peculiar people: Deut. vii. 6, "The Lord hath chosen thee to be a special, (or peculiar) people, unto himself:" xiv. 2, "The Lord hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people unto himself above all the nations that are upon the earth;" xxvi. 18.

38. As they were a body of men particularly related to God, instructed by him in the rules of wisdom, devoted to his service, and employed in his true worship, they are called his congregation or church. Num. xvi. 3. xxviii. 17. Josh. xxii. 17. 1 Chron. xxviii. 8, "Now therefore, in the sight of all Israel the congregation, (the church), of the Lord." Psal. lxxiv. 2.

39. For the same reason, they are considered as God's possession, inheritance, or heritage. Deut. ix. 26, "O Lord, destroy not thy people, and thine inheritance." Ver. 29. Psal. xxxiii. 12. cxvi. 40. Jer. x. 16. xii. 7, "I have forsaken my house, I have left my heritage. I have given the dearly beloved of my soul into the hands of her enemies." And in many other places.

§ III. Reflections on the foregoing Privileges and Honours.

40. Whether I have ranged the foregoing particulars in proper order, or given an exact account of each, let the studious of Scripture knowledge consider. What ought to be specially observed is this; that all the forementioned privileges, benefits, relations, and honours, did belong to ALL the children of Israel without exception. The Lord Jehovah was the God, King, Saviour, Father, Husband, Shepherd, &c. to them ALL. He saved, bought, redeemed; he created, begot, he made, he planted, &c. them ALL. And they were ALL his people, nation, heritage; his children, spouse, flock, vineyard, &c. They all had a right to the ordinances of worship, to the promises of God's blessing, and especially to the promise of the land of Canaan. ALL enjoyed the protection and special favours of God in the wilderness, till they had forfeited them: ALL ate of the mannâ, and ALL drank of the water out of the rock, &c. That these privileges and benefits belonged to the whole body of the Israelitish nation, is evident from all the texts I have already quoted: which he, who observes carefully, will find do all of them speak of the whole nation, the whole community; without exception.

41. And that all these privileges, honours, and advantages, were common to the whole nation, is confirmed by this further consideration: that they were the effect of God's free grace, without regard to any prior righteousness of theirs; and therefore they are assigned to God's love as the spring from whence they flowed; and the donation of those benefits is expressed by God's loving them: they are also assigned to God's mercy, and the bestowing of them is expressed by God's showing them mercy. Deut. ix. 4, 5, 6, "Speak not thou in thy heart, after that the Lord has cast them out before thee, saying, For my righteousness the Lord hath brought me in to possess this land.—Not for thy righteousness, or the uprightness of thy heart dost thou go to possess their land." &c. "Understand, therefore, that the Lord thy God giveth thee not this good land to possess it for thy righteousness; for thou art a stiff-necked people."

42. Deut. vii. 7, "The Lord did not set his love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people." Verse 8, "But because the Lord loved you, and because he would keep the oath which he had sworn unto your fathers; hath the Lord brought you out," (of Egypt.) xxxiii. 3, "He loved the people." Isai. xliii. 3, 4. Jer. xxxi. 3. Hos. iii. 1. ix. 15.

43. It is on account of this general love to the Israelites, that they are honoured with the title of Beloved. Psal. lx. 5, "That thy beloved may be delivered, save with thy right hand, and bear me." Psal. cviii. 6. Jer. xi. 15, "What hath my beloved to do in my house, seeing she hath wrought lewdness with many?" xii. 7, "I have forsaken my house, I have given the dearly beloved of my soul into the hands of my enemies," (and in their present condition at this day the Jews are still, in a sense, beloved, Rom. xi. 28.) 44. Exod. xv. 13, "Thou, in thy mercy, hast led forth the people which thou hast redeemed," &c. Psal. xcvi. 3. Isai. liv. 10. Mic. vii. 20, "Thou shalt perform the truth to Jacob, and the mercy to Abraham, which thou hast sworn unto our fathers from the days of old." Luke i. 54, 55, "He hath holpen his servant Israel, in remembrance of his mercy, as he spake to our fathers, to Abraham and his seed for ever." Agreeably to this, he showed them mercy, as he continued them to be his people, when he might have cut them off. Exod. xxxiii. 19, "I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and I will show mercy on whom I will show mercy." And when, after their present state of rejection, they shall again be taken into the church, this too is expressed by their obtaining mercy. Rom. xi. 31.

45. In these texts, and others of the same kind, it is evident the love and mercy of God hath respect not to particular persons among the Jews, but to the whole nation; and therefore is to be understood of that general love and mercy whereby he singled them out to be a peculiar nation to himself, favoured with extraordinary blessings

Of their antecedent and consequent Blessings.

46. And it is with regard to this sentiment and manner of speech, that the GENTILES, who were not distinguished in the same manner, are said not to have obtained mercy. Hos. ii. 23, "And I will sow her unto me in the earth, and I will have mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy, and I will say to them which were not my people, Thou art my people; and they shall say, Thou art my God."⁵

47. Further; it should be noted, as a very material and important circumstance, that all this mercy and love was granted and confirmed to the Israelites under the sanction of a covenant; the most solemn declaration and assurance, sworn to and ratified by the oath of God. Gen. xvii. 7, 8, "And I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee, in their generations, for an everlasting covenant; to be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee. And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God." Gen. xxii. 16, 17, 18, "By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore, and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because thou hast obeyed my voice." This covenant with Abraham was the Magna Charta, the basis of the Jewish constitution, which was renewed afterward with the whole nation; and is frequently referred to as the ground and security of all their blessings. Exod. vi. 3, 7, "I appeared unto Abraham, Isaac," &c. "And I have also established my covenant with them, to give them the land of Canaan. I have also heard the groaning of the children of Israel, and I have remembered my covenant, and I will take you to me for a people, and I will be to you a God." Deut. vii. 8. Psal. cv. 8, 9, 10, "He hath remembered his covenant for ever, the word which he commanded to a thousand generations. Which covenant he made with Abraham, and his oath unto Isaac, and confirmed the same unto Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting COVENANT." Jer. xi. 5. Esek. xvi. 8. xx. 5.

48. But, what most of all deserves our attention is this: that the Jewish constitution was a scheme for promoting virtue, true religion, or a good and pious life. In all the forementioned instances they were very happy. But were they to rest in them? Because these blessings were the gift of love and mercy, without respect to their righteousness or obedience: was it therefore needless for them to be obedient? or were they, purely on account of benefits already received, secure of the favour and blessing of God for ever? by no means. And that I may explain this important point more clearly, I shall distinguish their blessings into antecedent and consequent, and show, from the Scriptures, how both stand in relation to their duty.

49. Antecedent blessings are all the benefits hitherto mentioned, which were given by the mere grace of God, antecedently to their obedience, and without respect to it; but yet so that they were intended to be motives to obedience. Which effect if they produced, then their election, redemption, and calling were confirmed, and they were entitled to all their blessings, promised in the covenant; which blessings I therefore call consequent, because they were given only in consequence of their obedience. But, on the other hand, if the antecedent blessings did not produce obedience to the will of God; if his chosen people, his children, did not obey his voice, then they forfeited all their privileges, all their honours and relations to God, all his favours and promises, and fell under the severest threatenings of his wrath and displeasure. Thus life itself may be distinguished into, I. Antecedent, which God gives freely to all his creatures of his mere good will and liberality, before they can have done any thing to deserve it. II. Consequent life; which is the continuance of life in happy circumstances, and has relation to the good conduct of a rational creature. As he improves life antecedent, so he shall, through the favour of God, enjoy life consequent.

50. And that this was the very end and design of the dispensation of God's extraordinary favours to the Jews, namely, to engage them to duty and obedience; or that it was a scheme for promoting virtue, is clear beyond all dispute, from every part of the Old Testament. Note, I shall make ANT. stand for antecedent love or motives; CONS. for consequent love or reward; and THN. for threatening. Gen. xvii. 1, (ANT.) "I am God, All-sufficient, (Duty) walk thou before me, and be thou perfect." Verse 4, 8, (ANT.) "I will be a God unto thee, and thy seed after thee. And I will give unto thee and unto thy seed, the land of Canaan, and I will be their God." Verse 9, (Duty) "Thou shalt keep my covenant therefore, thou and thy seed after thee." Gen. xxii. 16, 18, (Duty) "Because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, because thou hast obeyed my voice." Verse 16, 17, (CONS.) "By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, that in blessing, I will bless thee, and in multiplying, I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven, and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies, and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed."

51. Here let it be noted, that the same blessings may be both consequent and antecedent with regard to different persons. With regard to Abraham, the blessings promised in this place, (Gen. xxii. 16, 17, 18.) are consequent, as they were the reward of his obedience, "because thou hast obeyed my voice." But with regard to his posterity, these same blessings were of the antecedent kind; because, though they had respect to Abraham's obedience: yet, with regard to the Jews, they were given freely or antecedently to any obedience they had performed. So the blessings of redemption, with regard to our Lord's obedience, are consequent; but with regard to us, they are of free grace and antecedent, not owing to any obedience of ours, though granted in consequence of Christ's obedience. Phil. ii. 8, 9, &c. Eph. i. 7. Heb. v. 8, 9. Nor doth the donation of blessings upon many in consequence of the obedience of one, at all diminish the grace, but very much recommends the wisdom that bestows them.

Of their antecedent and consequent Blessings.

Jer. xiii. 11. Lev. xx. 7, 8, (Ant.) "I am the Lord your God, I am the Lord which sanctify you. (Duty) Sanctify yourselves therefore, and be ye holy, and ye shall keep my statutes, and do them." Deut. iv. 7, 8, (Ant.) "What nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh them, as the Lord our God is? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous," &c. Verse 9, (Duty) "Only take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently, lest thou forget the things which thine eyes have seen."

Verse 20, (Ant.) "The Lord hath taken you forth out of the iron furnace, even out of Egypt, to be unto him a people of inheritance, as ye are at this day." Verse 23, (Duty) "Take heed unto yourselves, lest ye forget the covenant of the Lord your God." Verse 24, (Thr.) "For the Lord thy God is a consuming fire." Verse 25, "When ye shall corrupt yourselves, and do evil in the sight of the Lord thy God." Verse 26, "I call heaven and earth to witness, that ye shall soon utterly perish from off the land."

Verse 34, (Ant.) "Hath God essayed to go, and take him a nation from the midst of another nation, by signs and wonders," &c. &c. Verse 39, (Duty) "Know therefore this day, and consider it in thy heart, that the Lord he is God in heaven above, &c. Thou shalt keep, therefore, his statutes and his commandments, (Cons.) that it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee," &c.

Deut. v. 6, (Ant.) "I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage." Verse 7, (Duty) "Thou shalt have no other gods before me," &c. Verse 20, "O that there were such a heart in them that they would fear me and keep all my commandments always, (Cons.) that it might be well with them, and with their children for ever." Verse 33, (Duty) "You shall walk in all the ways which the Lord your God hath commanded you, (Cons.) that ye may live, and that it may be well with you," &c.

Chap. vi. 21, (Ant.) "We were Pharaoh's bondsmen, and the Lord brought us out of Egypt," &c. Verse 24, (Duty) "And the Lord commanded us to do all these statutes, to fear the Lord our God, (Cons.) for our good always, that he might preserve us alive," &c.

Chap. vii. 6, 7, 8, (Ant.) "Thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God; the Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself; the Lord loved you and redeemed you out of the house of bondmen." Verse 9, (Duty) "Know therefore that the Lord thy God he is God," &c. Verse 11, "Thou shalt therefore keep the commandments, and the statutes, and the judgments, which I command thee this day, to do them." Verse 12, 13, 18, (Cons.) "Wherefore it shall come to pass, if ye hearken to these judgments, and keep and do them, that the Lord thy God shall keep unto thee the covenant and the mercy which he swore unto thy fathers. And he will love thee, and bless thee, and multiply thee," &c.

Chap. viii. 2, (Ant.) "Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee," &c. Verse 5, "Thou shalt also consider in thy heart, that as a man chasteneth his son, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee." Verse 6, (Duty) "Therefore thou shalt keep the commandments of the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and to fear him." Verse 11, "Beware that thou forget not the Lord thy God," &c. Verse 19, (Thr.) "and it shall be, if thou do at all forget the Lord thy God, and walk after other gods, I testify against you this day, that ye shall surely perish."

Chap. x. 15, (Ant.) "The Lord had a delight in thy fathers to love them, and he chose their seed after them, even you above all people." Verse 12, 16, (Duty) "Circumcise therefore the foreskin of your heart," &c.

Verse 22, (Ant.) "Thy fathers went down into Egypt, with threescore and ten persons, and now the Lord thy God hath made thee as the stars of heaven for multitude." Chap. xi. 1, (Duty) "Therefore shalt thou love the Lord thy God, and keep his charge," &c. Verse 13, "And it shall come to pass, if ye shall hearken diligently unto my commandments," &c. Verse 14, (Cons.) "That I will give you the rain of your land," &c. Verse 26, "Behold, I set before you this day a blessing and a curse. A blessing, if you obey the commandments of the Lord; and a curse, if ye will not obey," &c. Chap. xii. 23, (Duty) "Observe and hear all these words which I command thee, (Cons.) that it may go well with thee and thy children after thee for ever, when thou hast done that which is good and right in the sight of the Lord thy God."

Chap. xiii. 17, 18. xv. 4, 5. xxvii. 9, (Ant.) "Take heed and hearken, O Israel, this day thou art become the people of the Lord thy God." Verse 10, (Duty) "Thou shalt therefore obey the voice of the Lord thy God, and do his commandments," &c. Chap. xxviii. 1, "And it shall come to pass, if thou hearken diligently unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe and to do his commandments, (Cons.) That the Lord will set thee on high above all nations of the earth. And all these blessings shall come on thee, and overtake thee, if thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God. Blessed shalt thou be in the city," &c. Verse 15, (Thr.) "But it shall come to pass, if thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe and to do all his commandments, and his statutes, that all these curses shall come upon thee and overtake thee," &c. Verse 45, "Moreover, all these curses shall come upon thee till thou be destroyed, because thou hearkenest not unto the voice of the Lord thy God." Chap. xxix. 2, 10. xxx. 15, 18, (Duty) "See, I have set before you this day life and good, and death and evil; in that I command thee this day to love the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and to keep his commandments, and his statutes, and his judgments, (Cons.) that thou mayest live and multiply; and the Lord thy God shall bless thee in the land whither thou goest to possess it. (Thr.) But if thine heart turn away, so that thou wilt not hear, but shalt be drawn away and worship other gods, and serve them, I denounce unto you this day that ye shall surely perish."

§3. Whosoever peruses the first sixteen, and the 28th, 29th, 30th, 31st, and 32d chapters of Deuteronomy, will clearly see, that all the privileges, honours, instructions, protections, &c. which were given them as a select body of men, were intended as motives to obedience; which, if thus wisely improved, would bring upon them still further blessings. Thus God drew them to duty and virtue by his loving kindness. Jer. xxxi. 3, "He drew them with cords of a man," such considerations as are apt to influence the rational nature, "and with the bands of love," Hos. xi. 4. But if they were disobedient, and did not make a right use of God's benefits and favours, then they were subjected to a curse, and should perish. And this is so evident from this single book, that I shall not need to heap together the numerous quotations which might be collected from other parts of Scripture, particularly the prophetic writings. Only I may further establish this point by observing—that, in fact, though all the Israelites in the wilderness were the people, children and chosen of God; all entitled to the Divine blessing, and partakers of the several instances of his goodness; yet, notwithstanding all their advantages and honours, when they were disobedient to his will, distrustful of his power and providence, or revolted to the worship of idol gods, great numbers of them fell under the Divine vengeance, Exod. xxxii. 8, 27, 28. Num. xi. 4, 5, 6, 33. xvi. 2, 3, 32, 35, 41, 49. xxi. 5, 6. And though they had all a promise of entering into the land of Canaan, yet the then generation, from twenty years old and upwards, for their unbelief, were, by the righteous judgment of God, excluded from the benefit of that promise; they forfeited their inheritance, and died in the wilderness, Num. xiv. 28—36. Hebr. iii. 7, &c.

53. From all this it appears, that all the high privileges of the Jews, before mentioned, and all the singular relations in which they stood to God, as they were saved, bought, redeemed by him; as they were his called and elect; as they were his children whom he begot, created, made and formed, his sons and daughters, born to him; his heritage, church, house, and kingdom; his saints, whom he sanctified; his vine or vineyard, which he planted; his sheep and flock: I say these, and such like honours, advantages, and relations, as they are assigned to the whole body, do not import an absolute, final state of happiness and favour of any kind; but are to be considered as displays, instances, and descriptions of God's love and goodness to them, which were to operate as a mean, a moral mean, upon their hearts. They were, in truth, motives to oblige and excite to obedience; and only when so improved, became final and permanent blessings: but neglected, or misimproved, they were enjoyed in vain, they vanished and came to nothing; and wicked Israelites were no more the objects of God's favour than wicked heathens. Amos, ix. 7. speaking of corrupt Jews, "Are ye not as children of the Ethiopians unto me, O children of Israel? saith the Lord."⁷⁴

54. And, upon the whole, we may from the clearest evidence conclude, that the selecting the Jewish nation from the rest of the world, and taking them into a peculiar relation to God, was a scheme for promoting true religion and virtue in all its principles and branches, upon motives adapted to rational nature; which principles and branches of true religion are particularly specified in their law. And to this end, no doubt, every part of their constitution, even the ceremonial, was wisely adapted, considering their circumstances, and the then state of the world.

55. The love of God, as it was the foundation and original of this scheme, so it was the prime motive in it. God began the work of salvation among them antecedently to any thing which they might do, on their part, to engage his goodness. They did not first love God, but God first loved them; their obedience did not first advance towards God; but his mercy first advanced towards them, and saved, bought, redeemed them, took them for his people, and gave them a part in the blessings of his covenant. And as for his displeasure, they were under that only consequentially; or after they had neglected his goodness, and abused the mercy and means, the privileges and honours, which they enjoyed. This, I think, must appear very evident to any one who closely and maturely deliberates upon the true state of the Jewish church.

Thus, and for those ends, not excluding others before or afterward mentioned, the Jewish constitution was erected.

§ IV..The Jewish Peculiarity not prejudicial to the rest of Mankind—The Jewish Economy being established for the Benefit of the World in general.

56. But although the Father of mankind was pleased, in his wisdom, to erect the foregoing scheme, for promoting virtue, and preserving true religion in one nation of the world, upon which he conferred particular blessings and privileges; this was no injury nor prejudice to the rest of mankind. For, as to original favours, or external advantages, God, who may do what he pleases with his own, bestows them in any kind or degree, as he thinks fit. Thus he makes a variety of creatures; some angels in a higher sphere of being, some men in a lower. And among men he distributes different faculties, stations, and opportunities in life. To one he gives ten talents, to another five, to another two, and to another one, severally as he pleases; without any impeachment of his justice, and to the glorious display and illustration of his wisdom. And so he may bestow different advantages and favours upon different nations, with as much justice and wisdom as he has placed them in different climates, or vouchsafed them various accommodations and conveniences of life. But, whatever advantages some nations may enjoy above others, still God is the God and Father of all: and his extraordinary blessings to some are not intended to diminish his regards to others. He erected a scheme of polity and religion for promoting the knowledge of God, and the practice of virtue in one nation; but not with a design to withdraw his

⁷⁴ It must, however, be observed, that these titles, privileges, &c. imported spiritual blessings; and especially a Divine influence in, and gracious work upon the soul, changing and renewing the heart and affections; without which obedience to the Divine will, it would have been impossible: therefore, formed, created, redeemed, begotten, sanctified, &c. were to be considered by them, as they are to us, significant of that change which is to take place in the heart by the grace of God, producing that obedience which is commanded in his word!

goodness or providential regards from the rest. God has made a variety of soils and situations; yet he cares for every part of the globe; and the inhabitants of the North Cape, where they conflict a good part of the year with night and extreme cold, are no more neglected by the universal Lord, than those who enjoy the perpetual summer and pleasures of the Canary Isles. At the same time that God chose the children of Israel to be his peculiar people, in a special covenant, he was the God of the rest of mankind; and regarded them as the objects of his care and benevolence. Exod. xix. 5, "Now, therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people: $\text{אשר לי ולי} \text{אל}$ ALTHOUGH all the earth is mine." So it should be rendered. Deut. x. 14, 15, "Behold the heaven and the heaven of heavens is the Lord's thy God, the earth with all that therein is. Only the Lord had a delight in thy fathers, to love them, and he chose their seed after them, even you above all people, as it is this day." Verse 17, 18, "For the Lord your God is God of gods, and Lord of lords, a great God, a mighty, and a terrible, which regardeth not persons, (or is no respecter of persons, Acts x. 34. through partiality to one person, or one nation, more than another,) nor taketh reward. He doth execute the judgment of the fatherless and widow, and LOVETH THE STRANGER, in giving him food and raiment." A stranger was one who was of any other nation beside the Jewish. Psal. cxlvi. 9, "The Lord preserveth the STRANGERS." viii. 1. xix. 1, 2, 3, 4. xxiv. 1. xxxiii. 5, "The EARTH is full of the goodness of the Lord." Verse 8, "Let ALL the earth fear the Lord; let ALL the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of him." Verse 12, "Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord, and the people whom he has chosen for his own inheritance." Verse 13, "The Lord looketh from heaven; he beholdeth ALL the sons of men. From the place of his habitation he looketh upon ALL the inhabitants of the earth. He fashioneth their hearts alike; he considereth all their works." xlvii. 2, 8, "The Lord most high is a great king over ALL the earth. God reigneth over the heathen." lxvi. 7. cvii. 8, 15, 21. cxlv. 9, "The Lord is good to ALL, and his tender mercies are over ALL his works." Many more passages might be brought out of the Scriptures of the Old Testament to show that all the nations of the earth were the objects of the Divine care and goodness, at the same time that he vouchsafed a particular and extraordinary providence towards the Jewish nation.

57. And agreeably to this, the Israelites were required to exercise all benevolence to the Gentiles, or Strangers, to abstain from all injurious treatment, to permit them to dwell peaceably and comfortably among them, to partake of their blessings, to incorporate into the same happy body, if they thought fit; and to join in their religious solemnities. Exod. xxii. 21, "Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him." xxii. 9, 12. Lev. xix. 10, "Thou shalt not glean thy vineyard, neither shalt thou gather every grape of thy vineyard; thou shalt leave them for the poor and stranger: I am the Lord your God." xxiii. 22. xxx. 33, 34, "And if a stranger sojourn with thee in your land, ye shall not vex him. But the stranger that dwelleth with you, shall be unto you as one born amongst you, and thou shalt love him as thyself." xxv. 35, "And if thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen in decay with thee, then thou shalt relieve him: yea, though he be a stranger or a sojourner, that he may live with thee." Numb. xv. 14, 15, "And if a stranger sojourn with you, or whosoever be among you in your generations, and will offer an offering made by fire of a sweet savour unto the Lord; as ye do so shall he do. One ordinance shall be both for you of the congregation, and also for the stranger that sojourneth with you, an ordinance for ever in your generations; as ye are, so shall the stranger be, before the Lord." Deut. xxvi. 11, 12, "And thou shalt rejoice in every good thing, which the Lord thy God hath given unto thee, and unto thy house, thou, and the Levite, and the stranger that is among you." Ezek. xxii. 7, 29.

58. And not only were they required to treat strangers, or men of other nations, with kindness and humanity; but it appears, from several parts of Scripture, that the whole Jewish dispensation had respect to the nations of the world. Not, indeed, to bring them all into the Jewish church, (that would have been impracticable, as to the greatest part of the world,) but to spread the knowledge and obedience of God in the earth. Or, it was a scheme which was intended to have its good effects beyond the pale of the Jewish enclosure, and was established for the benefit of all mankind. Gen. xii. 3, "And in thee (Abraham) shall all families of the earth be blessed." xxii. 18, "And in thy seed shall all nations of the earth be blessed." Exod. vii. 5, "And the Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord, when I stretch forth my hand upon Egypt, and bring out the children of Israel." ix. 16, "And indeed for this very cause have I raised thee (Pharaoh) up, for to show in thee my power, and that my name may be declared throughout all the earth." xv. 14. Lev. xxxvii. 45. Numb. xiv. 13, 14, 15.

59. But though the Jewish peculiarity did not exclude the rest of the world from the care and beneficence of the universal Father; and though the Jews were commanded to exercise benevolence towards persons of other nations; yet about the time when the Gospel was promulgated, the Jews were greatly elevated on account of their distinguishing privileges: they looked upon themselves as the only favourites of heaven, and regarded the rest of mankind with a sovereign contempt, as nothing, as abandoned of God, and without a possibility of salvation; unless they should incorporate, in some degree or other, with their nation. Their constitution, they supposed, was established for ever, never to be altered, or in any respect abolished. They were the true and only church, out of which no man could be accepted of God: and, consequently, unless a man submitted to the law of Moses, how virtuous or good soever he were, it was their belief, he could not be saved. He had no right to a place in the church, nor could hereafter obtain life.

The Jewish Dispensation perfected by the Gospel.

V. The Jewish Peculiarity was to receive its Perfection from the Gospel.

60. But the Jewish dispensation, as peculiar to that people, though superior to the mere light of nature, which it supposed and included, was but of a temporary duration, and of an inferior and imperfect kind, in comparison of that which was to follow, and which God, from the beginning, (when he entered into covenant with Abraham, and made the promise to him,) intended to erect, and which he made several declarations under the Old Testament that he would erect, in the proper time, as successive to the Jewish dispensation; and, as a superstructure, perfective of it. And, as the Jewish dispensation was erected by the ministry of a much nobler hand, even that of the Son of God, the Messiah, the foreordained before the world was made, promised to Abraham, foretold by the prophets, and even expected by the Jews themselves; though under no just conceptions of the end of his coming into the world. He was to assume, and live in a human body, to declare the truth and grace of God more clearly and expressly to the Jews, to exhibit a pattern of the most perfect obedience; and to be obedient even unto death in compliance with the will of God.* When Christ came into the world, the Jews were ripe for destruction; but he published a general indemnity for the transgressions of the former covenant, upon their repentance; and openly revealed a future state, as the true Land of Promise, even eternal life in heaven. Thus he confirmed the former covenant with the Jews, as to the favour and blessing of God; and enlarged, or more clearly explained it, as to the blessings therein bestowed; instead of an earthly Canaan, revealing the resurrection of the dead, and everlasting happiness and glory in the world to come.

61. That the Gospel is the Jewish scheme enlarged and improved, will evidently appear if we consider that we Gentiles, believing in Christ, are said to be incorporated into the same body with the Jews; and that believing Jews and Gentiles are now become one, one flock, one body in Christ. John x. 16, "And other sheep I have which are not of this (the Jewish) fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice, and there shall be one flock, (so the word ovium signifies, and so our translators have rendered it in all the other places where it is used in the New Testament. See Matt. xxvi. 31. Luke ii. 8. 1 Cor. ix. 7. And here also it should have been translated flock, (not fold), and one shepherd." 1 Cor. xii. 13, "By one Spirit we are all baptized in one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles." Gal. iii. 28, "There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus;" that is, under the Gospel dispensation. Eph. ii. 14, 15, 16, "For he is our peace, who has made both (Jews and Gentiles) one, and has broken down the middle wall of partition between us, (Jews and Gentiles.) Having abolished by his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances, for to make in himself of twain one new man, so making peace; and that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby."

62. And that this union or coalition between believing Jews and Gentiles, is to be understood of the believing Gentiles being taken into that church and covenant in which the Jews were before the Gospel dispensation was erected; and out of which the unbelieving Jews were cast, is evident from the following considerations:

63. First, that Abraham, the head or root of the Jewish nation, is the Father of us all. Rom. iv. 16, 17, "Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace, to the end that the promise might be sure to all the seed; not to that only which is of the law, (the Jews) but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham, (the believing Gentiles) who is the father of us all, (as it is written, I have made thee a father of many nations,) before him whom he believed," that is to say, in the account and purpose of God, whom he believed, he is the father of US ALL. Abraham, when he stood before God and received the promise, did not, in the account of God, appear as a private person, but as the father of us all; as the head and father of the whole future church of God, from whom we were all, believing Jews and Gentiles, to descend; as we were to be accepted, and interested in the divine blessing and covenant after the same manner, as he was; namely, by faith. Gal. iii. 6, &c. "Even as Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness. Know ye, therefore, that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham. For the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify," would take into his church and covenant, "the heathen through faith, preached before the Gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed. So then they which be of faith," (of what country soever they are, heathens as well as Jews), "are blessed" (justified, taken into the kingdom and covenant of God,) "together with believing Abraham," (and into that very covenant which was made with him and his seed.†) In this covenant were the Jews during the whole period, from Abraham to Moses, and from Moses to Christ. For the covenant with Abraham was with him, and with his seed after him, Gen. xvii. 7. "To Abraham and his seed were the promises made," Gal. iii. 16. And the apostle in the next verse tells us, that (the promises or) "the covenant that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law which was (given by Moses) four hundred and thirty years after, could not disannul, that it should make the promise (or covenant with Abraham) of none effect;" consequently, the Jesse, during the whole period of the law, or Mosaic dispensation, were under the covenant with Abraham; and into that same covenant the apostle argues, Rom. iv. and Gal. iii. that the

* Yes, and thus to become a sacrifice for sin, that those who believe in him might have redemption in his blood. This is the light in which the New Testament places the death of Christ. A. C.

† Being justified does not merely signify being taken into covenant, so as to be incorporated with the visible church of God; it is used repeatedly by St. Paul, to signify that act of God's mercy whereby a penitent sinner, believing on Christ as a sacrifice for sin, has his transgressions forgiven for Christ's sake. Rom. v. 1, &c. A. C.

The Jewish Dispensation perfected by the Gospel.

believing Gentiles are taken. For which reason he affirms that they are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, that is, the patriarchs, &c. And that the great mystery, not understood in other ages, was this, "That the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body" with his church and children, the Jews, Eph. ii. 19. iii. 5, 6.

64. Secondly. Agreeably to this sentiment, the believing Gentiles are said to partake of all the spiritual privileges which the Jews enjoyed, and from which the unbelieving Jews fell; and to be taken into that kingdom and church of God, out of which they were cast. Several of the parables of our Lord are intended to point out this fact. And many passages in the Epistles directly prove it.

65. Matt. xx. 1—16. In this parable the vineyard is the kingdom of heaven, into which God, the householder, hired the Jews early in the morning; and into the same vineyard he hired the Gentiles at the eleventh hour, or an hour before sunset.

66. Matt. xxi. 33—34. The husbandmen to whom the vineyard was first let, were the Jews; to whom God first sent his servants, the prophets, ver. 34—36. and at last he sent his Son, whom they slew, verse 37—39. and then the vineyard was let out to other husbandmen; which our Saviour clearly explains, verse 43, "Therefore I say unto you, (Jews) the kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation (the believing Gentiles), bringing forth the fruits thereof." Hence it appears, that the very same kingdom of God, which the Jews once possessed, and in which the ancient prophets exercised their ministry, one after another, is now in our possession; for it was taken from them, and given to us.

67. Rom. xi. 17—24. The church or kingdom of God is compared to an olive-tree, and the members of it to the branches. "And if some of the branches (the unbelieving Jews) be broken off, and thou," Gentile Christian, "wert grafted in among them, and with them partake of the root and fatness of the olive-tree;" that is, the Jewish church and covenant. Ver. 24, "For if thou," Gentile Christian, "wert cut out of the olive-tree, which is wild by nature, and wert grafted, contrary to nature, into the good olive-tree," &c.

68. 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8, 9, 10, "Unto you, Gentiles, who believe, he (Christ) is an honour, τῆς, but unto them which be disobedient, (the unbelieving Jews), the stone which the builders disallowed, the same is made the head of the corner, and also a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence.* They stumble at the word, being disobedient, whereunto also they were appointed." (They are fallen from their privileges and honour, as God appointed they should in case of their unbelief.) "But ye" (Gentiles), are raised into the high degree from which they are fallen, and so "are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people, that ye should show forth the praises of him who hath called you out of the heathenish darkness into his marvellous light."

69. Thirdly. The Jews vehemently opposed the admission of the uncircumcised Gentiles into the kingdom and covenant of God, at the first preaching of the Gospel. But if the Gentiles were not taken into the same church and covenant, in which the Jewish nation had so long gloried, why should they so zealously oppose their being admitted into it? Or why so strenuously insist that they ought to be circumcised in order to their being admitted? For what was it to them if the Gentiles were called and taken into another kingdom and covenant, distinct, and quite different from that which they would have confined wholly to themselves, or to such only as were circumcised? It is plain the Gentiles might have been admitted into another kingdom and covenant, without any offence to the Jews; as they would still have been left in the sole possession of their ancient privileges. And the apostles could not have failed of using this as an argument to pacify their incensed brethren, had they so understood it. But seeing they never gave the least intimation of this, it shows they understood the affair as the unbelieving Jews did, namely, that the Gentiles, without being circumcised, were taken into the kingdom of God, in which they and their forefathers had so long stood.

70. Fourthly. It is upon this foundation, namely, that the believing Gentiles are taken into that church and kingdom in which the Jews once stood, that the apostles drew parallels, for caution and instruction, between the state of the ancient Jews and that of the Christians. 1 Cor. x. 1—13. "Moreover, brethren, I would not that ye should be ignorant, how that all our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea, and were all baptized unto Moses, and did all eat of the same spiritual meat, and did all drink of the same spiritual drink; but with many of them God was not well pleased: for they were overthrown in the wilderness. Now those things were our examples, to the intent we should not lust after evil things as they also lusted. Neither be ye idolaters, as were some of them; neither let us provoke Christ, as some of them provoked," &c. Hebr. iii. 7, &c. "Wherefore as the Holy Ghost saith, To-day,† when or while you hear his voice, harden not your hearts as in the day of temptation in the wilderness, when your fathers tempted me, wherefore I was grieved with that generation, and swore in my wrath, They shall not enter into my rest. Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief." Chap. iv. 1, "Let us therefore fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it." Verse 2, "For unto us hath the Gospel been preached, as well as to them," that is, we have the joyful promise of a happy state, or of entering into rest, as well as the

* We render this passage thus, a stone of stumbling and rock of offence, even to them which stumble at the word, being disobedient, &c. as if it were one continued sentence. But thus, violence is done to the text, and the apostle's sense is thrown into obscurity and disorder, which is restored by putting a period after offence, and beginning a new sentence, thus, they stumble at the word, &c. For observe, the apostle runs a double antithesis between the unbelieving Jews and believing Gentiles.

† Σήμερον εἰς τὴν ἑσπέρα αὐτοῦ ἀναοῦρα. EAN, if, should here be rendered When; as it is rendered 1 John iii. 2. and as it should have been rendered John xii. 32. xiv. 3. xvi. 7. 2 Cor. v. 1. In like manner the participle ἰδωθῆναι im. Paul. xcv. 7. (whence the place is quoted,) should have been translated When or While. For it is translated When, 1 Sam. xv. 17. Prov. iii. 24. iv. 12. Job vii. 4. 17ii. 16. Psal. i. 18. and might have been so translated in other places.

Of the Honours and Privileges of Christians.

Jews of old. Verse 11, "Let us labour, therefore, to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief."

71. Fifthly. Hence also the Scriptures of the Old Testament are represented as being written for our use and instruction, and to explain our dispensation as well as theirs. Matt. v. 17, "Think not that I am come to destroy the law and the prophets; I am not come to destroy but to fulfil." And when our Saviour taught his disciples the things pertaining to his kingdom, he opened to them the Scriptures, which were then no other than the Old Testament. Luke iv. 17—22. xviii. 31. xxiv. 27, "And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, he expounded unto them in all the Scriptures, the things concerning himself." Ver. 45, "Then opened he their understanding that they might understand the Scriptures." Thus the apostles were instructed in the things pertaining to the Gospel dispensation. And always in their sermons in the Acts, they confirm their doctrine from the Scriptures of the Old Testament. And in their Epistles they not only do the same, but also expressly declare, that those Scriptures were written as well for the benefit of the Christian as the Jewish church. Rom. xv. 4. After a quotation out of the Old Testament, the apostle adds, "for whatsoever things were written beforetime were written for our learning; that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope." 1 Cor. ix. 9, "It is written in the law of Moses, Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn." Ver. 10, "For our sakes no doubt, this is written." 1 Cor. x. 11. "Now all these things," (namely, the before-mentioned privileges, sins and punishments of the ancient Jews;) "happened unto them for ensamples; and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the earth are come." 2 Tim. iii. 16, 17, "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."

72. Sixthly. Agreeably to this notion, that the believing Gentiles are taken into that church or kingdom, out of which the unbelieving Jews are cast, the Christian church, considered in a body, is called by the same general name as the church under the Old Testament. Israel was the general name of the Jewish church, so also of the Christian. Gal. vi. 16, "As many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God." Rev. vii. 3, 4, Speaking of the Christian church, the angel said, "Hurt not the earth, neither the sea, nor the trees, till we have sealed the servants of our God in their foreheads. And I heard the number of them that were sealed: and there were sealed a hundred and forty and four thousand, of all the tribes of the children of Israel." Rev. xxi. 10—13, "He showed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, (the Christian church,) having the glory of God,—and had a wall great and high, and had twelve gates, and at the gates twelve angels, and names written thereon, which are the names of the twelve tribes of Israel," as comprehending the whole church. Ver. 14, "And the wall of the city had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb." Jews was another running title of the church in our Saviour's time, and this is also applied to Christians. Rev. ii. 8, 9, "And unto the angel of the (Christian) church in Smyrna, write, I know thy works, and tribulation, and poverty; and I know the blasphemy of them who say they are Jews," members of the church of Christ, "and are not, but are the synagogue of Satan." And again chap. iii. 9.

73. Seventhly. In conformity to this sentiment, (namely, that the believing Gentiles are taken into that church, covenant, and kingdom, out of which the unbelieving Jews were cast,) the state, membership, privileges, honours, and relations of professed Christians, particularly of believing Gentiles, are expressed by the same phrases with those of the ancient Jewish church; and, therefore, unless we admit a very strange abuse of words, must convey the same general ideas of our present state, membership, privileges, honours, and relations to God, as we are professed Christians. For instance,

74. I. As God chose his ancient people the Jews, and they were his chosen and elect, so now the whole body of Christians, Gentiles as well as Jews, are admitted to the same honour; as they are selected from the rest of the world, and taken into the kingdom of God, for the knowledge, worship, and obedience of God, in hopes of eternal life. Rom. viii. 33, "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?" &c. Eph. i. 4, "According as he hath chosen us," (Gentiles, chap. ii. 11,) "in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy, and without blame before him in love." Col. iii. 12, "Put on, therefore, (as the elect of God, holy and beloved,) bowels of mercies," &c. 2 Thess. ii. 13, "But we are bound to give thanks to God always for you, brethren, beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth." Tit. i. 1, "Paul, a servant of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ, according to the faith of God's elect, and the acknowledging of the truth which is after godliness." 2 Tim. ii. 10, "Therefore I endure all things for the elect's sake, that they also may obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus, with eternal glory." 1 Pet. i. 1, 2, "Peter to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, elect, according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience." ii. 9, "Ye (Gentiles) are a chosen generation," &c. v. 13, "The church that is at Babylon, *elect*d together with you, saluteth you."

75. II. The first step which the goodness of God took in execution of his purpose of election, with regard to the Gentile world, was to rescue them from their wretched situation in the sin and idolatry of their heathen state, (by sending his Son Jesus Christ into the world to die for mankind, and thus) to bring them into the light and privileges of the Gospel. With regard to which, the language of Scripture is, 1st. That he delivered, 2d. Saved, 3d. Bought or purchased, 4th. Redeemed them. i. 4, "Who gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us from this present evil world," the vices and lusts in which the world is involved. Col. i. 12, 13, "Giving thanks to the Father, who has delivered us from the power of (heathenish) darkness," (Acts xxvi. 18. 1 Pet. ii. 9. Eph. iv. 18. v. 8,) "and translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son." And thus, consequently, we are delivered from the wrath to come," 1 Thess. i. 10.

76. 1 Cor. i. 18, "For the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness, but unto us which are saved it is the power of God." vii. 16, "What knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? or how knowest thou, O man, whether thou shalt save thy wife?" that is, convert her to the Christian faith. x. 33, "Even as I please all men in all things, not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved." Eph. ii. 8, "For by grace are you saved through faith." 1 Thess. ii. 16, "The Jews forbid us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved." 1 Tim. ii. 4, "Who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." 2 Tim. i. 9, "Who hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace." In this general sense, saved is in other places applied to both Jews and Gentiles; particularly to the Jews. Rom. ix. 27. x. 1. xi. 26. Hence God is styled our Saviour. Tit. iii. 4, 5, "But after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour towards man appeared, not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us." 1 Tim. i. 1, "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the commandment of God our Saviour." ii. 3. Tit. i. 3. Rom. xi. 11, "Through their (the Jews) fall salvation is come to the Gentiles." And as this salvation is by Jesus Christ, he also is frequently called our Saviour.

77. Acts xx. 28, "Feed the church of God, which he has purchased with his own blood." 1 Cor. vi. 20, "And ye are not your own; for ye are bought with a price." vii. 23, "Ye are bought with a price." 2 Pet. ii. 1, "False prophets shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them." Rev. v. 9, "Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed (bought) us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation."

78. Tit. iii. 14, "Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity." 1 Pet. i. 18, "Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your vain (heathenish) conversation, redeemed by tradition from your fathers; but with the precious blood of Christ." And at the same time he redeemed or bought us from death, or the curse of the law. Gal. iii. 13. And the Jews, in particular, from the law, and the condemnation to which it subjected them. Gal. iv. 5. Hence frequent mention is made of the redemption, which is in Jesus Christ, Rom. iii. 24. 1 Cor. i. 30. Ephes. i. 7. Col. i. 14. Hebr. ix. 12, 15. Hence also Christ is said to give himself a ransom for us. Matt. xx. 28. Mark x. 45. 1 Tim. ii. 6, "Who gave himself a ransom for all."—That is, that he might redeem them unto God by the sacrificial shedding of his blood.

79. III. As God sent the Gospel to bring Gentiles, Christians, out of heathenism, and invited and made them welcome to the honours and privileges of his people, he is said to call them, and they are his called. Rom. i. 6, 7, "Among whom are ye also called of Jesus Christ." "To all that are at Rome called saints"—viii. 28. 1 Cor. i. 9, "God is faithful, by whom ye were called into the fellowship of his Son"—viii. 20. Gal. i. 6, "I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you"—v. 13. Ephes. iv. 1, "I beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called." iv. 4. 1 Thess. ii. 12, That "ye walk worthy of God, who hath called you unto his kingdom and glory"—iv. 7, "God hath not called us unto uncleanness, but unto holiness." 2 Tim. i. 9, "Who hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling; not according to our works." &c. 1 Pet. i. 15, "But as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation"—ii. 9, "Ye," Gentile Christians, "are a chosen generation,—to show forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light."

80. Note—The Jews also were called. Rom. ix. 24, "Even us, whom he has called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles." 1 Cor. i. 24. vii. 18, "Is any man called, being circumcised"—Hebr. ix. 15. But the calling of the Jews must be different from that of the Gentiles. The Gentiles were called into the kingdom of God as strangers and foreigners, who had never been in it before. But the Jews were then subjects of God's kingdom under the old form; and therefore could be called only to submit to it, as it was now modelled under the Messiah. Or they were called to repentance, to the faith, allegiance, and obedience of the Son of God, and to the hope of eternal life through him; whom rejecting, they were cast out of God's peculiar kingdom.

81. IV. And as we stand in the relation of children to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; hence it is that we are his brethren, and he is considered as the First-Born among us. Matt. xxviii. 10. John xx. 17, "Jesus saith, Go to my brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto my Father, and your Father, and to my God, and your God." Hebr. ii. 11, 17. Rom. viii. 29, "That he might be the first-born among many brethren."

82. V. And the relation of God, as a father, to us Christians, who are his children, will lead our thoughts to a clear idea of our being, as we are called, the house or family of God, or of Christ. 1 Tim. iii. 15, "But if I tarry long, that thou mayest know how to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the church of the living God." Heb. iii. 6, "But Christ, as a Son over his own house; whose house are we, (Christians,) if we hold fast the confidence and rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end." Hebr. x. 21, "And having a great high-priest over the house of God," &c. 1 Pet. ix. 17, "For the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God." (that is, when the Christian church shall undergo sharp trials and sufferings;) "and if it first begin at us"

Christians, who are the house or family of God, "what shall the end be of them that obey not the Gospel?" that is, of the infidel world, who lie out of the church. See Rom. i. 5. xv. 13. 1 Pet. i. 22. Eph. ii. 19, "We are of the household (domestics), of God." iii. 14, 15, "I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named," &c.

83. VI. Further; as the land of Canaan was the estate, or inheritance, belonging to the Jewish family, or house; so the heavenly country is given to the Christian house, or family, for their inheritance. Acts xx. 32, "And now, brethren, I commend you to God, and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified." Col. ii. 24, "Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance." Hebr. ix. 15, "He is the mediator of the New Testament, that they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance." 1 Pet. i. 4, "God has begotten us again—to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us." Hence we have the title of heirs. Titus iii. 7, "That being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life." James i. 5, "Hath not God chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom, which he has promised to them that love him?" See Rom. viii. 17. 1 Pet. iii. 7.

84. And as Canaan was considered as the rest of the Jews, so, in reference to our trials and afflictions in this world, heaven is considered as the rest of Christians. 2 Thess. i. 7, "And to you who are troubled, (he will give) rest with us when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven." Hebr. iv. 1, "Let us therefore fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it. For unto us hath the Gospel been preached, as well as to them;" that is, we have the joyful promise of entering into rest, as well as the Jews of old. Ver. 9, "There remains, therefore, a rest for the people of God;" that is, for Christians now in this world, as well as for the Jews formerly in the wilderness. Which is the point the apostle is proving from ver. 3 to 10.

85. VII. Thus Christians as well as the ancient Jews, are the house or family of God, or we may conceive the whole body of Christians formed into a nation, having God at their head; who, on this account, is styled our God, Governor, Protector, or King; and we his people, subjects, or servants.

86. VIII. And it is in reference to our being a society peculiarly appropriated to God, and under his special protection and government, that we are called the city of God, the holy city. Hebr. xii. 22, "Ye are come unto—the city of the living God." Rev. xi. 2, "And the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months." This city is described in some future happy state, Rev. 21st and 22d chapters.

87. Hence the whole Christian community or church is denoted by the city Jerusalem, and sometimes by Mount Zion. Gal. iv. 26, "But Jerusalem, which is above, is free, which is the mother of us all." In her reformed or future happy state, she is the New Jerusalem. Rev. iii. 12. xxi. 2. Hebr. xii. 22, "Ye are come unto Mount Zion," &c. Rev. xiv. 1.

88. Hence also we are said to be written, or enrolled in the Book of God, or which comes to the same thing, of the Lamb, the Son of God. Rev. iii. 5, "He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment; and I will not blot out his name out of the Book of Life." xxii. 19, "And if any man take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the Book of Life, and out of the holy city," &c. which shows, that the names of such as are in the Book of Life may be blotted out; consequently, that to be enrolled there, is the privilege of all professed Christians.

89. And whereas the believing Gentiles were once strangers, aliens, not a people, enemies; "now" (Eph. ii. 19.) "they are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints." 1 Pet. ii. 10, "Which in time past were not a people, but are now the people of God." Now we are at peace with God, Rom. v. 1. Now we are reconciled and become the servants of God, the subjects of his kingdom, Rom. v. 10. 1 Thess. i. 9. 2 Cor. v. 18, 19.*

90. On the other hand; the body of the Jewish nation, (having through unbelief rejected the Messiah, and the Gospel: and being, therefore, cast out of the city and kingdom of God,) are in their turn, at present, represented under the name and notion of enemies; Rom. xi. 28, "As concerning the Gospel they are enemies for your sake."

91. IX. The kind and particular regards of God to the converted Gentiles, and their relation to Jesus Christ, is also signified by that of a husband and wife: and his taking them into his covenant, is represented by his espousing them. 2 Cor. xi. 2, "For I am jealous over you with godly jealousy; for I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ."

92. Hence the Christian church, or community, is represented as a mother, and particular members as her children. Gal. iv. 26, "But Jerusalem, which is above, is free, which is the Mother of us all." Ver. 27, "For it is written, Rejoice, thou barren that bearest not: break forth and cry, thou that travailest not; for the desolate hath many more children than she which hath a husband." Ver. 28, "Now we, brethren, as Israel was, are the children of promise." Ver. 31, "So then, brethren, we are not children of the bond-woman, but of the free."

* That is, every true penitent, who by faith embraces the Lord Jesus in his sacrificial death, as a sufficient atonement for his sin, is freely justified from all things, from which he could not be justified by the law of Moses: and thus, being justified by faith, he is reconciled to God by the death of his Son, and has peace with God, the Spirit witnessing with his spirit that he is a child of God: being now really adopted into the heavenly family.

Of the Honours and Privileges of Christians.

93. Hence also, from the notion of the Christian church being the spouse of God in Christ, her corruption and her idolatry come under the name of fornication and adultery.

94. X. As God, by Christ, exercises a particular providence over the Christian church, in supplying them with all spiritual blessings, guiding them through all difficulties, and guarding them in all spiritual dangers; He is their Shepherd, and they his flock, his sheep. John x. 11, "I am the good shepherd." Ver. 16, "and other sheep I have, which are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one flock and one shepherd." Acts xx. 28, 29. Heb. xiii. 20. 1 Pet. ii. 25, "For ye were as sheep going astray; but are now returned to the Shepherd and Bishop; (Overseer,) of your souls"—v. 2, 3, 4, "Feed the flock of God," &c.

95. XI. Nearly on the same account, as God, by Christ, has established the Christian church, and provided all means for our happiness and improvement in knowledge and virtue, we are compared to a vine, and a vineyard, and God to the husbandman, who planted and dresses it; and particular members of the community are compared to branches. John xv. 1, 2, "I am the true vine, and my Father is the husbandman. Every branch in me that beareth not fruit, he taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit he purgeth it," &c. Ver. 5, "I am the vine, ye are the branches." Matt. xv. 13, "Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up." Rom. vi. 5, "If we have been planted together in the likeness of his death; we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection." Matt. xx. 1, The vineyard into which labourers were hired is the Christian as well as the Jewish church: and so chap. xxi. 33. Mark xii. 1. Luke xx. 9. 1 Cor. iii. 9, "Ye are God's husbandry." Rom. xi. 17, "And if some of the branches, (Jews), be broken off, and thou being a wild olive tree, wert grafted in among them, and with them partakest of the root and fatness of the olive-tree," &c.—See also ver. 24.

96. XII. As Christians are, by the will of God, set apart and appropriated in a special manner to his honour, service, and obedience, and furnished with extraordinary means and motives to holiness, so they are said to be sanctified. 1 Cor. i. 2, "Unto the church of God, which is at Corinth, to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus." vi. 11, "And such were some of you: but ye are washed; but ye are sanctified; but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God." Heb. ii. 11, "For both he that sanctifieth, and they who are sanctified, are all of one," x. 9.

97. XIII. Further; by the presence of God in the Christian church, and our being by profession consecrated to him, we, as well as the ancient Jews, are made his house, or temple, which God has built, and in which he dwells, or walks. 1 Pet. ii. 5, "Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house," &c. 1 Cor. iii. 9, "Ye are God's building." Ver. 16, 17, "Know ye not that ye, (Christians), are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you; if any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy: for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are." 2 Cor. vi. 16, "And what agreement hath the temple of God (the Christian church,) with idols? For ye are the temple of the living God: as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them." Eph. ii. 20, 21, 22, "And are built upon the foundation of the apostles," &c. Christ Jesus being the chief corner-stone: in whom all the building fitly framed together, groweth into a holy temple in the Lord; in whom ye also are builded together, for a habitation of God through the Spirit." 2 Thess. ii. 4, "So that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, SHOWING HIMSELF that he is God."

98. XIV. And not only does God, as our King, dwell in the Christian church, as in his house or temple; but he has also conferred on Christians the honours of kings; as he has redeemed us from the servitude of sin, made us lords of ourselves, and raised us above others, to sit on thrones, and to judge and reign over them. And he hath made us priests too, as we are peculiarly consecrated to God, and obliged to attend upon him from time to time continually, in the solemn offices of religion, which he has appointed. 1 Pet. ii. 4, "Ye also as lively stones are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood." Ver. 9, "But ye (Gentile Christians), are a chosen generation, a royal (or kingly) priesthood." Rev. i. 5, 6, "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father," &c.

99. XV. Thus the whole body of the Christian church is separated unto God from the rest of the world. And, whereas before, the Gentile believers were afar off, lying out of the commonwealth of Israel; now, they are nigh, as they are joined to God in covenant, have full access to him in the ordinances of worship; and in virtue of his promise, a particular title to his regards and blessing. 2 Cor. vi. 17, "Wherefore come out from among them, and be separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you." Eph. ii. 13, "But now in Christ Jesus ye, who sometimes were afar off, are made nigh, by the blood of Christ."

100. XVI. And as God, in all these respects, has distinguished the Christian church, and sequestered them unto himself, they are styled his peculiar people. Tit. ii. 14, "Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." 1 Pet. ii. 9, "But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people," &c.

101. XVII. As Christians are a body of men, particularly related to God, instructed by him in the rules of wisdom, devoted to his service, and employed in his true worship; they are called his church or congregation. Acts xx. 28, "Feed the church of God." 1 Cor. x. 32, "Giving none offence to the church of God." xv. 9. Gal. i. 13. and elsewhere. Eph. i. 22, "Head over all things to the church:"—and particular societies are churches. Rom. xvi. 16, "The churches of Christ salute you"—and so in several other places.

Observations on the foregoing Privileges of the Christian Church.

102. XVII. For the same reason, they are considered as God's possession, or heritage. 1 Pet. v. 3, "Neither as being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock." The reader cannot well avoid observing, that the words and phrases, by which our Christian privileges are expressed in the New Testament, are the very same with the words and phrases by which the privileges of the Jewish church are expressed in the Old Testament: which makes good what St. Paul says concerning the language in which the apostles "declared the things that are freely given to us of God." 1 Cor. ii. 12, 13, "We," apostles, "have received, not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God, that we might know the things that are given to us of God:" namely, the fore-recited privileges and blessings. "Which things we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth," not in philosophic terms of human invention, "but which the Holy Spirit teacheth" in the writings of the Old Testament, the only Scriptures from which they took their ideas and arguments, "comparing spiritual things," under the Gospel.

Whence we may conclude;—1. That the Holy Scriptures are admirably calculated to be understood in those things which we are most of all concerned to understand. Seeing the same language runs through the whole, and is set in such a variety of lights, that one part is well adapted to illustrate another. An advantage I reckon peculiar to the Sacred Writings above all others.—2. It follows, that to understand the sense of the Spirit in the New, it is essentially necessary that we understand its sense in the Old Testament.*

From what has been said it appears—

103. I. That the believing Gentiles are taken into that kingdom and covenant in which the Jews once stood, and out of which they were cast for their unbelief and rejection of the Son of God; and that we Christians ought to have the same general ideas of our present religious state, membership, privileges, honours, and relations to God, as the Jews had, while they were in possession of the kingdom. Only in some things the kingdom of God, under the Gospel dispensation, differs much from the kingdom of God under the Mosaic—As, 1. For, that it is now so constituted, that it admits, and is adapted to, men of all nations upon the earth, who believe in Christ.—2. That the law, as a ministration of condemnation, which was an appendage to the Jewish dispensation, is removed and annulled under the Gospel, [but the moral law, as a rule of life, is still in force].—3. And so is the polity, or civil state of the Jews, which was interwoven with their religion; but has no connexion with the Christian religion.—4. The ceremonial part of the Jewish constitution is likewise abolished, for we are taught the spirit and duties of religion, not by figures and symbols, as sacrifices, offerings, washings, &c. but by express and clear precepts.—5. The kingdom of God is now put under the special government of the Son of God, who is the Head and King of the church, to whom we owe faith and allegiance.†

104. II. From the above-recited particulars, it appears that the Christian church is happy, and highly honoured with privileges of the most excellent nature; of which the apostles, who well understood this new constitution, were deeply sensible. Rom. i. 16, "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believes." v. 1, 2, 3, &c.—"Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ; by whom also we have access, by faith, into this grace wherein we stand, and rejoice [glory] in hope of the glory of God. And not only so, but we glory in tribulation also," &c. Ver. 11, "And not only so, but we also joy [glory] in God through our Lord Jesus Christ," &c. chap. viii. 31, &c. "What shall we then say to these things? if God be for us, who can be against us? He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how should he not, with him, also freely give us all things? Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? who is he that condemneth? Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" Chap. ix. 23, 24, "He has made known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had afore prepared unto glory, even on us whom he has called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles." 2 Cor. iii. 18, "But we all, with open face, beholding, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, are changed in the same image from glory to glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord." Eph. i. 3, 4, &c. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ, according as he has chosen us in him," &c. &c.

105. And it is the duty of the whole body of Christians to rejoice in the goodness of God, to thank and praise him for all the benefits conferred upon them in the Gospel. Rom. xv. 10, "Rejoice, ye Gentiles, with his people." Phil. iii. 1, "My brethren, rejoice in the Lord." iv. 4, "Rejoice in the Lord alway; again I say, rejoice." 1 Thess. v. 16, "Rejoice evermore." James i. 9. 1 Pet. i. 6. 8. Col. i. 12, "Giving thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light." ii. 7, "Rooted and built up in him, and established in the faith, abounding therein with thanksgiving." 1 Thess. v. 18. Heb. xiii. 15. "By him, therefore, let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips, giving thanks to his name." Eph. i. 6, "To the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he has made us accepted in the Beloved." Ver. 12, 14.

106. Further, it is to be observed, that all the foregoing privileges, benefits, relations, and honours, belong to all professed Christians without exception. God is the God, King, Saviour,

* The not attending to this has been the cause of errors and false doctrines of the most dangerous nature and tendency.—A. C.
† Add to this, that all the privileges under the Gospel are abundantly more spiritual than they were under the law—THAT being the shadow, THIS the substance. Hence, while we consider these privileges 'as same in kind, we must view them as differing widely in degree. A. C.

Observations on the foregoing Privileges of the Christian Church.

Father, Husband, Shepherd, &c. to them all. He created, saved, bought, redeemed, he begot, he made, he planted, &c. them all. And they are all as created, redeemed, and begotten, by him; his people, nation, heritage: his children, spouse, flock, vineyard, &c. We are all enriched with the blessings of the Gospel. Rom. xi. 12, 13, 14. all reconciled to God. Ver. 15, all "the seed of Abraham, and heirs according to the promise;" Gal. iii. 29. all partake of the "root and fatness of the good olive," the Jewish Church; all the brethren of Christ, and members of his body; all are under grace, all have a right to the ordinances of worship; all are golden candlesticks in the temple of God, Rev. i. 12, 13, 20; even those who by reason of their misimprovement of their privileges, are threatened with having the candlestick removed out of its place, ii. 5; either every professed Christian is not in the church, or all the fore-mentioned privileges belong to every professed Christian;^{*} which will appear more evidently if we consider,

107. III. That all the afore-mentioned privileges, honours, and advantages, are the effects of God's free grace, without regard to any prior righteousness, which deserved or procured the donation of them. It was not for any goodness or worthiness which God found in the heathen world, when the gospel was first preached to them; not for any works of obedience or righteousness which we, in our Gentile state, had performed; whereby we had rendered ourselves deserving of the blessings of the Gospel, namely, to be taken into the family, kingdom, or church of God; by no means. It was not thus of ourselves that we are saved, justified, &c. So far from that, that the Gospel, when first preached to us, Gentiles, found us sinners, dead in trespasses and sins, enemies through wicked works, disobedient; therefore, I say, all the forementioned privileges, blessings, honours, &c. are the effects of God's free grace or favour, without regard to any prior works, or righteousness in the Gentile world, which procured the donation of them. Accordingly, they are always in Scripture assigned to the love, grace, and mercy of God, as the sole spring from whence they flow. John iii. 16, "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Rom. v. 8, "But God commendeth his love to us, in that while we were sinners, Christ died for us." Eph. ii. 4—9, 10, "But God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love, wherewith he has loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ," (by grace ye are saved) "and hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus. That in ages to come he might show the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness towards us, through Jesus Christ. For by grace are ye saved, through faith, and that" (salvation is) "not of yourselves, it is the gift of God; not of works, so that no man," (nor Gentile nor Jew) "can boast. For we" (Christians converted from heathenism) "are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them."

108. It is on account of this general love that Christians are honoured with the title of beloved.—Rom. i. 7, "To all that are in Rome, beloved of God, called saints." ix. 25, "I will call her," (the Gentile church,) "beloved, which was not beloved." Coloss. iii. 12, "Put on, therefore, as the elect of God, holy, and beloved, bowels of mercies," &c.

109. Rom. iii. 23, 24, "For all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God; being justified freely by his grace, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus." v. ii. 1 Cor. i. 4, "I thank my God for the grace of God, which is given you by Jesus Christ." Eph. i. 6, 7, "To the praise of the glory of his grace, whereby he has made us accepted in the Beloved, in whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace." Col. i. 6. 2 Thess. i. 12. 2 Tim. i. 9, "Who hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Jesus Christ, before the world began." Tit. ii. 11. Heb. xii. 15. Hence, grace, and the grace of God, are sometimes put for the whole Gospel, and all its blessings, as Acts xiii. 43, "Paul and Barnabas persuaded them to continue in the grace of God." 2 Cor. vi. 1. 1 Pet. v. 12, "Testify that this is the true grace of God in which we stand." 1 Cor. i. 4. Rom. v. 2. 2 Cor. vi. 1. Tit. ii. 11. Jude 4. Rom. xii. 1, "I beseech you, therefore, brethren, for the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies," &c. xv. 9, "And that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy." 1 Pet. i. 3, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again to a lively hope," &c.

110. In these texts, and others of the same kind, it is evident that the love, grace, and mercy of God, hath respect not to particular persons in the Christian church, but to the whole body or whole societies; and therefore are to be understood of that general love, grace, and mercy, whereby the whole body of Christians is separated unto God, to be his peculiar people, favoured with extraordinary blessings. And it is with regard to this sentiment and mode of speech, that the Gentiles, who before lay out of the church, and had not obtained mercy, are said now to have obtained mercy.—Rom. xi. 30.

* A professed Christian should be a real practical Christian: God provides no privileges for professors of Christianity, as distinguished from genuine Christians. All the above enumerated blessings and privileges belong to Christians; but a Christian is one who has the spirit of Christ, and lives according to his Gospel. Let no man, therefore, suppose, because he professes Christianity, and is enrolled with some Christian church or society, that he is therefore a child of God, &c.: he must be born of the Spirit, before he can be thus considered; or have any just title to the kingdom of heaven. A. C.

† Ἄρα μὴ τὴν χάριν ὑμῶν, ἧς ἕνεκα ἐσώθητε, ἐπαινεῖτε ἑαυτοὺς; lest any man should boast; so we render it; as if the Gospel salvation were appointed to be a work of works, to prevent our boasting: which supposes we might have boasted, had not God taken this method to preclude it.—Whereas, in truth, we had nothing to boast of. Neither Jew nor Gentile could pretend to any prior righteousness, which might make them worthy to be taken into the house and kingdom of God under his Son; therefore the apostle's meaning is, "We are not saved from heathenism, and translated into the church and kingdom of Christ, for any prior goodness, obedience, or righteousness we had performed. For which reason, no man can boast, as if he had merited the blessing," &c. This is the apostle's sense; and the place should have been translated, so that no man can boast; For ἡ signifies so that. See Rom. iii. 19. 1 Cor. vii. 29. 2 Cor. i. 17 vii. 9. Gal. v. 17. Heb. ii. 17. vi. 16. Mark iv. 11.

All the Blessings of the Gospel are by and through Christ Jesus.

111. Hence also we may conclude that all the privileges and blessings of the Gospel, even the whole of our redemption and salvation, are the effect of God's pure, free, original love and grace, to which he was inclined of his own motion, without any other motive, besides his own goodness, in mere kindness and good will to a sinful, perishing world. These are "the things that are freely given to us of God," 1 Cor. ii. 12.

¶ VIII. All the Grace of the Gospel is dispensed to us, by, in, or through Christ Jesus.

112. Nevertheless, all the forementioned love, grace, and mercy, is dispensed, or conveyed to us in, by, or through the Son of God, Jesus Christ, our Lord. To quote all the places to this purpose, would be to transcribe a great part of the New Testament. But it may suffice, at present, to review the texts under the numbers 107 and 109. From which texts it is evident, that "the grace" or favour "of God is given unto us by Jesus Christ: that he has shown the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness to us, THROUGH Jesus Christ;" that "he has sent his Son into the world, that we might live THROUGH him; to be the propitiation" (or mercy seat) "for our sins:" "that he died for us; that we who were afar off, are made nigh by his blood:" that "God has made us accepted IN the Beloved," (in his beloved Son,) "IN whom we have redemption THROUGH his blood, the forgiveness of sins:" "that we are his workmanship, created IN Christ Jesus:" that "before the world began, the purpose and grace of God," relating to our calling and salvation, "was given us IN Christ Jesus: before the foundation of the world, God chose us IN Christ," Eph. i. 4. "We have peace with God THROUGH our Lord Jesus Christ, BY whom also we have access into this grace wherein we stand," Rom. v. 1, 2. "God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is IN his Son," 1 John v. 11. Nothing is clearer from the whole current of Scripture, than that all the mercy and love of God, and all the blessings of the Gospel, from first to last, from the original purpose and grace of God, to our final salvation in the possession of eternal life, is IN, BY, or THROUGH Christ; and particularly BY HIS BLOOD, "by the redemption which is in him," as "he is the propitiation," or atonement, "for the sins of the whole world," 1 John ii. 2. This can bear no dispute among Christians. The only difference that can be must relate to the manner, how these blessings are conveyed to us, in, by, or through CHRIST. Doubtless they are conveyed through his hands, as he is the Minister or Agent appointed of God to put us in possession of them. But his blood, death, cross, could be no ministering cause of blessings assigned to his blood, &c. before we were put in possession of them.—See Rom. v. 6, 8, 10, 19. Eph. ii. 13, 16. Col. i. 20, 21, 22. Nor truly can his blood be possibly considered as a ministering or instrumental cause in any sense at all; for it is not an agent, but an object, and, therefore, though it may be a moving cause, or a reason for bestowing blessings, yet it can be no active or instrumental cause in conferring them. His blood and death is indeed to us an assurance of pardon; but it is evidently something more; for it is also considered as an offering and sacrifice to God, highly pleasing to him, to put away our sin, and to obtain eternal redemption. Heb. ix. 12, 14, 26. Eph. v. 2.

113. But why should God choose to communicate his grace in this mediate way, by the interposition, obedience and agency of his Son, who again employs subordinate agents and instruments under him? I answer; for the display of the glory of his nature and perfections. The sovereign Disposer of all things may communicate his blessings by what means, and in any way, he thinks fit. But whatever He effects by the interposition of means, and a train of intermediate causes, He could produce by his own immediate power. He wants not clouds to distil rain; nor rain nor human industry to make the earth fruitful; nor the fruitfulness of the earth to supply food; nor food to sustain our life. He could do this by his own immediate power: but He chooses to manifest his providence, power, wisdom, and goodness, in a variety of ways and dispositions, and yet his power and goodness are not only as much concerned and exercised in this way, as if he produced the end without the intervention of means; but even much more, because his power, wisdom, and goodness, are as much exerted and illustrated in every single intermediate step, as if he had done the thing at once, without any intermediate step at all. There is as much power and wisdom exercised in producing rain, or in making the earth fruitful, or in adapting food to the nourishment of our bodies; I say there is as much power in any one of these steps, as there would be in nourishing our bodies by one immediate act without those intermediate means. Therefore in this method of procedure, the displays of the Divine Providence and perfections are multiplied and beautifully diversified, to arrest our attention, exercise our contemplation, and excite our admiration and thankfulness; for thus we see God, in a surprising variety of instances. Nor, indeed, can we turn our eyes to any part of the visible creation, but we see His power, wisdom, and goodness in perpetual exercise, every where. In like manner, in the moral world, he chooses to work by means, the mediation of his Son, the influence of his Spirit, the teachings of his word, the endeavours of apostles and ministers; not to supply any defects of his power, wisdom, or goodness; but to multiply the instances of them; to show himself to us in a various display of his glorious dispensations; to exercise the moral powers and virtues of all the subordinate agents employed in carrying on his great designs, and to set before our thoughts the most engaging subjects of meditation, and the most powerful motives of action. And this method, in the moral world, is still more necessary; because, without the attention of our minds, the end proposed, our sanctification, cannot be obtained.*

* This is beautiful on the whole, and gives a fine display of the wisdom and goodness of God:—But it certainly was not merely to display the various operations of Divine Providence, and to multiply the displays of the Divine perfections, that God

All the Blessings of the Gospel are by and through Christ Jesus.

114. But how is it agreeable to the infinite distance there is between the Most High God, and creatures so low and imperfect, who are of no consideration when compared to the immensity of his nature, that he should so greatly concern himself about our redemption? Answer—He who is all-present, all-knowing, all-powerful, attends to all the minutest affairs, in the whole universe, without the least confusion or difficulty. And if it was not below his infinite greatness to make mankind, it cannot be so to take care of them, when created. For kind, he can produce no beings more excellent than the rational and intelligent; consequently, those must be most worthy of his regard. And when they are corrupted, as thereby the end of their being is frustrated, it must be as agreeable to his greatness to endeavour, (when he sees fit,) their reformation, or to restore them to the true ends for which they were created, as it was originally to create them.

115. And as for mankind being a mean and inconsiderable part of the creation, it may not be so easy to demonstrate as we imagine. The sin that is, or hath been, in the world, will not do it: for then the beings, which we know stand in a much higher, and, perhaps, in a very high rank of natural perfection, will be proved to be as mean and inconsiderable as ourselves; seeing they in great numbers have sinned. Neither will our natural weakness and imperfection prove, that we are a mean and inconsiderable part of God's creation: for the Son of God, when clothed in our flesh, and encompassed with all our infirmities and temptations, lost nothing of the real excellency and worth he possessed, when in a state of glory with the Father, before the world was. Still he was the beloved Son of God, in whom he was well pleased. Besides, since God may bestow honours and privileges, as he pleases; who will tell me, what pre-eminence, in the purpose of God, this world may possibly have, above any other part of the universe? Or what relation it bears to the rest of the creation? We know that even angels have been ministering spirits to some part, at least, of mankind. Who will determine how far the scheme of redemption may exceed any scheme of Divine wisdom, in other parts of the universe? Or how far it may affect the improvement and happiness of other beings, in the remotest regions. Eph. iii. 10, "To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places, might be known by the church, the manifold wisdom of God, according to the eternal purpose, which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord." 1 Pet. i. 12, "Which things that are reported by them that have preached the Gospel, the angels desire to look into." It is therefore the sense of Revelation, that the heavenly principalities and powers study the wisdom and grace of redemption; and even increase their stock of wisdom from the displays of the Divine love in the Gospel. Who can say how much our virtue is, more or less, severely proved, than in other worlds? Or, how far our virtue may excel that of other beings, who are not subjected to our long and heavy trials; may not a virtue, firm and steady under our present clogs, inconveniencies, discouragements, persecutions, trials, and temptations, possibly surpass the virtue of the highest angel, whose state is not attended with such embarrassments? Do we know how far such, as shall have honourably passed through the trials of this life, shall hereafter be dispersed through the creation? How much their capacities will be enlarged? How highly they shall be exalted? What power and trusts will be put in their hands? How far their influence shall extend, and how much they shall contribute to the good order and happiness of the universe? Possibly, the faithful soul, when disengaged from her present incumbrances, may blaze out into a degree of excellency equal to the highest honours, the most important and extensive services. Our Lord has made us kings and priests unto God and the Father, and we shall sit together in "heavenly places," and reign with him. "To him that overcomes" the trials of this present state, he will give "to sit with him in his throne." True, many from among mankind shall perish among the vile and worthless for ever: and so shall many of the angels. These considerations may satisfy us, that possibly mankind are not so despicable as to be below the interposition of the Son of God. Rather the surprising condescensions and sufferings of a Being so glorious, should be an argument that the scheme of redemption is of the utmost importance: and that, in the estimate of God, who alone confers dignity, we are creatures of very great consequence. Lastly, God by Christ created the world; and if it was not below his dignity to create, it is much less below his dignity to redeem the world; which, of the two, is the more honourable.

116. It is further to be observed; that the whole scheme of the Gospel in Christ, and as it stands in relation to his blood, or obedience unto death, was formed in the council of God before the calling of Abraham, and even before the beginning of the world. Acts xv. 18, "Known unto God are all his works," (the dispensations which he intended to advance,) "from the beginning of the world." Eph. i. 4, "According as he hath chosen us in him," (Christ,) "before the foundation of the world." (απο καταβολης κοσμου.) 2 Tim. i. 9, "Who hath saved us and called us—according to his own purpose and grace which was given us in Christ Jesus, before the world began." 1 Pet. i. 20, "Who," (Christ,) "verily was fore-ordained before the foundation of the world, (απο καταβολης κοσμου,) but was manifest in these last times for you," (Gentiles.) Hence, it appears, that the whole plan of the Divine mercy in the Gospel, in relation to the method of communicating it, and the Person, through whose obedience it was to be dispensed, and by whose ministry it was to be executed, was formed, in the mind and purpose of God, before this earth was created. God, by his perfect and unerring knowledge, foreknew the future state of mankind; and so, before-appointed the means which he judged proper for their recovery; which foreknowrequired the sacrifice and death of his Son; as he was a sacrifice for sin; and the true notion of sacrifice is redeeming the life of a guilty creature, by the death of one that is innocent; therefore Christ died, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God. 1 Pet. iii. 18. Consequently the justice and righteousness of God required this sacrifice; and justice must have required it; else such a sacrifice could not have taken place; for had not justice required it, no attribute of God could, without injustice, have demanded it.

ledge is fully confirmed by the promise to Abraham, and very copiously by the repeated predictions of the prophets in relation to our Lord's work, and particularly to his death, with the end and design of it.

117. Again; it is to be noted, that all the forementioned MERCY and LOVE, privileges and blessings, are granted and confirmed to the Christian church, under the sanction of a covenant; which is a grant or donation of blessings confirmed by a proper authority. The Gospel covenant is established by the promise and oath of God, and ratified by the blood of Christ, as a pledge and assurance, that it is a reality, and will certainly be made good. Matt. xxvi. 28, "This is my blood in the New Testament" or COVENANT. Luke xxii. 26, "This cup is the New Testament," (covenant,) "in my blood." 2 Cor. iii. 6, "Made us able ministers of the New Testament," (covenant,) Heb. vii. 22, "Jesus made a surety of a better Testament." Heb. viii. 6, "He is the Mediator of a better covenant, established upon better promises"—viii. 8. ix. 15. xii. 24. xiii. 20.—Here observe, 1. Jesus is the Surety, (Ἐγγυς,) Sponsor, and Mediator, (Μεσσηνός,) of the New Covenant, as he is the great Agent appointed of God to negotiate, transact, secure, and execute all the blessings which are conferred by this covenant. Obs. 2. That as the covenant is a donation, or grant of blessing, hence it is, that the promise, or promiser, is sometimes put for the covenant; as Gal. iii. 17, "The covenant that was confirmed before," to Abraham "of God in Christ, the law, which was 430 years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect: for if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise. But God gave it to Abraham by promise;" and so ver. 19: again, ver. 21, "Is the law then against the promises of God." Ver. 22.—Obs. 3. That the Gospel covenant was included in that made with Abraham, Gen. xvii. 1, &c. xxii. 16, 17, 18. As appears from Gal. iii. 17. and from Heb. vi. 13, "When God made the promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no greater, he swore by himself," &c. Ver. 17, "He confirmed" (μωρρωσεν, he mediator'd) "it by an OATH: that by two immutable things," the promise and oath of God, "we" (Christians,) "might have strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before us."

118. But what should carefully and specially be observed is this, that the Gospel constitution is a scheme, and the most perfect and effectual scheme, for restoring true religion, and for promoting virtue and happiness, that the world has ever yet seen. Upon faith in Christ, men of all nations were admitted into the church, family, kingdom, and covenant of God, by baptism; were all numbered among the justified, regenerate or born again, sanctified, saved, chosen, called, saints, and beloved; were all of the flock, church, house, vine and vineyard of God; and were entitled to the ordinances and privileges of the church; had "exceeding great and precious promises" given unto them, especially that of entering into the rest of heaven. And in all these blessings and honours, we are certainly very happy, as they are "the things which are freely given to us of God." 1 Cor. ii. 12. But because these things are freely given, without respect to any obedience or righteousness of ours, prior to the donation of them; is our obedience and personal righteousness, therefore, unnecessary? Or are we, on account of benefits already received, secure of the favour and blessing of God, in a future world, and for ever? By no means.

117. To explain this important point more clearly, I shall proceed as before, and show that these privileges and blessings, given in general to the Christian church, are ANTECEDENT blessings; given indeed freely, without any respect to the prior obedience of the Gentile world, before they were taken into the church; but intended to be motives to the most upright obedience for the future, after they were joined to the family and kingdom of God. Which effect, if they produce, then our election, and calling, our redemption, adoption, &c. are made good: upon which account I shall call them CONSEQUENT blessings; because they are secured to us, and made ours for ever, only in consequence of our obedience. But, on the other hand, if the antecedent blessings do not produce obedience to the will of God; if we his chosen people and children do not obey the laws and rules of the Gospel, then we, as well as any other wicked persons, may expect tribulation and wrath; then we forfeit all our privileges, and all our honours and relations to God; all the favour and promises given freely to us are of no avail; we "receive the grace of God in vain," and everlasting death will certainly be our wretched portion.

118. That this is the great end of the dispensation of God's grace to the Christian church—namely, to engage us to duty and obedience; and that it is a scheme for promoting virtue and true religion, is clear from every part of the New Testament, and requires a large and particular proof: not because the thing in itself is difficult or intricate; but because it is of great importance to the right understanding of the Gospel, and the apostolic writings; and serves to explain several points which stand in close relation to it. As particularly; that all the fore-mentioned privileges belong to all professed Christians, even to those that shall perish eternally.* For—

1. If the apostles affirm them of all Christians to whom they write:
2. If they declare some of those Christians, who were favoured with those privileges, to be wicked, or suppose they might be wicked:
3. If they declare those privileges are conferred by mere grace, without regard to prior works of righteousness:
4. If they plainly intimate, those privileges are conferred in order to produce true holiness:

*Yes: all that hear the Gospel and profess to believe it, are called to this state of salvation, to be justified, born again, saved, sanctified, &c. &c. and shall in the great day be treated as having received these blessings: for what a man may have under the Gospel, and refuses to receive, or having received it, makes shipwreck of faith and a good conscience, he shall give account of at the judgment-seat: and therefore it may be justly said, that "all these privileges belong to professed Christians, even to those that shall perish everlastingly." See the note on p. 21. and for a vindication of what is here borrowed from Dr. Taylor, see the concluding observations at the end of the Epistle to the Galatians—A. C.

5. If they exhort all to use them to that purpose, as they will answer it to God at the last day :
6. If they declare they shall perish, if they do not improve them to the purifying their hearts and the right ordering of their conversation ; then it must be true that these privileges belong to all Christians, and are intended to induce them to a holy life. And the truth of all those six particulars will sufficiently appear, if we attend to the Gospels and Epistles.

119. Though, in the foregoing collection, I have faithfully and impartially endeavoured to give the true sense of every text : yet possibly, in some few, that are doubtful, I may have erred. But there are so many indisputably plain and full to the purpose, as will, I am persuaded, sufficiently justify the following conclusions :—

120. I. That the Gospel is a scheme for restoring true religion, and for promoting virtue and happiness.

121. II. That election, adoption, vocation, salvation, justification, sanctification, regeneration, and the other blessings, honours, and privileges, which come under the head of ANTECEDENT blessings, do, IN A SENSE, belong at present, to all Christians, even those who, for their wickedness, may perish eternally.

122. III. That those antecedent blessings, as they are offered and assigned to the whole body of Christians, do not import an absolute final state of favour and happiness : but are to be considered as displays, instances, and descriptions of God's love and goodness to us : which are to operate as a moral mean upon our hearts. They are a display of the love of God, who is the FATHER of the Universe, who cannot but delight in the well-being of his creatures ; and being perfect in goodness, possessed of all power, and the only original of all life and happiness, must be the prime Author of all blessedness ; and bestow his favours in the most free, generous, and disinterested manner. And, therefore, those blessings, as freely bestowed, antecedently to our obedience, are perfectly consonant to the nature and moral character of God. He has freely, in our first birth and creation, given us a distinguished and eminent degree of being, and all the noble powers and advantage of reason : and what should stop the course of his liberality, or hinder his conferring new and higher blessings, even when we could pretend no title or claim to them ? And as the blessings of the Gospel are of the most noble kind, raising us to high dignity, and the most delightful prospects of immortality ; they are well adapted to engage the attention of men, to give the most pleasing ideas of God, to demonstrate most clearly, what nature itself discovers, that he is our FATHER, and to win and engage our hearts to him in love, who has, in a manner so surprising, loved us. By promising the remission of sins, protection and guidance through this world, and hope of eternal life, every cloud, discouragement, and obstacle, is removed : and the grace of God, in its brightest glory, shines full upon our minds, and is divinely powerful to support our patience, and animate our obedience under temptations, trials, and difficulties ; and to inspire peace of conscience, comfort, and joy.

123. IV. These principles ought to be admitted and claimed by all Christians, and firmly established in their hearts ; as containing privileges and blessings in which they are all undoubtedly interested. Otherwise it is evident, they will be defective in the true principles of their religion, the only ground of their Christian joy and peace, and the proper motives of their Christian obedience. Now those principles, (namely, our election, vocation, justification, regeneration, sanctification, &c. in Christ, through the free grace of God,) are admitted, and duly established in our hearts, by FAITH. Faith then, as exercised upon the blessings which God has gratuitously bestowed upon us, is in our hearts, the foundation of the Christian life : and retaining and exercising this Christian virtue of Faith, is called "tasting that the Lord is gracious," 1 Pet. ii. 3, "having;"* or, holding fast "grace," Heb. xii. 28 ; "growing in grace," 2 Pet. iii. 18. "being strong in the grace of Jesus Christ," 2 Tim. ii. 1 ; "holding faith," 1 Tim. i. 19. iii. 9 ; "continuing in the faith grounded and settled, and not being moved away from the hope of the Gospel," Col. i. 23 ; "holding fast the confidence and rejoicing of hope," Heb. iii. 6. "holding the beginning of our confidence steadfast," Heb. iii. 14 ; "having" (holding) "hope," 1 John iii. 3 ; hoping perfectly "for the grace that is to be brought unto us at the revelation of Jesus Christ," 1 Pet. i. 13 ; "giving earnest heed to the things we have heard," Heb. ii. 1 ; "having" (holding) "the Son," or Christ, 1 John v. 12. By these and such like phrases, the apostles express our being thoroughly persuaded of, and duly affected with, the blessings included in our election, vocation, justification, &c. Or, their being firmly established in our hearts as principles of obedience, to secure our perseverance and final happiness ; through the mighty working of God's power, to purify our hearts, and to guard us through all our spiritual dangers and conflicts ; which power will always assuredly attend every one who holds faith, grace, and hope, 1 Pet. i. 5. Here note ; that the primary object of faith is not in ourselves, but in God. Not our own obedience or goodness, but the free grace of God, is the primary object of faith. But the fruit of faith must be in ourselves. The grace or free gift of God is the foundation of faith ; and faith is the foundation of the whole life of a true Christian. 2 Pet. i. 5, 6, 7, "Giving all diligence, add to your FAITH virtue," &c. Jude 20, "building up yourselves on your most holy FAITH," &c.

124. These antecedent blessings are the first principles of the Christian religion : but the first

* Exert, to have, in such passages, signifies to keep or hold as a property or principal for use. Matt. xiii. 12. xxv. 29. John iii. 29. v. 42. viii. 12. Rom. i. 28. xv. 4. 1 Thess. iii. 6. 1 Tim. i. 19. iii. 9. Hebr. vi. 9. ix. 4. 1 John ii. 23. iii. 3. v. 12. 2 John ver. 9.

principles of religion must be free from all doubt or scruple; otherwise, the religion which is built upon them must sink, as having no foundation. The principles of natural religion—that I am endowed with a rational nature, that there is a God in whom I live, move, and have my being, and to whom I am accountable for my actions, are perfectly evident: otherwise the obligations of natural religion would be necessarily doubtful and uncertain. In like manner the first principles of the Christian religion must be free from all perplexity; otherwise its obligations must be doubtful and perplexed. If it be doubtful whether ever Christ came into the world to redeem it, the whole Gospel is doubtful; and it is the same thing, if it be doubtful who are redeemed by him: for if he has redeemed we know not whom, it is nearly the same thing with regard to our improvement of redemption, as if he had redeemed no body at all.

125. Faith is the first act of the Christian life, to which every Christian is obliged, and therefore it must have a sure and certain object to work upon; but if the love of God in our election, calling, adoption, justification, redemption, &c. be in itself uncertain to any person, in the Christian church, then faith has no sure nor certain object to work upon with respect to some Christians: and consequently some Christians are not obliged to believe; which is false.

126. Further, the apostles make our election, calling, adoption, &c. motives to obedience and holiness. And therefore these (our election, calling, adoption, &c.) must have an existence antecedent to our obedience; otherwise they can be no motive to it. And if only an uncertain, unknown, number of men be elected to eternal life, no individual can certainly know that he is of that number; and so, election can be no motive to obedience to any person in the Christian church. To confine election, adoption, &c. to some few, is unchurching the greatest part of the church, and robbing them of common motives and comforts.

127. Our election, adoption, and other antecedent blessings, are not of works; consequently we are not to work for them, but upon them. They are not the effect of our good works, but our good works are the effect of them; they are not founded upon our holiness, but our holiness is founded upon them. We do not procure them by our obedience, for they are the effect of free grace: but they are motives and reasons exciting and encouraging our obedience. Therefore our election is not proved by our sanctification or real holiness. Our real happiness proves, that our election is made sure: but our election itself is proved by the free grace of God.

128. From all this it follows that we, as well as the Christians of the first times, may claim, and appropriate to ourselves all the fore-mentioned antecedent blessings, without any doubt or scruple. In confidence of hope and full assurance of faith we may boldly say, "The Lord is my helper," and come with boldness to the throne of grace. Our life, even eternal life, is sure to every one of us in the promise of God, and in the hands of our Lord Jesus Christ. And the business of every Christian is not to perplex himself with doubts, and fears, and gloomy apprehensions; but to rejoice in the Lord, and to do the duties of his place cheerfully and faithfully, in the assured hope of eternal life, through Jesus Christ—to him be everlasting glory and praise. Amen.*

129. V. From the preceding collection of texts we may gather, that some of the expressions whereby the antecedent blessings are signified, such as elect, justify, sanctify, &c. may be used in a double sense; namely, either as they are applied to all Christians in general, in relation to their being translated into the kingdom of God, and made his peculiar people, enjoying the privileges of the Gospel; or, as they signify the effects of those privileges. Wherever any blessing is assigned to all Christians without exception; wherever it is said not to be of works; wherever Christians are expected to make a due improvement of it, and threatened with the loss of God's blessing; and of eternal life if they do not; there, the expressions which signify that blessing, are to be understood in a general sense as denoting a Gospel privilege, profession, or obligation. And in this general sense, saved, elect, chosen, justified, sanctified, are sometimes used; and calling, called, election, are, I think, always used in the New Testament. But when any blessing denotes real holiness, as actually existing in the subject, then it may be understood in the special and eminent sense; and always must be understood in this sense, when it implies the actual possession of eternal life. And in this sense, saved, elect, chosen, justify, sanctify, born of God, are sometimes used. Matt. xx. 16, "Many are called, but few are chosen," (who make a worthy use of their calling.) Matt. xxiv. 31, "He shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect." xii. 36, 37, "In the day of judgment, by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned." 1 Thess. v. 24, "The God of peace sanctify you wholly," &c. 1 John ii. 29, "Every one that doeth righteousness is born of him." iv. 7, "Every one that loveth is born of God," in the eminent sense.

130. The faith, which gave a person a place or standing in the Christian church, was a profession considered simply, and separately from the fruits and effects of it. But it included a profession of repentance, of forsaking sin and idolatry, and of bringing forth the fruits of righteousness. And it is the continued profession of this faith in Christ, which gives us a continued right to a place in the church. For, if we cast off our first faith, we renounce our profession, we cease to be Christians, or we no longer continue to be the peculiar family of God.

131. Here it should be carefully observed, that it is very common, in the Sacred Writings, to express not only our Christian privileges, but also the duty to which they oblige, in the present or preterperfect tense; or to speak of that as done, which only ought to be done; and which, in fact, may possibly never be done. Mal. i. 6, "A son honours," [ought to honour,] "his father." Matt. v. 13. "Ye are," [ought to be,] "the salt of the earth; but if the salt have lost his savour," &c. Rom. ii. 4, "The goodness of God leads," [ought to lead,] "thee to repentance." Rom. vi. 2, 11. viii. 9. Col. iii. 3. 1 Pet. i. 6, "Wherein ye [ought] greatly [to] rejoice." 2 Cor. iii. 18. "We all with open face," [enjoying the means of] "beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are" [ought to be, enjoy the means of being] "changed into the same image, from glory to glory." 1 Cor. v. 7, "Purge out the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, as ye are" [obliged by the Christian profession to be,] "unleavened." Hebr. xiii. 14, "We seek," [we ought to seek, or according to our profession, we seek,] "a city to come." 1 John ii. 12, 15.—iii. 9. v. 4, 18; and in various other places.

*This is all right, when the sinner has been led, by a deep knowledge of his lost estate, to seek and find redemption in the blood of the Lamb: then it is his business to rejoice in the Lord, and do the duties of his place cheerfully and faithfully, in the assured hope of eternal life through Jesus Christ. But he must not presume, because he is in a Christian church, and believes the doctrines of Christianity, that therefore he is safe. He cannot be safe unless Christ be formed in his heart the hope of glory.

132. The man of true goodness, courage, and greatness of soul, is he who has that "faith which worketh by love;" who lives the life he now lives, by "faith in the Son of God." Such a man is happy under all events. This is he, who, while he despises a vain life, has the truest and highest enjoyment of all that can be enjoyed in it. This is the man who alone properly lives; for he has nothing but life and immortality before him; death itself giving no interruption to his life. Blessed, unspeakably blessed is this man. Such the Gospel is designed to make us all; and such we may all be, if we do not shamefully neglect the grace of God, and our own happiness. But the knowledge and sense of these things are generally lost among those called Christians; to whom the words of the Psalmist may be too truly applied: "They are a people that do err in their hearts, for they have not known my ways." Psalm xc. 10.

133. From all the preceding observations and arguments we may clearly see what is implied in preaching Christ. It is not teaching, that only a small, uncertain number among Christians, are ARBITRARILY redeemed, elected, called, adopted, born again, or regenerated; and that all the rest are by a sovereign, absolute, and eternal DECREE, passed by or reprobated. These are no principles of Christianity, but stand in direct contradiction to them, and have drawn a dark veil over the grace of the Gospel, sunk the Christian world into an abject state of fear, and a false superstitious humility; and thrown ministers into endless absurdities.—It is such doctrines as these that have misrepresented the Christian religion; harassed the Christian world endlessly, by blending and confounding men's understandings, and embittering their spirits; and have been the reason of calling in a false kind of learning, logic, metaphysics, and school divinity, in order to give a colour of reason to the grossest absurdities; and to enable divines to make a plausible show of supporting and defending palpable contradictions." See the note at the conclusion of page 33.

A GENERAL SURVEY OF THE
EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.

He understood perfectly well the system of religion he taught, for he was instructed in it by the immediate Revelation of Jesus Christ, Gal. i. 11. Eph. iii. 3. 1 Cor. xi. 23; and being also endowed with the most eminent gifts of the Holy Spirit, a man disinterested and quite unbiassed by any temporal considerations, we may be sure he has given us the truth, as he received it from our Lord, after his ascension. On the other hand, he was also well acquainted with the sentiments and system of religion which he opposed: for he was well skilled in Jewish literature, having had the best education his country could afford; and having been once a most zealous advocate for Judaism. Having frequently disputed with the Jews, he was thoroughly versed in the controversy, and knew very well what would be retorted upon every point; and therefore we may very reasonably suppose that the queries and objections which the apostle in this epistle puts into the mouth of the Jews, were really such as had been advanced in opposition to his arguments.

He was a great genius and a fine writer; and he seems to have exercised all his talents, as well as the most perfect Christian temper, in drawing up this epistle. The plan of it is very extensive; and it is surprising to see what a spacious field of knowledge he has comprised; and how many various designs, arguments, explications, instructions, and exhortations, he has executed in so small a compass.

This letter was sent to the world's metropolis, where it might be exposed to all sorts of persons, Heathens, Jews, Christians, Philosophers, Magistrates, and the Emperor himself. And I make no doubt that the apostle kept this in view while he was writing; and guarded and adapted it accordingly.

However, it is plain enough it was designed to confute the unbelieving, and to instruct the believing Jew; to confirm the Christian, and to convert the idolatrous Gentile. Those several designs he reduces to one scheme, by opposing and arguing with the Infidel or unbelieving Jew, in favour of the Christian or believing Gentile.

Upon this plan, if the unbelieving Jew escaped and remained unconvinced; yet the Christian Jew would be more inoffensively, and more effectually instructed in the nature of the Gospel, and the kind brotherly regards he ought to have to the believing Gentiles, than if he had directed his discourse plainly and immediately to him. But if his arguments should fail, in reference to the believing Jew, yet the believing Gentile would see his interest in the covenant and kingdom of God as solidly established, by a full confutation of the Jewish objections, (which were the only objections that could, with any show of reason, be advanced against it,) as if the epistle had been written for no other purpose. And thus it is of the greatest use to us at this day.

It is also at present exceeding useful, as it entirely demolishes the ingrossing pretensions, and imposing principles of the church of Rome. For a professed faith in Christ, and a subjection to him, is, in this epistle, fully shown to be the only Gospel condition of a place in his church, an interest in the covenant of God, and of Christian fellowship. By this extensive principle God broke down the pales of his own ancient enclosure, the Jewish church; and, therefore, by the same principle, more strongly forbids the building any partition-wall of schemes, and terms of Christian fellowship, devised by human wisdom, or imposed by human authority. He then, who professes faith in Christ, and subjection to him, is, by the apostle, allowed and demonstrated to be a member of the true visible church, and to have a right to all its privileges.

Both ancients and moderns make heavy complaints of the obscurity of this epistle, though all agree it is a great and useful performance. Origen, one of the Fathers, compares our apostle to a person “who leads a stranger into a magnificent palace, but perplexed with various cross and intricate passages, and many remote and secret apartments; shows him some things at a distance, out of an opulent treasury; brings something near to his view; conceals others from it; often enters in at one door, and comes out at another: so that the stranger is surprised, and wonders whence he came, where he is, and how he shall get out.” But we shall have a tolerable idea of this princely structure, if we observe that it consists of four grand parts or divisions. The first division contains the five first chapters; the second, the sixth, seventh, and eighth: the third, the ninth, tenth, and eleventh; the fourth, the five last chapters.

PART I.—Displays the riches of Divine grace, as free to all mankind. Jews and Gentiles are equally sinful and obnoxious to wrath; and therefore there was no way for the Jew to be continued in the kingdom of God, but by GRACE through FAITH; and by grace and faith the Gentile might be admitted into it.—To reject this way of justification, was to reject the very method in which Abraham himself was justified, or interested in the covenant made with him; in which covenant, believing Gentiles were included as well as believing Jews; and had as great or greater privileges, to glory in.—But if the Jew should pertinaciously deny that, he could not deny that all mankind are interested in the grace of God, which removes the consequence of Adam's offence. Through that offence all mankind were subject to death; and through Christ's obedience all mankind should be restored to life at the last day. The resurrection from the dead is, therefore, a part of the grace of God in the Redeemer. And if all mankind have an interest in this part of the grace of God, why not in the whole of it? If all mankind were subject to death through Adam's one offence; is it not much more reasonable that, through the opposite nobler cause, the obedience of the Son of God, all mankind should be interested in the whole of the grace which God has established upon it?—And as for law, or the rule of right action, it was absurd for any part of mankind to expect pardon, or any blessedness upon the foot of that, seeing all mankind had broken it. And it was still more absurd, to seek pardon and life by the law of Moses, which condemned those that were under it to death for every transgression.—Ch. i.—v.

PART II.—Having proved that believing Jews and Gentiles were pardoned, and interested in all the privileges and blessings of the Gospel, through mere grace; he next shows the obligations laid upon them to a life of virtue and piety, under the new dispensation. And upon this subject he adapts this discourse to the Gentile Christians in the sixth chapter; and in the seventh, and part of the eighth, he turns himself to the Jewish Christians: then, from verse 12, to the end of the eighth chapter, he addresses himself, upon the same head, to both Christian Jews and Gentiles; particularly, giving them right notions of the sufferings to which they are exposed, and by which they might be deterred from the duties required in the Gospel; and concluding with a very strong and lively assertion of the certain perseverance of all who love God, notwithstanding any infirmities or trials in this world. Ch. vi.—viii.

PART III.—Gives right sentiments concerning the rejection of the Jews, which was a matter of great moment to the due establishment of the Gentile converts.—Ch. ix.—xi.

PART IV.—Is filled with exhortations to several instances of Christian duty: and concludes with salutations to and from particular persons. It will be an advantage to the reader to have this sketch of the epistle ready in his thoughts.—Ch. xii.—xvi.

Further; we cannot enter into the spirit of this epistle, unless we enter into the spirit of a Jew in those times; and have some just notion of his utter aversion to the Gentiles; his valuing and raising himself high upon his relation to God and to Abraham; upon his law, and pompous worship, circumcision, &c. as if the Jews were the only people in the world who had any manner of right to the favour of God.

And let it also be well noted, that the apostle, in this epistle, disputes with the whole body of the Jews, without respect to any particular sect or party among them, such as Pharisees, Sadducees, &c. For the grand proposition or question in debate is, Are we, Jews, better than THEY, Gentiles? chap. iii. 9. And one argument in proof of the negative, which the apostle espouses, is this, chap. iii. 29. "Is God the God of the Jews only? Is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also." These are the two points through which the line of the apostle's discourse in the third chapter, and consequently in all the argumentative part of the epistle, must necessarily run. And as, both in the proposition and in the argument, he evidently means the whole body of the Jews, in opposition to the whole body of the Gentiles, he who doth not give such a sense of the apostle's discourse, throughout the argumentative part of the epistle, as exactly hits and suits this general, collective notion, of Jews and Gentiles, certainly misses his aim and shoots wide of the mark.

Lastly, The whole epistle is to be taken in connexion, or considered as one continued discourse; and the sense of every part must be taken from the drift of the whole. Every sentence, or verse, is not to be regarded as a distinct mathematical proposition, or theorem; or as a sentence in the book of Proverbs, whose sense is absolute, and independent of what goes before or comes after: but we must remember, that every sentence, especially in the argumentative part, bears relation to, and is dependent upon, the whole discourse; and cannot be understood unless we understand the scope and drift of the whole. And, therefore, the whole epistle, or at least the eleven first chapters of it, ought to be read over at once, without stopping.

As to the use and excellency of the epistle, I shall leave it to speak for itself, when the reader has studied and well digested the contents of it. And methinks curiosity, if nothing else, should invite us to examine carefully the doctrine, by which (accompanied with the gifts and operations of the Spirit of God) a few men, otherwise naked, weak, and contemptible, in opposition to the power, learning, and deep-rooted prejudices of the world, confronted and overthrew the Pagan religion and idolatry throughout the Roman empire. A victory far more difficult and surprising than all the achievements of Alexander and Cæsar. The fact cannot be denied. And surely the dignity and virtue of the cause must be proportionable to such an unusual and wonderful event. It is certain the world never, either before or since, has seen any thing equal to the writings of the New Testament. Never was the love of God, and the dignity to which he has raised the human nature, so clearly shown and demonstrated; never were motives so divine and powerful proposed to induce us to the practice of all virtue and goodness. In short, there we find whatever ennobles and adorns the mind; whatever gives solid peace and joy; whatever renders us the most excellent and happy creatures, taught, recommended, and enforced by light and authority derived from the only Fountain of truth and of all good.

As to the apostle's manner of writing; it is with great spirit and force, I may add, perspicuity too; for it will not be difficult to understand him if our minds are unprejudiced, and at liberty to attend to the subject he is upon, and to the current scriptural sense of the words he uses. For he keeps very strictly to the standard of Scripture phraseology. He takes great care to guard and explain every part of his subject. And I may venture to say, he has left no part of it unexplained or unguarded. Never was author more exact and cautious in this than he. Sometimes he writes notes upon a sentence, liable to exception, and wanting explanation, as Rom. iii. 12—16. Here the 13th and 15th verses are a comment upon the former part of it. Sometimes he comments upon a single word; as chap. x. 11, 12, 13. The 12th and 13th verses are a comment upon was, every one, in the 11th.

He was studious of perspicuous brevity. Chap. v. 13, 14, "For until the Law, sin was in the world; but sin is not imputed when Law is not in being. Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the likeness of Adam's transgression." Surely never was a greater variety of useful sentiments crowded into a smaller compass; and yet so skillfully, that one part very clearly explains another. Hence we learn, 1. That here imputing of sin means, men's being subject to death for sin; for it follows, "Nevertheless death reigned." 2. That law is the constitution that subjects the sinner to death; for he saith, "Sin is not imputed when law is not in being." 3. That until the Law, is the times before the law of Moses was given; for he saith, "Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses." Until the Law, is the same as until Moses. 4. That law was not in being from Adam to Moses; for having said, "when law is not in being," he immediately adds, "nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses." 5. That Adam was under the law; for if the law was not in being from Adam, or after the dispensation he was under, it is plain it was in being before; or, that law was the dispensation under which God placed Adam. 6. That the clause, "even over those that had not sinned after the likeness of Adam's transgression," is not to be understood only of some particular persons, as infants, but of all that lived from Adam to Moses, because none that lived from Adam to Moses were under the law, and so none could "sin after the likeness" of Adam's transgression. 7. That the law was in being after Moses, for it was not in being from Adam to Moses, which evidently supposes it was in being afterwards, and that the Jews, from that time, sinned after the likeness of Adam's transgression, or were by the law condemned to death for every transgression. 8. Lastly, from the whole it is evident that, from Adam to Moses, men did not die for their own personal transgressions, but in consequence of Adam's one transgression, which is the point to be proved. One shall hardly find in any other author, an argument so justly managed, so fully established, attended with such a variety of instructive sentiments, in the compass of thirty words; for, setting aside the articles, there are no more in the Greek. It is by this unparalleled art, that the apostle has brought such a variety of arguments, instructions, and sentiments, all stated, proved, and sufficiently guarded, explained, and defended, within the limits of this letter; which has made it a magazine of the most real, extensive, useful, and profitable knowledge.

He treats his countrymen, the Jews, with great caution and tenderness. He had a natural affection for them, was very desirous of winning them over to the Gospel; he knew that their passions and prejudices were very strong for their own constitution; therefore, in his debates with them, he avoids every thing harsh, introduces every kind and endearing sentiment, and is very nice in choosing soft and inoffensive expressions, so far as he honestly could, for he never flatters, nor dissembles the truth.

His transitions and advances to an ungrateful subject are very dexterous and apposite, as chap. ii. 1—17. viii. 17.

He often carries on a complicated design, and while he is teaching one thing, gives us an opportunity of learning one or two more. So chap. xiii. 1—8. he teaches the duty of subjects, and at the same time instructs magistrates in their duty, and shows the true grounds of their authority.

He is a nervous reasoner, and a close writer, who never loses sight of his subject, and who throws in every colour that may enliven it.

He writes under a deep and lively sense of the truth and importance of the Gospel, as a man who clearly understood it, and in whose heart and affections it reigned far superior to all temporal considerations." See Dr. Taylor's Preface to the Romans.

There is so much good sense and sound criticism in the above remarks, that I cannot help considering them of high importance to a proper understanding of this epistle. The apostle's manner of writing is here well vindicated; and proved to be close, nervous, and conclusive; and such a testimony, from such a man as Dr. Taylor, must, with every unprejudiced reader, outweigh the miserable sentiment of that philosopher, who, while professing to hold the same creed with the above writer, has had the awful temerity to say, that St. Paul was "an inconclusive reasoner." By such a saying, a man fixes the broad seal to his own incompetency to judge either of the apostle's writings or doctrine.

In the preceding pages I have borrowed largely from the work of Dr. Taylor, on a full conviction that it is the best ever written upon this subject, that it is indispensably necessary to a proper understanding of the apostolic writings: and that I could not hope to equal it by any production of my own. Those parts of his Key which did not fall in with my plan, I have taken the liberty to pass by; the rest I have greatly abridged, and only added a few notes where I thought there might be any danger of misapprehending the subject.

PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS.

Different Interpreters have divided this Epistle into certain parts or divisions, by which they suppose its subject and matter may be the better understood. Some of these divisions have been mentioned in the preceding preface.

The Epistle contains three grand divisions.

I. The PREFACE, chap. 1. 1—17.

II. The TRACTATION, or setting forth of the main subject, including two sections, 1. dogmatic, or what relates to doctrine. 2. Paranetic, or what relates to the necessity and importance of the virtues and duties of the Christian life. The Dogmatic part is included in the first eleven chapters, the grand object of which is to show, that eternal salvation cannot be procured by any observation of the Jewish law, and can be hoped for, only on the Christian scheme; for by the works of the law no man can be justified; but what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God has accomplished by sending his Son into the world, who, becoming an offering for sin, condemned sin in the flesh. The Paranetic part commences with chap. xii. 1. I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service, &c. and extends to chap. xv. 14.

III. The Peroration or Epilogue, which contains the Author's apology for writing; his commendation of his apostolical office; his promise to visit them; his request of an interest in their prayers; his commendations of certain persons, and his salutations to others. These points are contained in the succeeding parts of the Epistle, from chap. xv. 14. to chap. xvi. 24. The 25th, 26th, and 27th verses of this chapter evidently belong to another part of the Epistle, and should come in, as they do in a vast majority of the best MSS. after the 23rd verse of the xiv. chapter.

For every thing necessary to a general knowledge of the Epistle itself, see the preceding Preface.

The inscriptions to this Epistle are various in the different MSS. and Versions. The following are the principal:—To the Romans—The Epistle of Paul to the Romans—The Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Romans—The Epistle of the Holy Apostle Paul to the Romans. The word αγιος holy, we have translated saint; and thus, instead of saying the holy Paul, &c. we say Saint Paul, &c. and this is now brought into general use. The older the MSS. are, the more simple the appellatives given to Apostles and Apostolic men.

NOTES ON CHAP. I.

Verse 1. Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ

The word δουλος which we translate servant, properly means a slave, one who is the entire property of his master; and is used here by the Apostle with great propriety. He felt he was not his own, and that his life and powers belonged to his heavenly owner, and that he had no right to dispose of, or employ them but in the strictest subserviency to the will of his Lord. In this sense, and in this spirit, he is the willing slave of Jesus Christ: and this is, perhaps, the highest character which any soul of man can attain on this side eternity.

"I am wholly the Lord's; and wholly devoted in the spirit of sacrificial obedience to the constant, complete, and energetic performance of the Divine will." A friend of God is high; a son of God is higher; but the servant, or, in the above sense, the slave of God, is higher than all; in a word, he is a person who feels he has no property in himself, and that God is all, and in all.

Called to be an apostle] The word αποστολος Apostle, from αποσταλειν to send, signifies simply a messenger or envoy; one sent on a confidential errand: but here it means an extraordinary messenger; one sent by God himself, to deliver the most important message on behalf of his Maker: in a word, one sent by the divine authority to preach the Gospel to the nations. The word κατος called, signifies here the same as constituted, and should be joined with αποστολος as it is in the Greek, and translated thus, Paul, a ser- vant of Jesus Christ, constituted an Apostle, &c. This sense the word called has in many places of the Sacred Writings; e. g. Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed on us, that we should be called κληθωμεν, CONSTITUTED, or made the sons of God. As it is likely that no Apostle had been employed in founding the church of Rome, and there was need of much authority to settle the matters that were there in dispute; it was necessary that he should show them, that he derived his authority from God; and was immediately delegated by him to preach and write as he was now doing.

Separated unto the Gospel] Set apart and appointed to this work, and to this only; as the Israelites were separate from all the people of the earth, to be the servants of God, see Levit. xx. 26. St. Paul may here refer to his former state as a Pharisee, which literally signifies a separatist, or one separated. Before, he was separated unto the service of his own sect; now, he is separated unto the gospel of God. On the word GOSPEL, and its meaning, see the Preface to the notes on St. Matthew; and for the meaning of the word Pharisee, see the same Gospel, chap. iii. at the end.

Verse 2. Which he had promised afore] Both in the law and in the prophets, God showed his purpose to introduce into the world a more perfect and glorious state of things: which state was to take place by and under the influence of the Messiah; who should bring life and immortality to light by his gospel.

Verse 3. Concerning his Son] That is, the gospel relates every thing concerning the Conception, Birth, Preaching, Miracles, Passion, Death, Resurrection, and Ascension of Jesus Christ, who was of the seed royal, being, as far as his humanity was considered, the Son of David; and then, the only rightful heir to the Israelitish throne.

Verse 4. And declared to be the Son of God] See the note on Acts chap. xiii. 33. where this subject is considered at large. The word επισημειωτος, which we render declared, comes from επισηω to bound, define, determine, or limit, and hence our word horizon, the line that determines the farthest visible part of the earth, in reference to the heavens. In this place, the word signifies such a manifest and complete exhibition of the subject, as to render it indubitable. The resurrection of Christ from the dead was such a manifest proof of our Lord's innocence, the truth of his doctrine, and the fulfilment of all that the Prophets had spoken, as to leave no doubt on any considerate and candid mind.

With power] Εν δυναμει with a miraculous display of divine energy; for how could his body be raised again, but by the miraculous energy of God? Some apply the word here to the proof of Christ's Sonship; as if it were said, that he was most manifestly declared to be the Son of God, with such powerful evidence and argument, as to render the truth irresistible.

According to the spirit of holiness] There are many differences of sentiment relative to the meaning of this phrase in this place; some supposing, that the spirit of holiness implies the divine nature of Jesus Christ; others his immaculate sanctity, &c. To me it seems that the apostle simply means that the person called Jesus, lately crucified at Jerusalem, and in whose name salvation was preached to the world, was the Son of God, the very Messiah promised before in the Holy Scriptures; and that he was this Messiah, was amply demonstrated. 1st, By his resurrection from the dead, the irrefragable proof of his purity, innocence, and the divine approbation; for, had he been a malefactor, as the Jews pretended, the miraculous power of God would not have been exerted in raising his body from the dead. 2nd, He was proved to be the Son of God, the promised Messiah, by the Holy Spirit, (called here the Spirit of holiness) which he sent down upon his apostles, and not on them only, but on all that believed on his name; by whose influence multitudes were convinced of sin, righteousness, and judgment, and multitudes sanctified unto God; and it was by the peculiar unction of this Spirit of holiness, that the apostles gave witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, Acts iv. 33. Thus then, Christ was proved to be the true Messiah, the son of David, according to the flesh, having the sole right to the throne of Israel; and God recognized this character and this right, by his resurrection from the dead, and sending forth the various gifts and graces of the Spirit of holiness in his name.

Verse 5. Grace and apostleship] The peculiar influence, and the essential qualifications which such an office requires: without the GRACE, favour, and peculiar help of God, he could not have been an Apostle: he had an extraordinary conversion; and an extraordinary call to preach the Gospel. Probably χαρις και Αποστολη grace and apostleship, mean the same as χαρις τῆς Αποστολῆς, the apostolical office; for so the word χαρις means in chap. xii. 3. xv. 15. 1 Cor. iii. 10. Eph. iii. 8. See the various acceptations of the word grace, on verse 7.

For obedience to the faith.] That by this office, which I have received from God, and the power by which it is accompanied, I might proclaim the faith, the Gospel of Jesus; and show all nations the necessity of believing in it, in order to their salvation. Here is, first, the Gospel of the Son of God—2. An Apostle divinely commissioned and empowered to preach it—3. The necessity of faith in the name of Jesus, as the only Saviour of the world.—4. Of obedience, as the necessary consequence of genuine faith—and, 5. This is to be proclaimed among all nations; that all might have the opportunity of believing and being saved.

Verse 6. Ye are the called] Ye Romans are all invited to believe in Christ Jesus, for the salvation of your souls; and to you, with the rest, my apostolical mission extends. This appears to be the most obvious sense of the word called in this place—to be called by the Gospel, is to be invited to believe in Christ Jesus, and become his disciples. The word sometimes means constituted, or made, as in verse 1.

Verse 7. Called to be saints] Invited to become holy persons, by believing the gospel, and receiving the gifts of the Holy Ghost. Or here the word may have the meaning of made or constituted, as above; καλεῖται ἁγίους, to all that be in Rome, CONSTITUTED Saints, for they had already received the gospel of grace; and were formed into a Christian church.

Grace to you] χαρις υμῖν; may you be partakers of the Divine favour, the source whence every blessing is derived.

I think it necessary, once for all, to give the several acceptations of this word grace, which occur in the Sacred Writings.

1. The word χαρις signifies in general favour, or benevolence, but especially that favour which is powerful and active, and loads its object with benefits. Luke i. 30, Fear not, Mary, thou hast found FAVOUR, χαρις, with God. Luke ii. 40, And the child grew—and the GRACE of God, χαρις Θεου, the favour of God was upon him. Ib. v. 52, And Jesus increased in FAVOUR, χαριτι, GRACE with God and man. Acts ii. 47, Having FAVOUR, χαρις, GRACE, with all the people. Acts iv. 33. And great GRACE, χαρις, FAVOUR was upon them all. The Apostles were at that time in universal favour with the multitude. In this sense the word occurs in a great variety of places, both in the Old and New Testaments.

2. Hence it is often used for the blessing which it dispenses; for if God be favourably disposed towards a person, his beneficent acts in that person's behalf, will be a necessary consequence of such favour. John i. 14, Full of GRACE and truth; accomplished in all spiritual blessings. Ib. v. 16, And GRACE upon GRACE: he who is full of the most excellent blessings confers them liberally on all believers. Acts xi. 23, When he had seen the GRACE of God, i. e. he had the fullest evidence that they were richly endowed with heavenly gifts. 1 Cor. i. 4, For the GRACE of God which is given you, the Divine blessings conferred upon you. 2 Cor. ix. 8, God is able to make all GRACE abound towards you; i. e. to enrich you with every benediction. This also is a very common acceptation of the word: and in this sense the word grace, or favour, is now generally understood among religious people. The grace of God meaning with them some divine or spiritual blessing communicated.

3. It is sometimes taken for the whole of the Christian Religion, as being the grandest possible display of God's favour, to a lost, ruined world: and in this sense it appears to be used. John i. 17, For the LAW was given by Moses; but GRACE and truth came by Jesus Christ: where the term GRACE is evidently opposed to LAW; the latter meaning the Mosaic, the other the Christian, dispensation. Acts xiii. 43, Barnabas persuaded them to continue in the GRACE of God—i. e. to hold fast their profession of the religion of Christ. Rom. vi. 14, Ye are not under the LAW, but under GRACE: ye are no longer under obligation to fulfil the Mosaic precepts; but are under the Christian dispensation.—See also verse 15. of the same chap. and see 2 Cor. i. 10. vi. 1. Gal. i. 6. Coloss. i. 6. 2 Tim. ii. 1. Tit. ii. 11, The GRACE of God, that bringeth salvation to all men, hath appeared. The Jewish religion was restricted in its benefits to a few; but the Christian religion proposes the salvation of all men; and the Author of it has become a sacrifice for the sins of the whole world. Heb. xii. 15, Looking diligently lest any man fall from the GRACE of God; lest any man apostatize from the Christian religion, and the blessings of pardon and holiness which he has received through it. 1 Pet. v. 12, This is the true GRACE of God wherein ye stand. The Christian religion which ye have received, is the genuine religion of God.

4. It signifies all the blessings and benefits which Christ has purchased; and which he gives to true believers, both in time and eternity. See Rom. v. 15. and 17. where the grace of God is opposed to death; i. e. to all the wretchedness and misery brought into the world by Adam's transgression.—1 Cor. xvi. 23, The GRACE of the Lord Jesus Christ be with you all: may every blessing purchased by Christ's passion and death be the portion of you all. Gal. v. 4, Ye are fallen from GRACE—ye have lost the blessings of the Gospel by submitting to circumcision.

5. It signifies the apostolic and ministerial office; or the authority to propagate the Christian religion; and the unction or influence by which that office is executed: so in the 5th verse of this chapter, as has been already noted—By whom we have received GRACE and apostleship, or, the apostolic office. Rom. xii. 3, I say, through the GRACE given unto me: i. e. I command you by the authority of my apostolic office, &c. See also verse 6.

6. It signifies a gift, salary, or money collected for the use of the poor. 1 Cor. xvi. 3, Whomsoever ye shall approve—they will I send to bring your LIBERALITY, τῶν χαρῶν ὑμῶν, your

GRACE—i. e. the collection made for the poor saints: see ver. 1. 2 Cor. viii. 4, Praying us—that we would receive the GIFT, τῶν χαρῶν, the GRACE, the contribution made in the churches of Macedonia, for the relief of the poor. In this sense it is used in Ecclus. xvii. 22, *He will keep the GOOD DEEDS of man, χαρῶν, the same as αἱμωσίων, alms, in the beginning of the verse, and it signifies a kind or friendly act, in the same author. Chap. xxix. 15, Forget not the FRIENDSHIP, χαρῆται, of thy surety. GRACE, or χαρῆς, was a deity among the ancients; and the three GRACES, αἱ τρεῖς χαρῆται, were called Pytho, Aglaia, and Euphrosyne: Πυθα, mild persuasion: Ἀγλαία, dignity; Εὐφροσύνη, liberality and joyfulness; and these were always painted naked, to show that all benefits should be gratuitous, this being essential to the nature of a gift. See Suidas in χαρῆται.*

7. It sometimes signifies merely thanks or thanksgiving.—See Luke xvii. 9, Doth he THANK, μὴ χαρῶν ἔχει, that servant? Rom. vi. 17, But God be THANKED, χαρῆς δι τῶ Θεοῦ. 1 Cor. x. 30, For if I by GRACE, χαρῆς, THANKSGIVING, as our margin has it, and properly.

8. It signifies remuneration, wages, or reward. Luke vi. 32, 33, and 34, If ye love them that love you—do good to them which do good to you—tend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what THANK have ye? ποῖα ὑμῶν χαρῆς ἐστὶ, what REWARD have ye? This appears, from the parallel place, Matt. v. 64, to be most evidently the meaning: τῶ μισθῶ ἔχετε; what REWARD have ye? The word is used in this sense by several Greek writers.

9. It signifies whatever is the means of procuring the favour or kindness of another. 1 Pet. ii. 19, 20, For this is THANKWORTHY, τὸντι γὰρ χαρῆς παρὰ Θεοῦ, this is the means of PROCURING FAVOUR from God.

10. It signifies joy, pleasure, and gratification, which is the meaning of χαρὰ, and with which it is often confounded in the New Testament. Philemon 7, For we have great JOY, χαρῆν γὰρ ἔχομεν πολλὰν. Tobit vii. 18, The Lord give thee JOY, χαρῆν, for this thy sorrow. In this sense the word is used by the best Greek writers; and in this sense it appears to be used, 2 Cor. i. 15.

11. It signifies the performance of an act which is pleasing or grateful to others. Acts xxiv. 27, Felix, willing to show the Jews a PLEASURE, χαρῆτας μετὰθεῶν, to perform an act which he knew would be highly gratifying to them.

12. It signifies whatever has the power or influence to procure favour, &c. Suavity, kindness, benevolence, gentle demeanour. Luke iv. 22, All wondered at the GRACIOUS words οὐ λόγων τῆς χαρῆτος, the benevolent, kind, and tender expressions; such as his text ver. 18. would naturally lead him to speak—He hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, &c. Eph. iv. 29. Col. iv. 6, Let your speech be always with GRACE: i. e. gracious, kind, benevolent, savouring of the doctrine of Christ: it is thus used by several Greek writers. See Schleuser. As the word χάρις, GRACE, most frequently signifies some blessing or benefit, calculated to promote human happiness; it is generally derived from χαίρω, I rejoice, because of the effect produced by the blessing.

And peace] Εἰρήνη, the same as שָׁלוֹם, shalom in Hebrew, generally signifying all kinds of blessing, but especially harmony and unity—and the bond of such unity. The most probable derivation of the word εἰρήνη is from εἶπω I bind, and ἓν one—because peace unites and binds those who were, by discord, before disunited. In the New Testament it signifies—1. Peace, public or private, in the general acceptation of the word, as implying reconciliation and friendship; and to the etymology of the word the Apostle seems to allude in Eph. iv. 3, Endeavouring to keep the UNITY of the Spirit, in the BOND of PEACE. Acts xii. 20, They of Tyre and Sidon, desired PEACE; they sought reconciliation with Herod, by means of Blastus, the king's chamberlain.

2. It signifies, regularity, good order. 1 Cor. xiv. 33, God is not the God of confusion, but of PEACE.

3. It signifies, the labour or study of preserving peace and concord; and this is supposed to be its meaning, Matt. x. 34. Luke xii. 51. and Acts vii. 26. Rom. xiv. 17, For the kingdom of God is—righteousness and PEACE. The Christian dispensation admits of no contention, but inculcates peace. 1 Cor. vii. 15, God hath called us to PEACE—to labour to preserve quietness and concord. Heb. xii. 14, Follow PEACE—labour to preserve it.

4. It signifies the author or procurer of peace and concord. Eph. ii. 14. He is our PEACE—the author of concord betwixt Jews and Gentiles.

5. It signifies the Gospel and its blessings. Eph. ii. 17, And came and preached PEACE to you which were afar off; and to them that were nigh.

6. It signifies all kinds of mental and corporeal happiness: and especially the happiness of Christians. Luke i. 79, To guide our feet into the way of PEACE; to show us the way to obtain true happiness. Luke xix. 42, The things which belong unto thy PEACE—that by which thou mightest have been made truly happy. 1 Thea. v. 23. The very God of PEACE—God, the only source of true felicity. John xvi. 33, These things have I spoken unto you that in me ye might have PEACE—that ye might have confidence and happiness in believing on me as your only Saviour.

7. It signifies good wishes and affectionate prayers. Matt. x. 13, And if the house be worthy, let your PEACE come upon it. Our Lord commands his disciples, ver. 12. to salute the house into which they entered; and this was done by saying peace be unto this house! that is, let every blessing, spiritual and temporal, be the portion of this family; See Luke x. 6. John xvi. 27. and Acts xv. 33. they were let go in PEACE; they had the most fervent and affectionate prayers of the church.

8. It signifies Praise. Luke xix. 38. PEACE in Heaven, and glory in the Highest. May all the heavenly host praise God, and give him the highest honour!

9. It signifies benignity, benevolence, favour, Rom. v. 1, Being justified by faith, we have PEACE with God. In consequence of having our sins forgiven, we have a clear sense of the Divine favour. Phil. iv. 7. The PEACE of God, which passeth all understanding; the inexpressible blessedness of a sense of the Divine favour. See Schleuser's Lexicon.

From God our Father] The Apostle wishes them all the blessings which can flow from God, as the fountain of grace; producing in them all the happiness which a heart filled with the peace of God can possess; all of which are to be communicated to them through the Lord Jesus Christ. See the note on Acts xxviii. 31.

Verse 8. First, I thank my God] From this, to the end of ver. 17. belongs to the preface, in which the Apostle endeavours to conciliate the good opinion of the Christians at Rome; and to prepare their minds for his reproofs and exhortations.

Your faith is spoken] Καταπαντα is celebrated—throughout the whole world—In every place where the Christian religion is professed, through all parts of the Roman dominions; for in this sense we should understand the words the whole world.

Verse 9. Whom I serve with my spirit] Λατρεύω, whom I worship with the profoundest religious reverence; for so the original certainly means; I not only employ all the powers of my body in this service, but all those of my soul; being thoroughly convinced of the absolute truth of the religion I preach. Probably St. Paul opposes, in this place, the spiritual worship of the gospel to the external, or what some call, the carnal worship of the Jews. Mime is not a religion of ceremonies, but one in which the life and power of the eternal Spirit, are acknowledged and experienced.

Verse 10. Making request, &c.] By this we see how earnestly the Apostle longed to see Rome. It had long been a subject of continual prayer to God, that he might have a prosperous journey to, or rather meeting with them, for so we should understand the word συναντησάμενος: that he had a prosperous meeting with them we cannot doubt; that he had a disastrous journey to them, the 27th of the Acts fully proves.

Verse 11. Some spiritual gift] This probably means some of the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit; which, being given to them, might tend greatly to establish their faith in the gospel of Christ; and it is very likely, that such gifts were only conferred by means of Apostles; and as the Apostle had not yet been at Rome, consequently the Roman Christians had not yet received any of these miraculous gifts, and thus they differed widely from all the other churches which had been raised by the Apostles' ministry.

Verse 12. That I may be comforted together with you] He here, with great address, intimates that he longs for this opportunity, as well on his own account as on theirs; and to show them that he arrogates nothing to himself, for he intimates that it will require the conjoint action of their faith as well as his own, to be the means of receiving those blessings from God to which he refers.

Verse 13. But was let hitherto] The word let, from the Anglo-Saxon, lettan to hinder, signifies impediment, or hindrance of any kind: but it is likely that the original word καταβην, I was forbidden, refers to a Divine prohibition:—he would have visited them long before, but God did not see right to permit him.

Verse 14. I am debtor both to the Greeks, and to the Barbarians] It has been remarked before, that all the nations of the earth, themselves excepted, were termed barbarians by the Greeks. See the origin of the word barbarus, in the note on Acts, chap. xxviii. 2. The Apostle considers himself, by his apostolical office and call, under obligation to preach the gospel to all people, as far as the providence of God might open his way; for this is implied in the Divine commission—Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature: to the wise and the unwise; to the learned and uncultivated, as well as to the unlearned and uncultivated: this evidently appears to be the import of the terms.

Verse 15. I am ready to preach] Προθυμῶν; I have a ready mind. I was only prevented by the Providence of God, from visiting you long ago. His time is best: in the mean time, I write by his direction, to comfort and instruct you.

Verse 16. I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ] This text is best illustrated by Isai. xxviii. 16. xlix. 23. quoted by the Apostle chap. x. 11. For the Scripture saith, Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed: i. e. they shall neither be confounded nor disappointed of their hope. The Jews, by not believing on Jesus Christ, by not receiving him as the promised Messiah, but trusting in others, have been disappointed, ashamed, and confounded, from that time to the present day. Their expectation is cut off: and while rejecting Christ, and expecting another Messiah, they have continued under the displeasure of God, and are ashamed of their confidence. On the other hand, those who have believed on Christ, have, in and through him, all the blessings of which the prophets spoke: every promise of God being yes and amen through him. Paul, as a Jew, believed on Christ Jesus; and in believing he had life through his name; through him he enjoyed an abundance of grace, so that being filled with that happiness which an indwelling Christ produces, he could cheerfully say, I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ. And why? because he felt it to be the power of God to the salvation of his believing soul. This appears to be the true sense of this passage, and this interpretation acquires additional strength from the consideration that St. Paul is here most evidently addressing himself to the Jews.

It is the power of God unto salvation] δυναμὶς θεοῦ εἰς σωτηρίαν.—The almighty power of God accompanies this preaching to the souls of them that believe; and the consequence is, they are saved; and what but the power of God can save a fallen, sinful soul?

To the Jew first] Not only the Jews have the first offer of this gospel, but they have the greatest need of it; being so deeply fallen, and have sinned against such glorious privileges, they are much more culpable than the Gentiles, who never had the light of a divine revelation.

And also to the Greek] Though the salvation of God has hitherto been apparently confined to the Jewish people; yet it shall be so no longer, for the gospel of Christ is sent to the Gentiles, as well as the Jews; God having put no difference between them ; and Jesus Christ having tasted death for EVERY man.

Verse 17. For therein] In the gospel of Christ. Is the righteousness of God] God's method of saving sinners.

Revealed from faith to faith] Shown to be by faith, and not by the works of any law ; for Abraham, the father and founder of the Jewish people, was justified by faith, before even the law was given ; and from believing in reference to spiritual objects held forth in the various ordinances of the law, and now revealed under the gospel, he and all his believing descendants have been justified. And thus the faith of the old covenant led on to the faith of the new covenant ; which shows that salvation has been by faith, from the call of Abraham to the present time. And from the beginning, all that were just or righteous in the earth, became such by faith, and by this principle alone, they were enabled to persevere ; as it is written, the just shall live by faith. That δικαιοσύνη, which we translate righteousness in this verse, signifies God's method of saving mankind by faith in Christ, is fully evident from the use of the term in chap. ix. 30. The Gentiles which followed not after RIGHTEOUSNESS ; who had no knowledge by revelation, of God's method of justifying and saving sinners, have attained to RIGHTEOUSNESS ; have had imparted to them God's method of salvation by faith in Christ, verse 31. But Israel, the Jews which followed after the law of righteousness ; that law, the end or object of which is CHRIST, and through him Justification to all that believe ; (ch. x. 4.) have not attained to the law of righteousness ; have not found out the genuine plan of salvation, even in that law which so strongly and generally proclaims justification by faith ; and why have they not found it ? verse 32, because they sought it not by faith, but as it were by the works of the law ; they did not discern that even its works or prescribed religious observances were intended to lead to faith in that glorious Mediator, of whom they were the types and representatives ; but the Jews trusted in the observances themselves, hoping to acquire justification and final salvation by that means. For they stumbled at the stumbling-stone, at the doctrine of Christ crucified, as the only sure ground on which the expectation of future salvation can be founded. Therefore being ignorant of God's righteousness ; God's method of saving sinners, and going about to establish their own righteousness, their own method of salvation, by the observance of those rites and ceremonies which should have led them, by faith, to Christ ; they did not submit themselves to the righteousness of God ; they would not submit to be saved in God's way, and therefore rejected, persecuted, and crucified the Lord Jesus, see chap. x. 3. This collation of passages most evidently shows that the word righteousness here means simply God's method of saving sinners, or God's way of salvation ; in opposition to the ways and means invented by the fancies or prejudices of men.

There are few words in the Sacred Writings which are taken in a greater variety of acceptations, than the word צדקה tsedekah in Hebrew, and δικαιοσύνη in Greek, both of which generally translate righteousness. Our English word was originally rightwiseness, from the Anglo-Saxon riht justice, right, and witan to know ; and thus the righteous man was a person who was allowed to understand the claims of justice and right, and who knowing them, acted according to their dictates. Such a man is thoroughly wise he aims at the attainment of the best end, by the use of the best means. This is a true definition of wisdom, and the righteous man is he that knows most and acts best. The Hebrew צדקה tsedekah, in its ideal meaning, contains the notion of a beam or scales in equisepoise, what we call even balance ; and it is well known, that in all the personifications of Justice, both ancient and modern, she is represented as a beautiful female with a bandage on her eyes, and a beam and scales in her hand, so perfectly poised that neither end preponderates.

The Greek word δικαιοσύνη has been derived from διχαζω to divide ; and hence δίκαιον justice, because it is the property of this virtue to divide to each his due. With other etymologies, it is useless to trouble the Reader. Both the noun δικαιοσύνη and the verb δικαιοω have a great variety of meaning in the New Testament, but they are all reducible to this original idea, acting according to the requisitions of justice or right. It may not be improper to notice some of the chief of these acceptations in this place.

1. The act of distributing to each man his due, is the sense of the word. Acts xvii. 31, He will judge the world in RIGHTEOUSNESS, i. e. according to the principles of eternal justice and rectitude. See also Rev. xix. 2, In RIGHTEOUSNESS doth he judge and make war.
2. It signifies a holy life, as proceeding from piety towards God. Luke i. 75, Might serve him in holiness and RIGHTEOUSNESS all the days of our life.
3. It signifies benignity, liberality, and particularly almsgiving ; as justice and righteousness require us, being only stewards of God's bounty to share it with the necessitous. Matt. vi, Take heed that ye do not your ALMS, δικαιοσύνην, your RIGHTEOUSNESS, before men. Rom. iii. 5, But if our unrighteousness commend the RIGHTEOUSNESS, the benignity of God. 2 Cor. ix. 10, Increase the fruits of your RIGHTEOUSNESS, i. e. of your liberality.
4. It signifies God's method of saving sinners ; the way which is agreeable to his righteousness and liberality. See the former part of this note, and the Scriptures there referred to.

5. It signifies the reward, or issue of liberality. 2 Cor. ix. 9, He hath scattered abroad; he hath given to the poor; his RIGHTEOUSNESS, the reward of his bounty, remaineth for ever. See Psal. cxii. 9.

6. It signifies the whole collection of graces, which constitute the complete Christian character. Matt. v. 6, Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after RIGHTEOUSNESS; they who ardently long for the full salvation of God. Ib. v. 10, 20, If your RIGHTEOUSNESS exceed not the righteousness, &c. Ib. vi. 33, Seek the kingdom of God and his RIGHTEOUSNESS.

7. It signifies the result of faith in God, and submission to his will, exemplified in a holy and useful life. Heb. xi. 7, By faith Noah prepared an ark, and became heir of the RIGHTEOUSNESS which is by faith; he escaped the deluge, and was made the instrument of re-peopling the world.

8. It signifies an exact observance of religious ordinances, and precepts. Phil. iii. 6, Touching the RIGHTEOUSNESS which is of the law, blameless; having lived in an exact conformity to all the Mosaic precepts. In this sense it is to be understood, Matt. iii. 15, Thus it becomes us to fulfil all RIGHTEOUSNESS; to observe every precept of the law.

9. It signifies the favour or pardoning mercy of God. Rom. iv. 6, The blessedness of the man unto whom God imputeth RIGHTEOUSNESS without works; the man is happy to whom God has granted the remission of sins, without respect to his observance of the law of Moses.

10. In 2 Cor. v. 21, δικαιοσύνη, righteousness, is put for δίκαιος, righteous; that we might become the righteousness of God; that we might receive such a righteousness or holiness, such a salvation, as is worthy of God's grace to impart; and such as the necessities of mankind require.

A few of the leading acceptations of the verb δικαιοῦμαι, which we translate to justify, may be here properly subjoined, as this verb is so repeatedly used in this Epistle.

1. It signifies to declare or pronounce one just or righteous; or, in other words, to declare him to be what he really is. 1 Tim. iii. 16, He was JUSTIFIED in the Spirit. By the almighty power of the Spirit, he was proved to be the TRUE MESSIAH.

2. To esteem a thing properly. Matt. xi. 19, Wisdom is JUSTIFIED of her children. Wisdom, propriety of conduct, is properly estimated by wise men.

3. It signifies to approve, praise, and commend. The publicans JUSTIFIED God, Luke vii. 29, praised him for calling them to such a state of salvation. Ib. xvi. 15, Ye are they which JUSTIFY yourselves before God; ye are self-com- mended, self-applauded, and self-praised. In this sense it is often used in the Greek apocryphal books. Ecclus. vii. 5, JUSTIFY not thyself before the Lord; do not applaud thyself in the presence of thy Maker. Ib. x. 29, Who will JUSTIFY, (praise or applaud) him that sinneth against his own soul. Ib. xviii. 2, The Lord only is righteous, δικαιοσύνας, shall be JUSTIFIED, i. e. praised, because there is none other but he.

4. The verb δικαιοῦμαι is used to clear from all sin. 1 Cor. iv. 4, For I know nothing by myself; yet am I not hereby JUSTIFIED. A man's own consciousness of integrity, is not a proof that he is clear from all sin in the sight of God.

5. A judge is said to justify, not only when he condemns and punishes, but also when he defends the cause of the innocent. See EURIP. Heraclid. ver. 190. TRUCYD. iii. p. 200. POLYB. iii. 31. and SCHLEUSNER on δικαιοῦμαι. Hence δικαιοῦμαι, is taken in a forensic sense, and signifies to be found or declared righteous, innocent, &c. Matt. xii. 37, By thy words thou shalt be JUSTIFIED; thou shalt be declared to be righteous. Rom. iii. 4, That thou mightest be JUSTIFIED in thy sayings; that thou mightest be proved to be true in what thou hast said.

6. It signifies to set free, to escape from. Acts xiii. 39, And by him, all that believe are JUSTIFIED from all things, from which ye could not be JUSTIFIED by the law; by faith in Christ a man escapes those evils, which, otherwise, the law of Moses would inflict upon him. Rom. vi. 7, For he that is dead, δικαιοῦται, is JUSTIFIED, properly rendered by our translators, is FREED from sin.

7. It signifies also to receive one into favour, to pardon sin. Rom. viii. 30, Whom he called, them he also JUSTIFIED; he received them into favour and pardoned their sins. Luke xviii. 14, This man went down to his house JUSTIFIED; he humbled himself, repented of his iniquity, and God forgave his sin. Rom. iii. 20, By the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be JUSTIFIED; no soul can have his sins forgiven, through the observance of the Mosaic law. Ib. iv. 2, If Abraham were JUSTIFIED, (had his sins pardoned) by works. 1 Cor. vi. 11, Such were some of you, but ye are JUSTIFIED; ye are received into the divine favour, and have your sins forgiven. See Jam. ii. 21—25. Rom. iii. 24, 28. v. 1, 9. Galat. ii. 16, 17. iii. 11, 24. v. 4. Tit. iii. 7. In all these texts, the word justify is taken in the sense of remission of sins through faith in Christ Jesus; and does not mean making the person just or righteous, but treating him as if he were so, having already forgiven him his sins.

The just shall live by faith] This has been understood two ways: 1. that the just or righteous man cannot live a holy and useful life, without exercising continual faith in our Lord Jesus: which is strictly true; for He only, who has brought him into that state of salvation, can preserve him in it: and he stands by faith. 2. It is contended by some able critics that the words of the original text should be pointed thus: 'Ο δὲ δικαιοῦν τε πιστεύει, ζῶσιναι. The just by faith, shall live, that is, he alone that is justified by faith, shall be saved; which is also true, as it is impossible to get salvation in any other way. This last meaning is probably the true one, as the original text in Hab. ii. 4. speaks of those who believed the declarations of God when the Chaldeans besieged Jerusalem; and having acted conformably to them, they escaped with their lives.

Verse 18. For the wrath of God is revealed] The apostle has now finished his Preface, and comes to the grand subject of the epistle; namely, to show the absolute need of the Gospel of Christ, because of the universal corruption of mankind; which was so great as to incense the justice of God, and call aloud for the punishment of the world. 1. He shows that all the heathen nations were utterly corrupt, and deserved this threatened punishment. And this is the subject of the first chapter from verse 18 to the end. 2. He shows that the Jews, notwithstanding the greatness of their privileges, were no better than the Gentiles; and therefore the wrath of God was revealed against them also. This subject he treats in chap. ii. and chap. iii. 1—19. 3. He returns, as it were, on both, chap. iii. 20—31. and proves that as the Jews and Gentiles were equally corrupt, they could not be saved by the deeds of any law; that they stood equally in need of that salvation which God had provided; that both were equally entitled to that salvation, for God was the God of the Gentiles as well as of the Jews.

By οργή Θεοῦ, the wrath of God, we are not to understand any uneasy passion in the Divine Being: but the displeasure of his righteousness, which is expressed by the punishments inflicted on the ungodly, those who retain not God in their knowledge; and the unrighteous, those whose lives are profligate.

As in the Gospel, the righteousness of God is revealed for the salvation of the ungodly; so is the wrath of God revealed against the workers of iniquity. Those who refuse to be saved in the way revealed by his mercy, must be consumed in the way revealed by his justice.

Ungodliness] ἀσεβεία, from α, negative, and σεβω or σεβασμῶν, I worship, probably intended here to express Atheism, Polytheism, and idolatry of every kind.

Unrighteousness] ἀδικία, from α, negative, and δικαιοσύνη, justice, every thing contrary to strict morality; all viciousness and profligacy of conduct.

Who hold the truth in unrighteousness] In what sense could it be said that the heathen held the truth in unrighteousness, when they really had not that truth? Some think this refers to the conduct of their best philosophers, such as Socrates, Plato, Seneca, &c. who knew much more of the divine nature than they thought safe or prudent to discover; and who acted in many things contrary to the light which they enjoyed. Others think this to be spoken of the Gentiles in general, who either did know, or might have known much of God from the works of creation, as the apostle intimates in the following verses. But Rosenmüller, and some others, contend that the word κατήχων here does not signify to hold, but to hinder; and that the place should be translated, who through maliciousness hinder the truth; i. e. prevent it from taking hold of their hearts, and from governing their conduct. This is certainly a very usual acceptance of the verb κατήχων, which Hesychius interprets καταπέ, καλύπει, συνήχων, to retain, hinder, &c. these men hindering, by their vicious conduct, the truth of God from being propagated in the earth.

Verse 19. That which may be known of God] Dr. Taylor paraphrases this and the following verse thus: "Although the Gentiles had no written revelation, yet what may be known of God is every where manifest among them, God having made a clear discovery of himself to them. For his being and perfections, invisible to our bodily eyes, have been, ever since the creation of the world, evidently to be seen, if attentively considered, in the visible beauty, order, and operations observable in the constitution and parts of the universe; especially his eternal power and universal dominion and providence; so that they cannot plead ignorance in excuse of their idolatry and wickedness."

Verse 20. The invisible things of him] His invisible perfections are manifested by his visible works, and may be apprehended by what he has made: their immensity showing his omnipotence; their vast variety and contrivance, his omniscience; and their adaptation to the most beneficent purposes, his infinite goodness and philanthropy.

His eternal power] Αἰδίοῦ αὐτοῦ δυνάμει, that all-powerful energy that ever was, and ever will exist; so, that ever since there was a creation to be surveyed, there have been intelligent beings to make that survey.

And Godhead] Θεότης, his acting as God in the government and support of the universe. His works prove his being; the government and support of these works prove it equally. Creation and providence form a twofold demonstration of God, 1st. In the perfections of his nature, and, 2dly. In the exercise of those perfections.

Verse 21. Because that when they knew God] When they thus acquired a general knowledge of the unity and perfections of the divine nature; they glorified him not as God; they did not proclaim him to the people, but shut up his glory, (as Bishop Warburton expresses it) in their mysteries, and gave the people, in exchange for an incorruptible God, an image made like to corruptible man. Wherefore God, in punishment for their sins, thus turning his truth into a lie, suffered even their mysteries which they had erected for a school of virtue, to degenerate into an odious sink of vice and immorality; giving them up unto all uncleanness and vile affections.

They glorified him not.] They did not give him that worship which his perfections required.

Neither were thankful.] They manifested no gratitude for the blessings they received from his providence; but became vain in their imaginations; διανοησιμοις, in their reasonings. This certainly refers to the foolish manner in which even the wisest of their philosophers discoursed about the divine nature, not excepting Socrates, Plato, or Seneca. Who can read their works without being struck with the vanity of their reasonings, as well as with the stupidity of their nonsense, when speaking about God? I might crowd my page with proofs of this; but it is not necessary to those who are acquainted with their writings; and to others it would not be useful. In short, their foolish, darkened minds, sought God no where but in the place in which he is never to be found; viz. the vile corrupted and corrupting passions of their own hearts. As they did not discover him there, they scarcely sought him any where else.

Verse 22. Professing themselves to be wise.] This is most strikingly true of all the ancient philosophers, whether Greeks or Romans, as their works, which remain, sufficiently testify. The word σαρκωτικ, signifies not merely the professing, but the assumption of the philosophic character. In this sense the word σαρκω is used by the best Greek writers. See Kypke. A dispassionate examination of the doctrine and lives of the most famed philosophers of antiquity, of every nation, will show that they were darkened in their mind, and irregular in their conduct. It was from the Christian religion alone, 25 Who changed ^f the truth of God ^g into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature ^h more than the Creator, who is blessed for ever. Amen.

26 ⁱ For this cause God gave them up unto ^j vile affections: for even their women did change the natural use into that which is against nature:

that true philosophy and genuine philosophers sprung.

Verse 23. They changed the glory, &c.] The finest representation of their deities was in the human figure; and on such representative figures the sculptors spent all their skill; hence the HERCULES of Farnese, the VENUS of Medicis, and the APOLLO of Belvidere. And when they had formed their gods according to the human shape, they endowed them with human passions; and as they clothed them with attributes of extraordinary strength, beauty, wisdom, &c. not having the true principles of morality, they represented them as slaves to the most disorderly and disgraceful passions; excelling in irregularities the most profligate of men, as possessing unlimited powers of sensual gratification.

And to birds.] As the eagle of Jupiter among the Romans, and the Ibis and hawk among the Egyptians; which were all sacred animals.

Fourfooted beasts.] As the Apis, or white ox among the Egyptians; from which the idolatrous Israelites took their golden calf. The goat, the monkey, and the dog, were also sacred animals among the same people.

Creeping things.] Such as the crocodile and scarabeus, or beetle, among the Egyptians.

Verse 24. God gave them up, &c.] They had filled up the measure of their iniquities; and God, by permitting them to plunge into all manner of irregularities, thus, by one species of sin, inflicted punishment on another.

Dishonour their own bodies.] Probably alluding here to what is more openly expressed verses 26 and 27.

Between themselves.] Ἐν ἑαυτοῖς, of themselves, of their own free accord; none inciting, none impelling.

Verse 25. Changed the truth of God into a lie.] In the place of the true worship of God, they established idolatry. In various places of Scripture, idols are termed lies. Isai. xlv. 20. Jer. iii. 23. and xiii. 25. The true God was known among the primitive inhabitants of the earth; those who first became idolaters, literally changed the truth of God into a lie; they did know the true God, but they put idols in his place.

Verse 26. For this cause God gave them up, &c.] Their system of idolatry necessarily produced all kinds of impurity. How could it be otherwise, when the highest objects of their worship were adulterers, fornicators, and prostitutes of the most infamous kind ; such as Jupiter, Apollo, Mars, Venus, &c. Of the abominable evils with which the apostle charges the Gentiles in this and the following verse, I could produce a multitude of proofs from their own writings ; but it is needless to make the subject plainer than the apostle has left it.

Verse 27. Receiving in themselves that recompense, &c.] Both the women and men, by their unnatural prostitutions, enervated their bodies, so that barrenness prevailed ; and those disorders which are necessarily attendant on prostitution, and sodomitical practices.

Verse 28. They did not like to retain God] It would, perhaps, be more literal to translate οὐκ ἀναζητοῦντες, THEY DID NOT SEARCH to retain God in their knowledge. They did not examine the evidences before them (ver. 19 and 20.) of his being and attributes ; therefore God gave them over to a REPROBATE mind, σε ἀποδοῦναι νοῦν, to an UNSearching, or undiscerning mind ; for it is the same word in both places. They did not reflect on the proofs they had of the divine nature, and God abandoned them to the operations of a mind incapable of reflection. How men of such powers and learning, as many of the Greek and Roman philosophers and poets really were, could reason so inconsecutively concerning things moral and divine, is truly astonishing. But here we see the hand of a just and avenging God ; they abused their powers, and God deprived them of the right use of these powers.

Fornication] Πορνεία, all commerce between the sexes out of the bounds of lawful marriage. Some of the best MSS. omit this reading ; and others have ακαθαρσία, uncleanness.

Wickedness] Πονηρία, malignity, that which is oppressive to its possessor, and to its object ; from πονέω, labour, toil, &c.

Covetousness] Πλεονεξία, from πλεον, more, and ξείν, I will have, the intense love or lust of gain ; the determination to be rich ; the principle of a dissatisfied and discontented soul.

Maliciousness] Κακία, malice, ill-will, what is radically and essentially vicious.

29 Being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness ; full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity ; whisperers,

Full of envy] Φθόνος, from φθάνω, to wither, decay, consume, pine away, &c. " pain felt, and malignity conceived at the sight of excellence or happiness in another." A fine personification of this vice is found in OVID METAM. lib. ii. ver. 768—781. which I shall here insert, with Mr. Addison's elegant and nervous translation.

A poisonous morsel in her teeth she chewed,
 And gorg'd the flesh of vipers for her food.
 Minerva, loathing, turn'd away her eye,
 The hideous monster, rising heavily,
 Came stalking forward with a sullen pace,
 And left her mangled offals on the place.
 Soon as she saw the goddess gay and bright,
 She fetched a groan at such a cheerful sight.
 Livid and meagre were her looks, her eye
 In foul distorted glances turned awry :
 A hoard of gall her inward parts possess'd,
 And spread a greenness o'er her cancer'd

 Her teeth were brown with rust, and from her

In dangling drops the stringy poison hung.

 Restless in spite ; while watchful to destroy,
 She pines and sickens at another's joy :

Malignity] Κακοθυια, from κακος, evil, and υθος, a custom, bad customs, founded in corrupt sentiment, producing evil habits, supported by general usage. It is generally interpreted a malignity of mind, which leads its possessor to put the worst construction on every action; ascribing to the best deeds the worst motives.

Whisperers] Ψιθυρισται, secret detractors; those who, under pretended secrecy, carry about accusations against their neighbours, whether true or false; blasting their reputation by clandestine tittle tattle. This word should be joined to the succeeding verse.

Verse 30. Backbiters] καταλαλους, from κατα, against, and λαλω, I speak; those who speak against others: false accusers, slanderers.

Haters of God] Θεοσυνη, atheists, contemners of sacred things; maligners of providence: scorners, &c. All profligate Deists are of this class; and it seems to be the finishing part of a diabolic character.

Despiteful] Υβρισται, from υβριζω, to treat with injurious insolence: stormy, boisterous; abusing both the characters and persons of those over whom they can have any power.

Proud] Υπερηφανους; from υπε, above, or over: and φανω, I show, or shine. They who are continually exalting themselves and depressing others; magnifying themselves at the expense of their neighbours: and wishing all men to receive their sayings as oracles.

Boasters] Αλαζονικαι, from λαζωμαι, to assume; self-assuming, vain-glorious, and arrogant men.

Inventors of evil things] Εφευρηται κακων. Those who have invented destructive customs, rites, fashions, &c. such as the different religious ceremonies among the Greeks and Romans—the orgies of Bacchus, the mysteries of Ceres, the lupercalia, feasts of the Bona Dea, &c. &c. Multitudes of which evil things, destructive and abominable ceremonies, are to be found in every part of the heathen worship.

Disobedient to parents] Though filial affection was certainly more recommended and cultivated than many other virtues; yet there are many instances on record of the grossest violation of this great branch of the law of nature.

Verse 31. Without understanding] Ανοητους; from α, negative, and οητης, knowing; persons incapable of comprehending what was spoken; destitute of capacity for spiritual things.

Covenant breakers] Ανοητους, from α, negative, and οητης, to make an agreement. Persons who could be bound by no oath, because, properly speaking, they had no God to witness or avenge their misconduct. As every covenant, or agreement, is made as in the presence of God: so he that opposes the being and doctrine of God, is incapable of being bound by any covenant; he can give no pledge for his conduct.

Without natural affection] Ασπρυς; without that attachment which nature teaches the young of all animals to have to their mothers; and the mothers to have for their young. The heathens, in general, have made no scruple to expose the children they did not think proper to bring up; and to despatch their parents, when they were grown old or past labour.

Implacable] Ασπονδους, from α, negative; and σπονδη, a libation. It was customary among all nations to pour out wine as a libation to their gods, when making a treaty. This was done to appease the angry gods, and reconcile them to the contracting parties. The word here shows a deadly enmity; the highest pitch of an unforgiving spirit; in a word, persons who would not make reconciliation either to God or man.

Unmerciful] Ανταμιμοναι; those who were incapable, through the deep rooted wickedness of their own nature, of showing mercy to an enemy, when brought under their power; or doing any thing for the necessitous, from the principle of benevolence or commiseration.

Verse 32. Who, knowing the judgment of God] Δικαιογνωμα, the grand rule of right, which God has revealed to every man—the knowledge of which he has, less or more, given to every nation of the world, relative to honouring parents; taking care of their own offspring; keeping their engagements, &c. &c. In the worst states of heathenism, this great principle has been acknowledged; but through the prevalence of corruption in the heart, this law, though acknowledged, was not obeyed; and the corruption increased so, that those were highest in repute who had cast off all restraints of this kind; so that they even delighted in them; συνηθηκουσι, highly applauded, and gladly associated with those transgressors; which argues the very highest pitch of moral depravity.

1. The preceding chapter gives us one of the finest views of the Gospel of Christ, to be met with any where. It is God's method of saving a lost world; in a way in which that world could never have imagined: there is nothing human in it; it is all truly and gloriously divine: essentially necessary to the salvation of man; and fully adequate to the purposes of its institution. Though it is an extension of the Old Covenant, yet it is almost wholly dissimilar; being as different from that as the person is from the picture by which he is represented, and as the substance is from the shadow projected by it. It is a scheme as worthy of God, as it is necessary for man; hence, there are no excluding clauses in it—it is for the Jew and for the Greek; for the wise, and for the unwise; for all the nations of the universe; and for all the individuals of those nations.

2. As God never does any thing that is not fitting, suitable, and necessary to be done; he has not made an unnecessary display of his mercy and goodness in the incarnation and death of his Son—all this was necessary, else it had not been done. But how does the necessity appear?—In the deep rooted, and widely extended, corruption and profligacy of the nations of the earth. Of these the apostle gives a most affecting and distressing picture. 1. Almost every trace of original righteousness had been obliterated. 2. The proofs of God's eternal power and providence, so manifest in the creation and preservation of the universe, were wholly disregarded. 3. A vain philosophy, without right, principle, or end, was substituted for those divine truths which had been discovered originally to man. 4. Their hearts were contaminated with every vice which could blind the understanding, pervert the judgment, corrupt the will, and debase the affections and passions. 5. This was proved in the most unequivocal manner, by a profligacy of conduct which had debased them far, far below the beasts that perish; and the apostle here gives a list of their crimes, every article of which can be incontrovertibly proved, from their own history, and their own writers: crimes which, even bad as the world is now, would shock common decency to describe. See the whole of the second, third, sixth, and ninth satires of Juvenal.

3. So completely lost were the heathens to a knowledge of the influence of God on the soul, and the necessity of that influence; that they asserted, in the most positive manner, that man was the author of his own virtue and wisdom. Cicero, Nat. Deor. lib. iii. c. 36. declares it a general opinion that, although mankind received from the gods the outward conveniences of life—virtutem autem nemo unquam acceptam Deo retulit—“but virtue none ever thought they received from the Deity.” And again, “this is the persuasion of all, that fortune is to be had from the gods: wisdom from ourselves.” And again, “who ever thanked the gods for his being a good man? Men pray to Jupiter, not that he would make them just, temperate, and wise: but rich and prosperous.”

JUVENAL, on this point, speaks thus:—

Tranquilla per virtutem patet unica vita.*
Sat. x. v. 363.

The path to peace is virtue: which I show,
Thyself may fully on thyself bestow.

In the same strain, HORACE, Epist. lib. i. E. xviii. v. penult.

Hæc satis est orare Jovem, qui donat et aufert: Det vilam, det opes: æquum mi animum ipse parabo.

To Jove for life and wealth I pray;
These Jove may give or take away:
But for a firm and tranquil mind,
That blessing for myself I find.

Thus, they became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened; and professing themselves to be wise, they became fools. See Madan's Juvenal, Vol. ii. p. 53.

4. By all this we see what the world was, and what it would have continued to be, had not God sent a Divine revelation of his will; and established a public ministry to proclaim and enforce it. Were man left to the power and influence of his fallen nature, he would be in all places of his dispersion on the earth, what the apostle describes in the 29th, 30th, and 31st verses of this chapter.

Reader, magnify God, who has called thee from such deep darkness, to the marvellous light of the glorious Gospel of his Son; and walk as a child of the light and of the day, in whom there shall be no cause of stumbling.

CHAPTER II.

The apostle shows that the Jew who condemns the Gentiles, and considers them utterly unworthy of the blessings of the Gospel, is inexcusable, because he is guilty of the same crimes; and therefore shall not escape the righteous judgment of God, 1—3. It is an awful thing to despise the goodness and long suffering of God, which lead to repentance, 4, 5. God, the impartial judge, will render to every man according to his works, 6—11. The Jews and the Gentiles will be judged according to their respective advantages and disadvantages, 12, 13. In some cases, the Gentiles who had no law, have shown a better disposition than the Jews, 14—16. The Jews, by their unfaithfulness, have been a stumbling block to the Gentiles, 17—24. Jewish rites and ceremonies of no advantage, unless productive of change of heart and conduct, 25. The Gentiles who attend to the small light which they have received from God, are in a better state than the unfaithful Jews, with all their superior religious privileges, 26, 27. What constitutes a real Jew in the sight of God, 28, 29.

the reformation and salvation of man. And how rich is the favour wherewith God has visited the world! To have destroyed a race of apostate rebels, who had abused their understandings and every gift of a bountiful Creator, would have been justice; to have spared them would have been lenity and goodness: but to send his only begotten Son from heaven to redeem us from all iniquity and ungodliness by his own blood; to grant us a free pardon for all our sins; to put us in a state of mercy and salvation; to take us into his kingdom and family; to give us an inheritance among his saints; to bless us with immortality, and all spiritual blessings in heavenly places, this is most wonderful and exuberant favour. Rightly is the doctrine which teaches it called the Gospel, or glad tidings; one would think, it could not possibly have met with opposition from any part of mankind. But the Jew opposed it! He abhorred the Gentile; and contradicted the grace, that honoured and saved him. The apostle pleads and defends our cause. His business is to confound the Jew, and to prove that we have as good a right as he, to all the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom. And by his description of the vicious state of the Gentiles in the former chapter: he has wisely made his advantage of the prejudices of the Jew: for nothing could please him more than the preceding discourse, in which the Gentiles are reduced to so vile and abject a state. Thus, the apostle gives him an opportunity to condemn the Gentiles; but he does this that he may the more effectually humble him in this chapter; in which he proves, that the Jews, having, in an aggravated manner, despised the goodness, and broken the law of God, were as obnoxious to his wrath as the Gentiles; and if so, how could they, with any conscience or modesty, arrogate all the Divine mercy to themselves; or pretend that others were unworthy of it, when they had done as much or more to forfeit it? Must they not exclude themselves from being the people of God under the Gospel, by the same reason that they would have the Gentiles excluded? But this was an argument highly ungrateful to the Jew; and it would be very difficult to fix any conviction upon his mind. Therefore the apostle addresses him in a covert way, Thou art therefore inexcusable, O man! whosoever thou art, that judgest; not giving out expressly that he meant the Jew, that the Jew might more calmly attend to his reasoning, while he was not apprehensive that he was the man. This point secured, the apostle very judiciously, and with great force of reasoning, turns his thoughts from his present superior advantages, to the awful day of judgment, ver. 5, 6. when God, in the most impartial equity, will render to all mankind, without exception, according to their works. Thus the apostle grounds his following argument, very methodically, and solidly, in God's equal regards to all men, in all nations, who uprightly practise truth and godliness; and his disapproving, and at last condemning all men, in any nation, however privileged, who live wickedly. This was a blow at the root; and demolished, in the most effectual manner, the Jew's prejudices in favour of his own nation, and the unkind thoughts he had entertained of the Gentiles. For, if a Jew could be convinced that a sober, upright heathen, might be blessed with eternal salvation; he must be persuaded that it was no absurd matter that believing Gentiles should now be pardoned, and taken into the visible church.—Thus the apostle advances with great skill; insinuating himself by degrees into the Jew's conscience. This reasoning is well adapted to encourage the Gentile, humbled by the dismal representation in the preceding chapter; for he would here see that he was not utterly abandoned of God, but might, upon good grounds, hope for his mercy and kindness."

Verse 1. Who judgest] Ὁ ἄνθρωπος, the judger; thou who assumes the character of a judge; and in that character, condemnest others who are less guilty than thyself.

Verse 2. We are sure that the judgment of God, &c.] God is impartial, and will punish sin wheresoever he finds it. Transgression in a Jew, is not less criminal than iniquity in a Gentile.

Verse 4. Or despisest thou the riches of his goodness] Wilt thou render of none effect that marked benevolence of God towards thee, which has given so many superior advantages; and that forbearance which has tolerated thy many miscarriages; and that long suffering, which, after repeated provocations, still continues to bear with thee?

Not knowing] ἄγνων, not acknowledging, that this goodness of God, which has so long manifested itself in forbearance and long suffering, leadeth thee to repentance; was designed to accomplish this blessed end; which thy want of consideration and acknowledgment has rendered hitherto, ineffectual. This was a maxim among the Jews themselves; for, in Synopsis Sohar, it is said, the holy blessed God delays his anger against the wicked, to the end that they may repent and be converted.

Verse 5. But after thy hardness] Occasioned by thy long course of iniquity. And impenitent heart; produced by thy hardness, through which thou art callous to the calls and exhortations of conscience. Treasures up; continuest to increase thy debt to the Divine justice, which will infallibly inflict wrath; punishment, in the day of wrath: the judgment day, in which he will render to every man according to his works. The word treasure, the Hebrew uses to express any kind of store, or collection:—Treasure, or plenty of ruin. Deut. xxviii. 12, The Lord shall open unto thee his good TREASURE, to give the RAIN unto thy land.—Treasure, of punishment. Deut. xxxii. 34, 35, Is not this sealed up among my TREASURES? To me belongeth VENGEANCE and RECOMPENSE.—Treasures of mines, i. e. abundance of minerals. Deut. xxxiii. 19, They shall seek of the ABUNDANCE of the seas, and of TREASURES hid in the sand. So treasures of gold, silver, corn, wine, oil, &c. mean collections, or an abundance of such things; the word is used by the Greek writers precisely in the same sense. By wrath, we are to understand punishment, as in chap. i. 18. and is used so by the very best Greek writers. See Kypka.

The treasure of wrath, in this verse, is opposed to the riches of goodness, in the preceding. As surely as thou despisest, or neglectest to improve the riches of God's goodness, so surely thou shalt share in the TREASURES of his WRATH. The punishment shall be proportioned to the mercy thou hast abused.

Verse 6. Who will render] Who, in the day of judgment, will reward and punish every man according as his life and conversation have been.

Verse 7. To them, &c.] In this manner will God, in the great day, dispense punishments and rewards: 1. He will give eternal life to them, who, in all the trials and difficulties of the present state, have persevered in well doing; seeking for, and expecting glory, honour, and immortality.

Verse 8. But unto them, &c.] 2. He will manifest his indignation, and inflict wrath, punishment, on all who are contentious, who obstinately dispute against the truth, and obey unrighteousness; who act under the influence of the principle of sin, and not under the influence of the Spirit of God.

Verse 9. Tribulation and anguish] Misery of all descriptions, without the possibility of escape, will this righteous Judge inflict upon every impenitent sinner. The Jew first, as possessing greater privileges; and having abused greater mercies: and also on the Gentile, who, though he had not the same advantages, had what God saw was sufficient for his state; and having sinned against them, shall have punishment proportioned to his demerit.

Verse 10. But glory, honour, and peace] While the finally impenitent Jew and Gentile shall experience the fullest effects of the righteous indignation of the Supreme Judge; every man that worketh good, that lives in a conscientious obedience to the known will of God, whether he be Jew or Gentile, shall have glory, honour, and peace; i. e. eternal blessedness.

Verse 11. For, there is no respect of persons with God.] The righteous Judge will not act according to any principle of partiality; the character and conduct alone, of the persons, shall weigh with him. He will take no wicked man to glory, let his nation or advantages be what they may: and he will send no righteous man to perdition, though brought up in the very bosom of Gentilism. And as he will judge in that day, according to character and conduct: so his judgment will proceed on the ground of the graces, privileges, and blessings, which they had received, improved, or abused. And, as there is no respect of persons with God in judgment; so there can be none in the previous administration of his saving blessings: he that will be condemned for his unrighteousness, will be condemned on the ground that he had sufficient grace afforded him for the salvation of his soul: and his condemnation will rest on the simple principle, that he abused the grace which was sufficient to save him; by acting in opposition to its dictates and influence. No man, in that great day, shall be brought to heaven through any partiality of the Judge: and no man sent to hell, because God did not afford him sufficient grace; or because he had made a decree, which rendered even his use of it, ineffectual to his salvation. of God, in the salvation of man, it shall be said, in time, at the day of Judgment, and throughout eternity, THERE IS NO RESPECT OF PERSONS WITH GOD.

Verse 12. For, as many as have sinned without law, &c.] They, viz. the Gentiles, who shall be found to have transgressed against the mere light of nature; or rather, that true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world, John i. ver. 9. shall not come under the same rule with those, the Jews, who have, in addition to this, enjoyed an extraordinary revelation :
but they shall be dealt with according to the inferior dispensation under which they lived ; whilst those, the Jews, who have sinned against the law, the positive divine revelation granted to them, shall be judged by that law : and punished proportionably to the abuse of such an extraordinary advantage.

Verse 13. For, not the hearers of the law, &c.]
It does not follow that because one people are favoured with a divine revelation, that therefore they shall be saved : while the others, who have not had that revelation, shall finally perish : this is not God's procedure ; where he has given a law, a divine revelation, he requires obedience to that law ; and only those who have been doers of that law, who have lived according to the light and privileges granted in that revelation, shall be justified : shall be finally acknowledged to be such as are fit for the kingdom of God.

Verse 14. For, when the Gentiles, which have not the law, &c.] Nor does it follow that the Gentiles who have not had a divine revelation, shall either perish, because they had it not ; or their unrighteous conduct pass unpunished ; because, not having this revelation, might be considered an excuse for their sins :—

Do by nature the things contained in the law]
Do without this divine revelation, through that light which God imparts to every man, the things contained in the law, act according to justice, mercy, temperance, and truth, the practice of which the revealed law so powerfully enjoins ; these are a law unto themselves, they are not accountable to any other law ; and are not to be judged by any dispensation different from that under which they live.

Rabbi Tanchum brings in the Supreme Being as saying—When I have decreed any thing against the Gentiles, to whom I have not given laws and statutes, and they know what I have decreed, immediately they repent ; but the Israelites do not so. Tanchum, fol. 43. 2.

Verse 15. Which shew the work of the law]
In acting according to justice, mercy, temperance, and truth ; they show that the great object of the law, which was to bring men from injustice, cruelty, intemperance, and falsity, is accomplished so far in them : their conscience also bearing witness : that faculty of the soul, where that divine light dwells and works, shows them that they are right ; and thus they have a comfortable testimony in their own souls, of their own integrity : their thoughts, the mean while, accusing or else excusing, one another ; or, rather, their reasonings between one another, accusing or annoering for themselves : as if the apostle had said—And this point, that they have a law, and act according to it, is further proved from their conduct in civil affairs ; and from that correct sense which they have of natural justice in their debates, either in their courts of law, or in their treatises on morality. All these are ample proofs that God has not left them without light ; and that, seeing they have such correct notions of right and wrong, they are accountable to God for their conduct, in reference to these notions and principles. This seems to be the true meaning of this difficult clause. See below.

Verse 16. In the day when God shall judge]
And all this shall be further exemplified and proved in the day that God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ ; which judgment shall be according to my Gospel ; according to what I am now laying down before you, relative to the impartiality of God, and his righteous procedure in judging men, not according to their opinions or prejudices, not according to revelations which they never possessed ; but according to the various advantages or disadvantages of their political, religious, or domestic situation in life.

Much stress has been laid on the word now, by nature, in ver. 14. as if the apostle designed to intimate that nature, independently of the influence of divine grace, possessed such principles as were sufficient to guide a man to glory.
But certainly the term cannot be so understood here. I rather think that the sense given to it reverò, CERTAINLY, TRULY, is its sense here: for when the Gentiles, which have not the law, οὐρα νου, TRULY, or in effect, do the things contained in the law, &c. This seems to be its sense in Galat. iv. 8. When ye knew not God, ye did service to them which οὐρα, CERTAINLY are no gods; i. e. are false gods. Suicer quotes Cyril of Alexandria, (sub Anathematismo iii. in Actis Ephesinis, p. 212.) speaking of the union of the two natures in Christ, he calls this union, οὐραν, natural; that is, says he, αληθ, true or real. He adds, that the word should be thus understood in Ephes. ii. 3. we were by nature, οὐρα, children of wrath; and says, οὐρα, αρι του, αληθ ος. οὐρα, is herused for αληθ, TRULY; we were TRULY, INCONTESTABLY, the children of wrath, even as others. That is, like the rest of mankind, we have all sinned, and come short of the glory of God; and consequently are exposed to punishment. Some think that this text refers to the natural corruption of man; but although it is true that man comes into the world corrupt, and that all men, since the fall, are very far gone from original righteousness, yet it is not clear that the text in Eph. ii. 3. speaks of any other thing than the effects of this degeneracy. See the note there.

I prefer this sense, in the passage in question, to that which says the light of nature, or natural instinct, is here meant: for I know of no light in nature that is not kindled there by the grace of God. But I have no objection to this sense, "When the Gentiles, which have not the law, do, by the influence of God upon their hearts, the things contained in the law, they are a law unto themselves; that light and influence serving instead of a divine revelation." That the Gentiles did really do the things contained in the law, in reference to what is termed natural justice: and made the wisest distinctions relative to the great principles of the doctrine of civil rights and wrongs; every man conversant with their writings will admit. And in reference to this, the word οὐρα, may be legitimately understood thus—they incontestably did the things contained in the law, &c.

The passage in ver. 15. their thoughts, accusing or excusing one another, certainly does not refer to any expostulations or operations of conscience; for this is referred to in the preceding clause. The words accusing, κατηγορουμενος, and excusing, απελογουμενος, answering, or defending, one another; μεταξυ αλληλων, among themselves; are all forensic, or law terms; and refer to the mode of conducting suits of law in courts of justice, where one is plaintiff, who produces his accusation: another is defendant, who rebuts the charge, and defends himself; and then the business is argued before the judges. This process shows that they have a law of their own; and that to this law it belongs to adjust differences; to right those who have suffered wrong; and to punish the guilty.

As to the phrase, written in their hearts, it is here opposed to the Jewish laws, which were written on tables of stone. The Jews drew the maxims by which their conduct was regulated, from a divine revelation: the GENTILES theirs, from what God, in the course of his providence and gracious influence, had shown them to be right, useful, and necessary. And with them this law was well known and affectionately regarded: for this is one meaning of the phrase written in the heart. It was from this true light, enlightening the Gentiles, that they had so many wise and wholesome laws; laws which had been among them from time immemorial; and of which they did not know the origin. Thus Sophocles, in the noble speech which he puts in the mouth of Antigone—

 Ζη ταυτα, κ' ουδεις οδιν εξ ουσ παρ'.

"Not now, nor yesterday, but evermore
 The laws have liv'd: nor know we whence they came."

Antig. ver. 463—4. These are the laws, νομιμα, which the Spirit of God wrote originally on their hearts; and which, in different forms, they had committed to writing.

Verse 17. Behold, thou art called a Jew] What the apostle had said in the preceding verses, being sufficient to enforce conviction on the conscience of the Jew, he now throws off the cover, and openly argues with him in the most plain and nervous manner; asserting that his superior knowledge, privileges, and profession, served only to aggravate his condemnation. And that, in fact, he who under all his greater advantages transgressed the law of God, stood condemned by the honest Gentile, who, to the best of his knowledge, obeyed it. Dr. Taylor.

And restand in the law] Thou trustest in it for thy endless salvation. The word πιστασαι, implies the strongest confidence of safety and security. Thou reposest thy whole trust and confidence in this law.

And makest thy boast of God] That thou knowest his nature and attributes, which are not known to the Gentiles. The word καυχασαι, implies the idea of exulting in any thing, as being a proper object of hope and dependance: and, when referred to God, it points out that HE is the sure cause of hope, dependance, joy, and happiness. And that it is the highest honour to be called to know his name, and be employed in his service. As if the apostle had said, you rejoice in God as the object of your hope and dependance: you praise and magnify him; you account it your greatest honour that HE is your God; and that you worship him. See Taylor.

Verse 18. Knowest his will] Have been favoured with a revelation of his own will, immediately from himself.

The things that are more excellent] Τα διασημωτα, the things that differ; that revelation which God has given of himself, makes the nicest distinctions between right and wrong; between vice and virtue; showing how you should walk so as to please God; and, consequently, acquire the most excellent portion that human spirits can have on this side heaven: for all these blessings ye acknowledge to receive from your law, being instructed, κατασκευαστος, being catechised from your infancy in the knowledge of divine things.

Verse 19. And art confident, &c.] In consequence of all these religious advantages ye believe, that ye are able to teach others, and to be guides and lights to the bewildered, darkened Gentiles, who may become proselytes to your religion.

Verse 20. An instructor of the foolish, &c.] Ye believe the Gentiles to be babes and fools, when compared with yourselves: that ye alone possess the only true knowledge; that ye are the only favourites of heaven; and that all nations must look up to you as possessing the only form of knowledge, μακροθεν της γραμματος, the grand scheme and draught of all true science; of every thing that is worthy to be learned; the system of eternal truth, derived from the law. If, therefore, ye act not as becomes those who have such eminent advantages, it must be to your endless disgrace and infamy.

Verse 21. Thou therefore] Dr. Taylor has paraphrased this, and the three following verses, thus—"What signify your pretensions to knowledge, and the office of teaching others; if you have no regard to your own doctrine? What are you the better for preaching against theft, if you are a thief yourself? Or for declaring adultery unlawful, if you live in the practice of it? Or for representing idolatry abominable, if you are guilty of sacrilege? What honours, or singular favours, do you deserve, if, while you glory in the law and your religious privileges, you dishonour God, and discredit his religion by transgressing his law, and living in open contradiction to your profession? than supposition; notorious instances might be produced of the forementioned crimes, whereby the Jews of the present age have brought a reproach upon religion among the Gentiles; as well as those Jews of former times, of whom the prophet Ezekiel speaks, chap. xxxvi. 23. And I will sanctify my great name, which was profaned among the heathen; which ye have profaned in the midst of them."

That the Jewish priesthood was exceedingly corrupt in the time of the apostle, and that they were so, long before, is fully evident from the Sacred Writings, and from Josephus. The high priesthood was a matter of commerce; and was bought and sold like other commodities. Of this, Josephus gives many instances. The rapine of Eh's sons descended to several generations. Dr. Whitby well observes, that of all these things mentioned by the apostle, the Jewish doctors were notoriously guilty; and of most of them they were accused by our Lord. 1. They said and did not; and laid heavy burdens upon others, which they would not touch with their own fingers, Matt. xxiii. 3, 4. 2. They made the house of God a den of thieves, Matt. xxi. 13. John ii. 16. They were guilty of adultery, by unjust divorces, Matt. xix. 9. 4. Their polygamy was scandalous: even their rabbins, when they came to any place, would proclaim, Who will be my wife for a day? As to idolatry, they were perfectly saved from it, ever since the Babylonish captivity; but to this succeeded sacrilege, as is most evident in the profanation of the temple, by their commerce transacted even within its courts. And their teaching the people that even their aged parents might be left to starve, provided the children made a present to the temple, of that which should have gone for their support. According to Josephus, Bek. Jud. l. vi. c. 26. they were guilty of theft, treachery, adultery, sacrilege, rapine, and murder. And he adds, that new ways of wickedness were invented by them; and that, of all their abominations, the temple was the receptacle. In his Antiquities of the Jews, b. xx. c. 8. he says, The servants of the high-priests took away by violence, the tythes of the priests, so that many of them perished for want of food. Even their own writers acknowledged that there were great irregularities and abominations among the rabbins.

So Bereshith Rabba, sect. 55. fol. 54.—“ Rabbi Abun proposed a parable concerning a master, who taught his disciple not to pervert justice, and yet did it himself; not to show respect of persons, and yet did it himself; not to receive bribes, and yet received them himself; not to take usury, and yet took it himself: the disciple replied—“ Rabbi, thou teachest me not to take usury, and yet thou takest it thyself! Can that be lawful to thee which is forbidden to me?”

Verse 24. For the name of God is blasphemed, &c.] In Debarim rabba, sect. 2. fol. 251. it is said, “ The rulers destroy the influence of their own words among the people; and this is done, when a rabbin, sitting and teaching in the academy, says—do not take usury, and himself takes it; do not commit rapine, and himself commits it; do not steal, and himself steals.” That they were exceedingly lax in their morals, the following fact proves: “ Rabbi Hlai said, if a man sees that his evil propensities are likely to prevail against him, let him go to some place where he is not known, and let him put on black clothes and cover his head with a black veil; and then let him do whatsoever he pleaseth, lest the name of God should be publicly profaned.” Maad katon, fol. 17. 1. In Sohar levi. fol. 31. col. 122. it is said, “ On three accounts the Jews are obliged to remain in captivity—1. Because they openly reproach the Shechinah—2. Because they profane themselves before the Shechinah—3. Because they turn away their faces from the Shechinah.”

But it would be endless to collect from their history, the proofs of the charges brought here against them by the apostle. See Whitby, Schoetgen, and others.

Verse 25. For circumcision verily profiteth] It is a blessing to belong to the church of God, and wear the sign of the covenant; provided the terms of the covenant are complied with.

But if thou be a breaker of the law] If thou do not observe the conditions of the covenant; the outward sign is both without meaning and without effect. This was a maxim of the Rabbins themselves; for they allowed that an apostate or ungodly Israelite, must go to hell, notwithstanding his circumcision.

Verse 26. Therefore, if the uncircumcision, &c.] If the Gentile be found to act according to the spirit and design of the law, his acting thus uprightly, according to the light which God has afforded him, will be reckoned to him as if he were circumcised, and walked agreeably to the law.

Verse 27. And shall not uncircumcision, which is by nature] And shall not the Gentile, who is, ex natura, according to the custom of his country; who is by birth not obliged to be circumcised.

If it fulfil the law] If such a person act according to the spirit and design of the law; judge, spero, condemn thee, who, whilst thou dost enjoy the letter, the written law; and bearest in thy body the proof of the circumcision which it requires, dost transgress that law?

Verse 28. For he is not a Jew] A genuine member of the church of God, who has only an outward profession.

Neither is that circumcision] Circumcision is a rite which represents a spiritual thing, viz. the change and purification of the heart, as may be seen, Jer. iv. 4, 6, 10. ix. 26. Ezek. xlv. 7, 9.

Verse 29. But he is a Jew] A true member of the church of God.

Which is one inwardly] Who has his heart purified, according to what God has uniformly prescribed by his prophets, see above; for circumcision is of the heart, in the spirit, σ πνευματι, by the Spirit of God, who is the author of all spiritual affections and holy purposes: for every thing here is to be understood spiritually, and not literally; for without holiness none can please God, and without holiness, none can see him.

Whose praise is not of men] It has, with great probability, been conjectured, that the apostle may here refer to the signification of the name Jew or Judah, יהודה Yehudah, PRAISE, from יהוה Yadah, he PRAISES. Such a one is a true Israelite, who walks in conformity to the spirit of his religion; his countrymen may praise him because he is a steady professor of the Jewish faith; but God praises him because he has entered into the spirit and design of the covenant made with Abraham; and has got the end of his faith, the salvation of his soul. Sentiments like these, on the same subject, may be found in the ancient Jewish writers. Rabbi Lipman gives the opinion of their most ancient and pure writers in these words: "A certain Christian mocked us, saying, 'Women, who cannot be circumcised, cannot be reckoned among Jews.' Such persons are ignorant that faith does not consist in circumcision, but in the heart. He who has not genuine faith, is not a partaker of the Jewish circumcision; but he who has genuine faith, is a Jew, although not circumcised." NIZZACHON, Num. 21. p. 19. It is a curious maxim of the Talmudists, That the Jews sit in the inmost recesses of the heart. NIDDA, fol. 20. 2. This is exactly the sentiment of St. Paul, circumcision of the heart, in the spirit. In short, common sense, as well as their law and their prophets, taught every considerate man among them, that God could be pleased with their rites and external performances, no further than they led to holiness of heart, and righteousness of life.

1. What the apostle says in the preceding chapter concerning the Gentiles doing by nature, the things contained in the law, if properly considered, would lead certain persons from forming erroneous judgments concerning the divine dispensations. We are not to suppose that God is not to be found, where his written word does not appear; nor, that the salvation of the nations yet unblest with the light of the Gospel, is impossible. God has never confined himself to any one particular way, of communicating his salvation; no more than he has confined his saving grace to one people. His word is an indescribable blessing; but that word becomes effectual to salvation, when accompanied by the power of the Holy Spirit. It was that Spirit which gave the word originally; and that same Spirit can speak without this word. It is through his influence alone, that the Gentiles do the things contained in his own law; and it is not to be wondered at, that the work is the same, both in the law and in the heart, when it has proceeded from the same Spirit.

2. God therefore will judge all nations according to the use and abuse they have made of this word, whether it was written in the heart, or written on tables of stone.

3. As he is no respecter of persons, all nations are equally dear to him; and he has granted, and will grant to them, such discoveries of himself, as have been, and will be, sufficient for their salvation.

4. His Word is an infinite blessing; and he has given it to one people, that they may be the means of conveying it to another. Europe, and especially Christian Europe, has got the BIBLE; and God requires Europe to send the Bible throughout the earth. If this be not done through their neglect, the Gentile nations will not be destroyed by a merciful God; yet the Europeans will have a most solemn and awful account to render to their Judge, that they have hidden the heavenly light under their own bushel. BRITAIN is shaking herself from the dust, and by means of the BRITISH and FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY is sending the Holy Scriptures to every kingdom, and nation, and people, and tongue. The Gentiles are now learning from the written law more fully and savingly what the Spirit of God had before written on their hearts; and it seems as if the kingdom of God were now about to come, with all-conquering power.

CHAPTER III.

The apostle points out the peculiar privileges of the Jews, 1—8. but shows that they also, as well as the Gentiles, had sinned, and forfeited all right and title to God's especial favour, 9. The corrupt state of all mankind, 10—18. All the world is guilty before God, and none can be justified by the works of the law, 19, 20. God's MERCY in providing redemption for a lost world, by Jesus Christ, 21—26. This excludes boasting on the part, both of Jews and Gentiles; provides salvation through faith for both, and does not set aside, but establishes the law, 27—31.

NOTES ON CHAP. III.

Dr. Taylor observes, "In the preceding chapter, the apostle has carried his argument to the utmost length; what remains is to keep the Jew in temper, to fix his convictions, and to draw the grand conclusion.

"He has shown that the Jews were more wicked than the Gentiles; that their possession of the law, circumcision, and outward profession of relation to God, were no ground of acceptance with him. This was, in effect, to say, that the Jews had forfeited their right to the privileges of God's peculiar people; and that they were as unworthy to be continued in the church, as the Gentiles were to be taken into it; and, consequently, in order to their enjoying the privileges of the church under the Messiah, they stood in need of a fresh display of grace, which, if they rejected, God would cast them out of the vineyard. The apostle was sensible that the Jew would understand what he said in this sense; and that it must be very irritating to him, to hear that his law, circumcision, and all his external advantages, were utterly insufficient to procure him the favour of God. This at once stripped him of all his peculiar honours and privileges: and the apostle, who had often argued with his countrymen on these points, knew what they would be ready to say on this subject; and, therefore, introduces a dialogue between himself and a Jew, in which he gives him leave to answer and defend himself. In this dialogue, the apostle undoubtedly refers to the rejection of the Jews, which he considers at large in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters. After the dialogue is finished, he resumes his argument, and proves by their own scriptures, that the Jews were guilty as well as other men; and that no part of mankind could have any right to the blessings of God's kingdom by any works which they had performed; but merely through the propitiatory sacrifice offered by Christ; and that this, far from destroying the law, was just the thing that the law required, and by which its claims were established.

"The sum and force of the apostle's argument is this, all sorts of men, Jews as well as Gentiles, have sinned; therefore, none of them can lay claim to the blessings of his kingdom on the ground of obedience. The Jew, therefore, stands as much in need of God's grace to give him a title to those blessings, as the Gentile: and, consequently, the Gentile has as good a title as the Jew. And when all are in the same circumstances, it is perfectly absurd for any to pretend to engross it to themselves exclusively of others, who are only as bad as they.

"Thus the apostle solidly proves, that we Gentiles, through faith alone, have a good and firm title to all the blessings of the Gospel covenant, election, adoption, pardon, privileges, ordinances, the Holy Spirit, and the hope of eternal life. Taylor's Notes, p. 259, 260.

As the nine first verses are a dialogue between the apostle and a Jew, I shall prefix the speakers to their respective questions and answers, to make the whole the more intelligible to the reader.

Verse 1. JEW.—What advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there of circumcision? As if he had said, you lately allowed (chap. ii. 25.) that circumcision verily profited; but if circumcision, or our being in covenant with is written, 'That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings, and mightest overcome when thou art judged.

5 But if our unrighteousness commend

God, raises us no higher in the divine favour than the Gentiles; if the virtuous among them are as acceptable as any of us, may, and condemn our nation too, as no longer deserving the divine regards; pray tell me, wherein lies the superior honour of the Jew; and what benefit can arise to him from his circumcision, and being vested in the privileges of God's peculiar people?

Verse 2. APOSTLE.—Much every way] The Jews, in reference to the means and motives of obedience, enjoy many advantages, beyond the Gentiles, and principally, because to them were committed the oracles of God; that revelation of his will to Moses and the prophets, containing a treasure of excellencies, with which no other part of the world has been favoured; though they have most grievously abused these privileges.

Verse 3. JEW.—For what? Ti yaq, what then? if some did not believe, &c. If some of the Jewish nation have abused their privileges, and acted contrary to their obligations, shall their wickedness annul the promise which God made to Abraham, that he would, by an everlasting covenant, be a God to him, and to his seed after him, Gen. xvii. 7. Shall God, therefore, by stripping the Jews of their peculiar honour, as you intimate he will, falsify his promise to the nation, because some of the Jews are bad men?

Verse 4. APOSTLE.—God forbid] Ma yaq, let it not be, far from it, by no means. Yea, let God be true, but every man a liar, &c. We must ever maintain that God is true, and that if in any case his promise appear to fail, it is because the condition on which it was given, has not been complied with; which is the sense of what is written, Psal. li. 4. I acknowledge my sin, and condemn myself, that the truth of thy promise, (2 Sam. vii. 15, 16.) to establish my house and throne for ever, may be vindicated when thou shalt execute that dreadful threatening (2 Sam. xii. 10.) that the sword shall never depart from thy house, which I own I have brought upon myself by my own iniquity. Should any man say, that the promise of God had failed towards him; let him examine his heart and his ways, and he will find that he has departed out of that way in which alone God could, consistently with his holiness and truth, fulfil the promise.

Verse 5. JEW.—But if our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God] May we not suppose that our unrighteousness may serve to commend and illustrate the mercy of God, in keeping and fulfilling to us the promise which he made to our forefathers? The more wicked we are, the more his faithfulness to his ancient the righteousness of God, what shall we say? Is God unrighteous who taketh vengeance? (⁠I speak as a man.)

6 God forbid: for then ^b how shall God judge the world?

7 For, if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory; why yet am I also judged as a sinner?

promise is to be admired. And if so, would not God appear unjust in taking vengeance and casting us off?

I speak as a man] I feel for the situation both of myself and my countrymen; and it is natural for one to speak as I do.

Verse 6. APOSTLE.—God forbid] Ma yours, by no means. God cannot be unjust; were he unjust, he could not be qualified to judge the world, nor inflict that punishment on the unfaithful Jews, to which I refer.

Verse 7. JEW.—For if the truth of God, &c.] But to resume my reasoning, (see verse 5.) If the faithfulness of God in keeping his promise made to our fathers, is, through our unfaithfulness, made far more glorious than it otherwise would have been; why should we then be blamed for that which must redound so much to the honour of God?

Verse 8. APOSTLE.—And not rather, &c.] And why do you not say, seeing you assume this ground, that in all cases we should do wickedly, because God by freely pardoning, can so glorify his own grace? This is a most impious sentiment, but it follows from your reasoning; it has indeed been most injuriously laid to the charge of us apostles, who preach the doctrine of free pardon, through faith, without the merit of works; but this is so manifest a perversion of the truth, that a just punishment may be expected to fall on the propagators of such a slander.

Verse 9. JEW.—What then?] After all, have not we Jews a better claim to the privileges of the kingdom of God, than the Gentiles have?

APOSTLE.—No, in no wise] For I have already proved that both Jews and Gentiles are under the guilt of sin: that they are equally unworthy of the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom; and that they must both, equally, owe their salvation to the mere mercy of God.—From this, to the end of the 26th verse, the apostle proceeds to prove his assertion, that both Jews and Gentiles were all under sin; and that he might enforce the conviction upon the heart of the Jew, he quotes his own Scriptures, which 9 What then? are we better than they? No, in no wise: for we have before ^d proved both Jews and Gentiles, that ^e they are all under sin:

he acknowledged had been given by the inspiration of God, and consequently true.

Verse 10. As it is written] See Psal. xiv. 1, 2, 3. from which this, and the two following verses, are taken.

There is none righteous] This is true, not only of the Jews, but of the Gentiles: of every soul of man considered in his natural and practical state, previously to his receiving the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ. There is no righteous principle in them, and consequently, no righteous act can be expected from them; see on ver. 12. God himself is represented as looking down from heaven, to see if there were any that feared and sought after him; and yet he, who cannot be deceived, could find none! And, therefore, we may safely conclude there was none to be found.

Verse 12. They are all gone out of the way] ΠΑΡΗΚΕ ΕΚΚΛΗΣΙΑΣ; they have all diverged from the right way; they have either abandoned or corrupted the worship of God: the Jews, in forsaking the law and the prophets; and the Gentiles, in acting contrary to the law which God had written on their hearts. And the departure of both from the truth, proves the evil propensity of human nature in general.

They are together become unprofitable] ΗΧΡΗΣΙΜΟΙ; they are useless; good for nothing; or, as the Hebrew has it, רְטוּחַ ne-elachu, they are putrid; he views the whole mass of mankind as slain, and thrown together, to putrify in heaps. This is what is termed the corruption of human nature; they are infected and infectious: what need of the mercy of God to save from such a state of degeneracy!

There is none that doeth good] In ver. 10. it is said, there is none righteous—here, there is none that doeth good; the first may refer to the want of a righteous principle: the second, to the necessary consequence of the absence of such a principle. If there be no righteousness within, there will be no acts of goodness without.

Verse 13. Their throat is an open sepulchre] This, with all the following verses, to the end of the 18th, are found in the Septuagint, but not in the Hebrew text; and it is most evident that it was from this Version that the apostle quoted, as the verses cannot be found in any other place with so near an approximation to the apostle's meaning and words. The verses in question, however, are not found in the Alexandrian MS. But they exist in the Vulgate, the Ethiopic, and the Arabic. As the most ancient copies of the Septuagint do not contain these verses; some contend that the apostle has quoted them from different parts of Scripture; and later transcribers of the Septuagint, finding that the 10th, 11th, and 12th verses were quoted from the fourteenth Psalm, imagined that the rest were found originally there too, and so incorporated them in their copies, from the apostle's text; but this is by no means satisfactory.

Their throat is an open sepulchre—By their malicious and wicked words, they bury, as it were, the reputation of all men: the whole of this verse appears to belong to their habit of lying, defamation, slandering, &c. by which they wounded, blasted, and poisoned the reputation of others.

Verse 14. Whose mouth is full of cursing, &c.] They never speak but in profane oaths, blasphemies, and malice.

Verse 15. Their feet are swift to shed blood] They make use of every means in their power, to destroy the reputation and lives of the innocent.

Verse 16. Destruction and misery are in their ways] Destruction is their work, and misery to themselves and to the objects of their malice, is the consequence of their impious and murderous conduct.

Verse 17. And the way of peace have they not known] They neither have peace in themselves, nor do they suffer others to live in quiet: they are brooders and fomenters of discord.

Verse 18. There is no fear of God before their eyes.] This completes their bad character; they are downright atheists, at least practically such. They fear not God's judgments; although his eye is upon them in their evil ways. There is not one article of what is charged against the Jews and Gentiles here, that may not be found justified by the histories of both, in the most ample manner. And what was true of them in those primitive times is true of them still. With very little variation, these are the evils in which the vast mass of mankind delight and live. Look especially at men in a state of warfare: look at the nations of Europe, who enjoy most of the light of God; see what has taken place among them, from 1792 to 1814; see what destruction of millions; and what misery of hundreds of millions, have been the consequence of Satanic excitement in fallen ferocious passions! O SIN, what hast thou done! How many myriads of souls hast thou hurried, unprepared, into the eternal world! Who, among men or angels, can estimate the greatness of this calamity! this butchery of souls! What widows, what orphans, are left to deplore their sacrificed husbands and parents; and their own consequent wretchedness! And whence sprang all this? From that, whence come all wars and fightings: the evil desires of men; the lust of dominion: the insatiable thirst for money: and the desire to be sole and independent. This is the sin that ruined our first parents, expelled them from Paradise; and which has descended to all their posterity; and proves fully, incontestably proves, that we are their legitimate offspring; the fallen progeny of fallen parents. Children in whose ways are destruction and misery; in whose heart there is no faith: and before whose eyes there is nothing of the fear of God.

Verse 19. What things soever the law saith] That the word law, here, does not mean the Pentateuch, is evident from the preceding quotations, not one of which is taken from that work. Either the term law must here mean the Jewish writings in general: or that rule of moral conduct which God had given to both Jews and Gentiles: to the former in their own Scriptures: to the latter, in that law written in their hearts by his own Spirit, and acknowledged in their written codes, and in their pleadings in every civil case. Now, according to this great law, this rule of moral conduct, whether given in a written revelation, as to the Jews, or by the secret inspiration of his Spirit, as in certain cases, to the Gentiles; every mouth must be stopped, and the whole world, was in nocens, both Jews and Gentiles, stand convicted before God: for all mankind have sinned against this law.

Verse 20. Therefore, by the deeds of the law] On the score of obedience to this moral law, there shall no flesh, in vana eap, no human being, be justified; none can be accepted in the sight of God. And why? Because, by the law is the knowledge of sin: it is that which ascertains what sin is; shows how men have deviated from its righteous demands; and sentences them to death because they have broken it. Thus the law is properly considered as the rule of right: and unless God had given some such means of discovering what sin is, the darkened heart of man could never have formed an adequate conception of it. For, as an acknowledged straight edge is the only way in which the straightness or crookedness of a line can be determined; so, the moral obliquity of human actions can only be determined by the law of God; that rule of right which proceeds from his own immaculate holiness.

Verse 21. But now the righteousness of God] God's method of saving sinners, is now shown by the Gospel, to be through his own mere mercy, by Christ Jesus; without the law, without any right or claim which might result from obedience to the law; and is evidently that which was intended by God from the beginning; for it is witnessed by the law and the prophets; the rites and ceremonies of the one, and the preachings and predictions of the others, all bearing testimony to the great design of God; and to the absolute necessity there was for the sacrifice and salvation which God has provided.

Verse 22. Even the righteousness of God] That method of saving sinners, which is not of works, but by faith in Christ Jesus; and is not restrained to any particular people, as the law and its privileges were; but is unto all mankind in its intention and offer; and becomes effectual to them that believe: for God hath now made no difference between the Jews and Gentiles.

Verse 23. For all have sinned] And consequently are equally helpless and guilty: and, as God is no respecter of persons, all human creatures, being equally his offspring, and there being no reason why one should be preferred before another: therefore, his endless mercy has embraced ALL.

And come short of the glory of God] Καὶ ἐσθλάθησαν τὰς δόξας τοῦ Θεοῦ. These words have been variously translated; failed of attaining the glory of God: Have not been able to bring glory to God: stand in need of the glory, (that is) the mercy of God. The simple meaning seems to be this; that, as all have sinned, and none can enjoy God's glory, but they that are holy: consequently, both Jews and Gentiles have failed in their endeavours to attain it; as,

Verse 24. Being justified freely by his grace] So far from being able to attain the glory of God by their obedience, they are all guilty; and, to be saved, must be freely pardoned by God's grace; which is shown to them who believe, through the redemption, ἀπολυτρώσις, the ransom price, which is in the sacrifice of Christ Jesus. The original is compounded of ἀπο, from, and λυτρώω, I redeem; and properly means the price laid down for the redemption of a captive. Comprehendit hæc Christi, ἀπολυτρώσις, quicquid is docuit, fecit et passus est, eo concilio, ut homines malis liberati, præcipuè peccato, malorum fonte immunes, veram felicitatem adipiscerentur.—Rosenmüller. This redemption of Christ comprehends whatsoever he taught, did, or suffered, in order to free men from evil; especially to free them from sin, the source of evils; that they might attain true felicity. And that it here means the liberation purchased by the blood-shedding of Christ, is evinced from Eph. i. 7, We have REDEMPTION, ἀπολυτρώσιν διὰ τοῦ αἵματος αὐτοῦ, THROUGH HIS BLOOD, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace. See also Col. i. 14. where the same words are found.

Λύτρωσις, according to Suidas, is μισθός, ἢ τι παρηχόμενα ὑπὲρ αἰχμαθίας, ἢ τὴν λυτρωσάσθαι βάρβαρον δούλωμα. A reward; or the price given to be redeemed from the slavery of the barbarians. Schleuser, under the word ἀπολυτρώσις, says, Negari quidem non potest, hanc vocem propriè notare redemptionem ejus, qui captivus detinetur, sive bello, sive alio captus sit modo, quæ sit per pretii solutionem; quo sensu verbum, ἀπολυτρώσις, legitur hæud raro in Scrip. Græcis. No man certainly can deny that this word properly means the redemption of a captive, (whether he may have been taken in war or in any other way) which is procured by the payment of a price. That the word also means any deliverance, even where no price is paid down, nobody will dispute: but that it means redemption by a price laid down; and the redemption of the soul by the price of the death of Christ, the above scriptures sufficiently prove.

through the forbearance of God;

Ἰλασμός, the mercy-seat, or place of atonement; because the blood of the sacrifice was sprinkled on and before that, in order to obtain remission of sin, punishment, &c. The mercy-seat was the lid, or cover of the ark of the covenant, where God was manifest in the symbol of his presence, between the cherubim; therefore the atonement that was made in this place, was properly made to God himself. See the note on Luke xviii. 13.

Through faith in his blood] This shows what we are to understand both by the Ἀπολυτῶσις, redemption, and the ἰλασμός, propitiation: viz. that they refer to the sacrificial death of Jesus Christ, as the atonement made, and the price paid down for the redemption of the souls of men.

To declare his righteousness] Ἐκ σπουδῆς, for the manifestation of his righteousness; his mercy in saving sinners, by sending Jesus Christ to make an atonement for them; thereby declaring his readiness to remit all past transgressions committed both by Jews and Gentiles, during the time in which his merciful forbearance was exercised towards the world; and this applies to all who hear the Gospel now: to them is freely offered remission of all past sins.

Verse 26. To declare, I say, at this time] To manifest now, by the dispensation of the Gospel, his righteousness, his infinite mercy; and to manifest it in such a way, that he might still appear to be the just God, and yet the justifier, the pardoner, of him who believeth in Jesus. Here we learn, that God designed to give the most evident displays, both of his justice and mercy. Of his justice, in requiring a sacrifice; and absolutely refusing to give salvation to a lost world in any other way; and of his mercy, in providing the sacrifice which his justice required. Thus, because Jesus was an atonement, a ransom price for the sin of the world, therefore God can, consistently with his justice, pardon every soul that believeth in Jesus. This is the full discovery of God's righteousness, of his wonderful method of magnifying his law, and making it honourable; of showing the infinite purity of his justice, and of saving a lost world.

Hitherto, from the 9th verse, the apostle had gone on without interruption; proving that Jew and Gentile were in a state of guilt and condemnation; and that they could be saved only by the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. The Jew finding his boasted privileges all at stake, interrupts him, and asks:

28 Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law.

29 Is he the God of the Jews only? is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also:

30 Seeing, it is one God, which shall justify the circumcision by faith, and Ἡ καυχῆσις, this glorying of ours. Have we nothing in which we can trust for our acceptance with God? No merit of our own? Nothing accruing to us from our circumcision, and being in covenant with God?

Apostle.—It is excluded] Ἐξαιρούμεθα, It is shut out; the door of heaven is shut against every thing of this kind.

Jew.—By what law?] By what rule, doctrine, or reason, is it shut out? by the law of works? The rule of obedience which God gave to us; and by which obedience we are accepted by him?

Apostle.—Nay] Not by the law of works; glorying is not cut off, or shut out by that; it stands in full force as the rule of life; but you have sinned, and need pardon. The law of works grants no pardon, it requires obedience, and threatens the disobedient with death. But all glorying in the expectation of salvation through your own obedience, is excluded by the law, the doctrine of faith; faith alone, in the mercy of God, through the propitiation made by the blood of Jesus, (ver. 25,) is that by which you can be justified, pardoned, and taken into the Divine favour.

Verse 28. Therefore we conclude, &c.] Seeing these things cannot be denied, viz. that all have sinned; that all are guilty; that all are helpless; that none can deliver his own soul; and that God, in his endless mercy, has opened a new and living way to the holiest by the blood of Jesus, Heb. x. 19, 20, &c. therefore we, apostles and Christian teachers, conclude, λογίζομεθα, prove by fair, rational consequence, that a man, any man, is justified, has his sins blotted out, and is received into the Divine favour, by faith in Christ's blood, without the deeds of the law, which never could afford, either to Jew or Gentile, a ground for justification; because both have sinned against the law which God has given them; and, consequently, forfeited all right and title to the blessings which the obedient might claim.

Verse 29. Is he the God of the Jews only? Do not begin to suppose that because you cannot be justified by the works of the law, and God has in his mercy found out a new method of saving you; that therefore this mercy shall apply to the Jews exclusively. Is not God the maker, preserver, and redeemer, also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also, as much as of the Jews: for all have equally sinned; and there is no reason, if God be disposed to show mercy at all, that he should prefer the one to the other: since they are all equally guilty, sinful, and necessitous.

Verse 30. Seeing it is one God Εἰς ἓν θεὸν: this has been rendered, seeing God is one. It however makes little difference in the sense: the apostle's meaning most evidently is, it is one and the same God, who made both Jews and Gentiles, who shall justify, pardon the circumcision, the believing Jews, by faith: and the uncircumcision, the believing Gentiles, by the same faith; as there is but one Saviour, and one atonement provided for the whole.

It is fanciful to suppose, that the apostle has one meaning when he says, αὐτῶν, by faith: and a different meaning, when he says, διὰ τῆς πίστεως, THROUGH faith. Both the prepositions were to be understood in precisely the same sense; only the addition of the article τῆς, in the last case, extends and more pointedly ascertains the meaning. It is one and the same God, who shall justify the believing Jews by faith; and the believing Gentiles, διὰ τῆς πίστεως, by THAT SAME faith.

Verse 31. Do we then make void the law through faith 1. By law here we may understand the whole of the Mosaic law, in its rites and ceremonies: of which, Jesus Christ was the subject and the end. All that law had respect to him: and the doctrine of faith in Christ Jesus, which the Christian religion proclaimed, established the very claims and demands of that law; by showing that all was accomplished in the passion and death of Christ; for, without shedding of blood, the law would allow of no remission: and Jesus was that Lamb of God, which was slain from the foundation of the world; in whose blood we have redemption, even the remission of sins. 2. We may understand also, the moral law, that which relates to the regulation of the manners or conduct of men. This law also was established by the doctrine of salvation by faith; because this faith works by love, and love is the principle of obedience: and whosoever receives salvation through faith in Christ, receives power to live in holy obedience to every moral precept; for such are God's workmanship, created anew in Christ Jesus, unto good works; in which they find it their duty and their interest incessantly to live.

1. In the notes on the preceding chapter, I have, in general, followed the plan of Dr. Taylor, and especially in regard to its dialogue form; but I have often differed much from that very learned and judicious man, in the application of many words and doctrines. He cannot allow that the death of Christ should be considered as a price paid down for the salvation of men: and I confess, I cannot understand the apostle in any other way. Nor can I see the weight of many of his observations, nor the force of his conclusions, on any other ground than this, that th-passion and death of Christ were an atonement made to Divine justice, in the behalf of man; and that it is through the merit of that great sacrifice, that God forgives sin. Nor can I see any reason why such great stress should be laid on faith, but as that lays hold on, and takes up, the sacrifice of Christ as a ransom price for the redemption of the soul from the thralldom and misery of sin and Satan.

2. This chapter contains a fine and striking synopsis of the whole Christian system. The wretched state of man is awfully exhibited, from the 10th to the 18th verse; and the plan of salvation, in the 24th, 25th, and 26th verses. A pious writer calls these the Catechism of Christian Righteousness. The following points in this catechism are worthy of high consideration, viz. How is God glorified in us and we in him?—By his GRACE. What does his grace work in us?—True holiness. Upon what motive?—Because it is pleasing to him. By whom does he give us salvation?—By Jesus Christ. How has Christ obtained this for us?—By redeeming us. What price did he give?—His BLOOD. What does his blood effect?—It reconciles us to God. How is it applied?—By FAITH. Who has given this victim of reconciliation?—God the Father. Why did he choose these means?—To confound the false righteousness of the Gentiles; to abolish the FIGURATIVE righteousness of the Jews; and to establish his own. What does this grace of God perform?—It pardons sin; and purifies the heart. For whom is this designed?—For all mankind, both Jews and Gentiles. To whom are these blessings actually communicated?—To all who repent, turn from their sin, and believe on the Lord Jesus. Why did not God make known this grand method of salvation sooner?—1. To make it the more valued: 2. To show his fidelity in the performance of his promises: and 3. To make known the virtue and efficacy of the blood of Christ, which sanctifies the present, extends its influence to the past, and continues the availing sacrifice, and way of salvation, to all future ages.

3. On considering this glorious scheme of salvation, there is great danger; lest, while we stand amazed at what was done FOR us, we neglect what must be done IN us. Guilt in the conscience, and sin in the heart, ruin the man. Pardon in the conscience, and Christ in the heart, save the soul.—Christ has done much to save us; and the way of salvation is made plain; but unless he justify our conscience from dead works, and purify our hearts from all sin, his passion and death will profit us nothing. While we boast in Christ Jesus, let us see that our rejoicing, καυχῆσθαι, our boasting, be this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have our conversation in the world, 2 Cor. i. 12.

4. We must beware of Latinianism: that is, of supposing that, because Christ has been obedient unto death, there is no necessity for our obedience to his righteous commandments. If this were so, the grace of Christ would tend to the destruction of the law; and not to its establishment. He only is saved from his sins who has the law of God written in his heart; and he alone has the law written in his heart who lives an innocent, holy, and useful life. Wherever Christ lives, he works: and his work of righteousness will appear to his servants; and its effect will be quietness and assurance for ever. The life of God, in the soul of man, is the principle which saves and preserves eternally.

CHAPTER IV.

Abraham was justified by faith, and not by the works of the law; for his faith was imputed to him for righteousness, 1—5. David also bears testimony to the same doctrine, 6—8. Abraham, the father of the Jewish race, was justified by faith, even before he was circumcised; therefore salvation must be of the Gentiles as well as the Jews, 9—12. And the promise that all the nations of the earth should be blessed in him, was made to him while he was in an uncircumcised state, and, therefore, if salvation were of the Jews alone, the law that was given after the promise, would make the promise of no effect, 13—17. Description of Abraham's faith, and its effects, 18—22. This account is left on record for our salvation, that we might believe on Christ, who was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification, 23—25.

NOTES ON CHAP. IV.

The apostle, having proved in the foregoing chapter, that neither Jews nor Gentiles have a right to the blessings of God's peculiar kingdom, otherwise than by grace, which is as free for the one as the other; in this chapter advances a new argument, to convince the Jews, and to show the believing Gentile, in a clear light, the high value, and strong security, of the mercies freely bestowed on them in the Gospel; and, at the same time, to display the scheme of Divine Providence, as laid in the counsel and will of God. His argument is taken from Abraham's case: he was the father and head of the Jewish nation: he had been an idolater, but God pardoned him, and took him and his posterity into his special covenant: and bestowed upon them many extraordinary blessings above the rest of mankind: and it is evident, that Abraham was not justified by any obedience to law, or rule of right action, but in the only way in which a sinner can be justified, by prerogative, or the mercy of the lawgiver. Now, this is the very same way in which the Gospel saves the believing Gentiles, and gives them a part in the blessings of God's covenant. Why then should the Jews oppose the Gentiles? especially as the Gentiles were actually included in the covenant made with Abraham; for the promise, Gen. xvii. 4. stated, that he should be the father of many nations; consequently, the covenant being made with Abraham, as the head, or father of many nations, all, in any nation who stood on the same religious principle with him, were his seed, and with him interested in the same covenant. But Abraham stood by faith in the mercy of God, pardoning his idolatry; and upon this foot the believing Gentiles stand in the Gospel; and therefore they are the seed of Abraham, and included in the covenant and promise made to him.

To all this the apostle knew well it would be objected; that it was not faith alone that gave Abraham a right to the blessings of the covenant, but his obedience to the law of circumcision; and this being peculiar to the Jewish nation, gave them an interest in the Abrahamic covenant; and that, consequently, whoever among the Gentiles would be interested in that covenant, ought to embrace Judaism, become circumcised, and thus come under obligation to the whole law. With this very objection the apostle very dexterously introduces his argument, ver. 1, 2. Shows that, according to the Scripture account, Abraham was justified by faith, ver. 3—5. explains the nature of that justification, by a quotation out of the Psalms, ver. 6—9. proves that Abraham was justified long before he was circumcised, ver. 9—11. that the believing Gentiles are his seed, to whom the promise belongs, as well as the believing Jews, ver. 12—17. and he describes Abraham's faith, in order to explain the faith of the Gospel, ver. 17—25. See Dr. Taylor's notes. We may still suppose that the dialogue is carried on between the apostle and the Jew: and it will make the subjects still more clear to assign to each his respective part. The Jew asks a single question, which is contained in the 1st. and part of the 2d verses. And the apostle's answer takes up the rest of the chapter.

hath found?] The nata causa, pertaining to the flesh, must here refer to the sign in Abraham's flesh, viz. his circumcision: on which the Jew would found his right to peculiar blessings. That this is the meaning of nata causa, according to the flesh, Dr. Taylor has proved by a collation of several parallel scriptures, which it is not necessary to produce here. We may, therefore, suppose the Jew arguing thus: But you set your argument on a wrong footing, viz. the corrupt state of our nation; whereas we hold our prerogative above the rest of mankind, from Abraham, who is our father: and we have a right to the blessings of God's peculiar kingdom, in virtue of the promise made to him: his justification is the ground of ours. Now what shall we make of his case, on your principles? Of what use was his obedience to the law of circumcision, if it did not give him a right to the blessing of God? And if, by his obedience to that law, he obtained a grant of extraordinary blessings, then, according to your own concession, chap. iii. 27. he might ascribe his justification to something in himself: and, consequently, so may we too, in his right: and if so, this will exclude all those who are not circumcised as we are.

Verse 2. For, if Abraham were justified by works] The Jew proceeds: I conclude, therefore, that Abraham was justified by works, or by his obedience to this law of circumcision: and, consequently, he has cause for glorying, καυχόμενα, to exult in something which he has done to entitle him to these blessings. Now, it is evident that he has this glorying, and consequently that he was justified by works.

APOSTLE.—But not before God] These seem to be the apostle's words, and contain the beginning of his answer to the arguments of the Jew: as if he had said—Allowing that Abraham might glory in being called from heathenish darkness into such marvellous light; and exult in the privileges which God had granted to him, yet this glorying was not before God, as a reason why those privileges should be granted; the glorying itself being a consequence of these very privileges.

Verse 3. For, what saith the Scripture?] The scriptural account of this transaction, Gen. xv. 6. is decisive; for, there it is said, Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him, it was reckoned to him for righteousness: ut immanetur, for justification.

6 Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works,

Verse 4. Now to him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt.] Therefore, if Abraham had been justified by works, the blessings he received would have been given to him as a reward for those works; and consequently his believing could have had no part in his justification; and his faith would have been useless.

Verse 5. But to him that worketh not] Which was the case with Abraham, for he was called when he was ungodly, i. e. an idolater; and, on his believing, was freely justified: and, as all men have sinned, none can be justified by works; and, therefore, justification, if it take place at all, must take place in behalf of the ungodly, forasmuch as all mankind are such. Now, as Abraham's state and mode, in which he was justified, are the plan and rule according to which God purposes to save men; and as his state was ungodly, and the mode of his justification was by faith in the goodness and mercy of God; and this is precisely the state of Jews and Gentiles at present: there can be no other mode of justification than by faith in that Christ who is Abraham's seed; and in whom, according to the promise, all the nations of the earth are to be blessed.

It is necessary to observe here, in order to prevent confusion and misapprehension, that although the verb δικαίωσις has a variety of senses in the New Testament, yet here it is to be taken as implying the pardon of sin; receiving a person into the favour of God. See these different acceptations cited in the note on chap. i. ver. 17. and particularly under No. 7. It is also necessary to observe, that our translators render the verb λογίζωμαι differently, in different parts of this chapter. It is rendered counted, ver. 3, 5. reckoned, ver. 4, 9, 10. imputed, ver. 6, 8, 11, 22, 23, and 24. Reckoned is probably the best sense in all these places.

Verse 6. Even as David also, &c.] David, in Psa. xxxii. 1, 2. gives us also the true notion of this way of justification, i. e. by faith, without the merit of works, where he says—

Verse 7. Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven] That is, the man is truly happy whose iniquities, ἁμαρτίας, his transgressions of the law, are forgiven; for by these he was exposed to the most grievous punishment. Whose sins, ἁμαρτίας, his innumerable deviations from the strict rule of truth and righteousness, are covered, entirely removed out of sight; and thrown into oblivion. See the meaning of the word sin, in the note on Gen. xiii. 13.

Verse 8. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin.] That man is truly happy, to whose charge God does not reckon sin: that is, they alone are happy who are redeemed from the curse of the law, and the consequence of their ungodly life, by having their sins freely forgiven, through the mercy of God.

Verse 9. Cometh this blessedness—upon the circumcision only] The word meror, only, is very properly supplied by our translators, and indeed is found in some excellent MSS. and is here quite necessary to complete the sense. The apostle's question is very nervous. If this pardon, granted in this way, be essential to happiness; and David says it is so: then is it the privilege of the Jews exclusively? this cannot be; for as it is by the mere mercy of God, through faith, the circumcision cannot even claim it. But if God offer it to the circumcision, not because they have been obedient, for they also have sinned, but because of his mere mercy: then, of course, the same blessedness may be offered to the Gentiles who believe in the Lord Jesus. And this is evident; for we say, following our own scriptures, that faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness: he had no merit, he was an idolater; but he believed in God, and his faith was reckoned to him as justorum, in reference to his justification; he brought faith when he could not bring works; and God accepted his faith in the place of obedience; and this became the instrumental cause of his justification.

Verse 10. How was it then reckoned?] In what circumstances was Abraham, when this blessing was bestowed upon him? When he was circumcised, or before?

Not in circumcision, but in uncircumcision.] Faith was reckoned to Abraham for justification, as we read Gen. xv. 6. (where see the note,) but circumcision was not instituted till about fourteen or fifteen years after, Gen. xvii. 1, &c. for faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness or justification, at least one year before Ishmael was born; compare Gen. xv. and xvi. At Ishmael's birth he was 86 years of age, Gen. xv. 16. and at the institution of circumcision, Ishmael was 13, and Abraham 99 years old.—See Gen. xvii. 24, 25. and see Dr. Taylor.

Verse 11. And he received the sign of circumcision, a seal, &c.] So far was obedience to the law of circumcision, from being the reason of his justification, that he not only received this justification before he was circumcised; but he received the sign of circumcision as a seal of the pardon which he had before actually received. And thus he became the father, the great head and representative of all them that believe; particularly the Gentiles, who are now in precisely the same state in which Abraham was, when he received the mercy of God. Hence it appears, says Dr. Taylor, that the covenant established with Abraham, Gen. xvii. 2—15. is the same with that of Gen. xii. 2, 3. and xv. 5, &c. for circumcision was not a seal of any new grant, but of the justification and promise which Abraham had received before he was circumcised; and that justification and promise included the Gospel covenant, in which we are now interested. St. Paul refers to this, Galat. iii. 8. the Scripture foreseeing that God would justify us heathens, through faith, preached before, the Gospel unto Abraham; saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed. The whole of the apostle's argument in this 4th chapter to the Romans, proves that we, believing Gentiles, are the seed of Abraham; to whom, as well as to himself, the promise was made; and that the promise made to him, is the same, in effect, as that promise which is now made to us; consequently, it is the Abrahamic covenant in which we now stand; and any argument taken from the nature of that covenant, and applied to ourselves, must be good and valid. It is also undeniably evident from this 11th verse, as well as from Gen. xvii. 1—11. that circumcision was a seal or sign of the Gospel covenant in which we now stand. See Taylor.

There is nothing more common in the Jewish writers than the words סֵמֶן oth, SIGN; and כֶּתֶב chotham, SEAL; as signifying the mark in the flesh, by the rite of circumcision, see on Gen. iv. 15. SOHAR Genes. fol. 41. col. 161. has these words: And God set a mark upon Cain; this mark was the sign of the covenant of circumcision. Verse 12. And the father of circumcision] He is also the head and representative of all the circumcision of all the Jews, who walk in the steps of that faith; who seek for justification by faith only, and not by the works of the law; for this was the faith that Abraham had, before he received circumcision. So that the Jews, to be saved, must come under that Abrahamic covenant, in which the Gentiles are included. This is an unanswerable conclusion; and must, on this point, for ever confound the Jews.

Verse 13. For the promise that he should be the heir of the world] This promise intimated that he should be the medium, through whom the mercy of God should be communicated to the world, to both Jews and Gentiles; and the manner in which he was justified, be the rule and manner according to which all men should expect this blessing. Abraham is here represented as having all the world given to him as his inheritance; because, in him, all nations of the earth are blessed; this must therefore relate to their being all interested in the Abrahamic covenant: and every person, now that the covenant is fully explained, has the privilege of claiming justification through faith, by the blood of the Lamb, in virtue of this original grant.

Verse 14. For, if they which are of the law be heirs] If the Jews only be heirs of the promise made to Abraham, and that on the ground of prior obedience to the law; then faith is made void; is entirely useless; and the promise, which was made to faith, is made of none effect.

Verse 15. Because the law worketh wrath] For law, vous, any law, or rule of duty. No law makes provision for the exercise of mercy, for it worketh wrath: οργη, punishment for the disobedient. Law necessarily subjects the transgressor to punishment; for where no law is, where no rule of duty is enacted and acknowledged, there is no transgression: and where there is no transgression, there can be no punishment; for there is no law to enforce it. But the Jews have a law which they have broken; and now they are exposed to the penal sanctions of that law; and if the promises of pardon without the works of the law, do not extend to them, they must be finally miserable; because they have all broken the law, and the 14 For, if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect:

15 Because the law worketh wrath; for where no law is, there is no transgression.

16 Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace; to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed; not to that only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of law exacts punishment. This was a home stroke; and the argument is unanswerable.

Verse 16. Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace] On this account the promise is mercifully grounded, not on obedience to a law, but on the infinite goodness of God: and thus the promise is sure to all the seed, to all, both Jews and Gentiles, who, believing in Christ Jesus, have a right to all the blessings contained in the Abrahamic covenant. All the seed necessarily comprehends all mankind. Of the Gentiles there can be no doubt, for the promise was given to Abraham while he was a Gentile; and the salvation of the Jews may be inferred, because they all sprang from him, after he became an heir of the righteousness or justification which is received by faith; for he is the father of us all, both Jews and Gentiles. Dr. Taylor has an excellent note on this verse, "Here," says he, "it should be well observed that faith and grace do mutually and necessarily infer each other. For the grace and favour of God, in its own nature, requires faith in us; and faith, on our part, in its own nature, supposes the grace or favour of God. If any blessing is the gift of God, in order to influence our temper and behaviour; then, in the very nature of things, it is necessary that we be sensible of this blessing, and persuaded of the grace of God that bestows it; otherwise it is not possible we should improve it. On the other hand, if faith in the goodness of God with regard to any blessing, is the principle of our religious hopes and action; then it follows that the blessing is not due in strict justice, nor on the foot of law, but that it is the free gift of divine goodness. If the promise to Abraham and his seed be of faith on their part; then it is of grace on the part of God. And it is of faith, that it might be by grace; grace being the mere good will of the donor, is free and open to all whom he chooses to make the objects of it; and the divine wisdom appointed faith to be the condition of the promise; because faith is, on our part, the most simple principle, bearing an exact correspondence to grace, and reaching as far as that can extend; that so the happy effects of the promise might extend far and wide, take in the largest compass, and be confined to no condition, but what is merely necessary, in the nature of things."

Verse 17. As it is written, I have made thee a father] That Abraham's being a father of many nations, has relation to the covenant of God made with him, may be seen, Gen. xvii. 4, 5, Behold, my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations: neither shall thy name any more be called Abram; but thy name shall be called Abraham, for a father of many nations have I made thee, i. e. he was constituted the head of many nations by virtue of the covenant which God made then with him.

God, who quickeneth the dead, &c.] God is the most proper object of trust and dependence; for being almighty, eternal, and unchangeable, he can even raise the dead to life; and call those things which be not, as though they were. He is the Creator, he gave being when there was none: he can as infallibly assure the existence of those things which are not, as if they were already actually in being. And on this account, he can never fail of accomplishing whatsoever he has promised.

Verse 18. Who, against hope, believed in hope] The faith of Abraham bore an exact correspondence to the power and never-failing faithfulness of God: for though, in the ordinary course of things, he had not the best foundation of hope, yet he believed that he should be the father of many nations, according to that which was spoken: namely, that his posterity should be like the stars of heaven for multitude, and like the dust of the earth.

Verse 19. He considered not his own body now dead] He showed at once the correctness and energy of his faith: God cannot lie: Abraham can believe. It is true, that, according to the course of nature, he and Sarah are so old that they cannot have children; but God is almighty, and can do whatsoever he will, and will fulfil his promise. This was certainly a wonderful degree of faith; as the promise stated that it was in his posterity that all the nations of the earth were to be blessed: that he had, as yet, no child by Sarah; that he was 100 years old; that Sarah was 90; and that, added to the utter improbability of her bearing at that age, she had ever been barren before. All these were so many reasons why he should not credit the promise; yet he believed: therefore it might be well said, ver. 20. that he staggered not at the promise, though every thing was unnatural and improbable; but he was strong in faith, and by this almost inimitable confidence, gave glory to God. It was to God's honour, that his servant put such unlimited confidence in him: and he put this confidence in him on the rational ground that God was fully able to perform what he had promised.

Verse 21. And being fully persuaded] Πληροπεποιθως, his measure, his soul was full of confidence, that the truth of God bound him to fulfil his promise; and his power enabled him to do it.

Verse 22. And therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness.] The verse is thus paraphrased by Dr. Taylor. "For which reason God was graciously pleased to place his faith to his account; and to allow his fiducial reliance upon the divine goodness, power, and faithfulness, for a title to the divine blessing, which, otherwise, having been an idolater, he had no right to."

Abraham's strong faith in the promise of the coming Saviour, for this was essential to his faith, was reckoned to him for justification; for it is not said that any righteousness, either his own, or that of another, was imputed or reckoned to him for justification; but it, i. e. his faith in God. His faith was fully persuaded of the most merciful intentions of God's goodness; and this, which, in effect, laid hold on Jesus Christ, the future Saviour, was the means of his justification; being reckoned unto him in the place of personal righteousness, because it laid hold on the merit of Him who died to make an atonement for our offences, and rose again for our justification.

Verse 23. Now, it was not written for his sake alone] The fact of Abraham's believing and receiving salvation through that faith, is not recorded as a mere circumstance in the patriarch's life, intended to do him honour: see below.

Verse 24. But for us also] The mention of this circumstance has a much more extenave design than merely to honour Abraham. It is recorded as the model, according to which God will save both Jews and Gentiles: indeed there can be no other way of salvation; as all have sinned, all must either be saved by faith through Christ Jesus; or finally perish. If God, therefore, will our salvation, it must be by faith; and faith contemplates his promise, and his promise comprehends the Son of his love.

Verse 25. Who was delivered for our offences] Who was delivered up to death as a sacrifice for our sins; for in what other way, or for what other purpose, could He who is innocence itself, be delivered for our offences?

And was raised again for our justification.] He was raised that we might have the fullest assurance that the death of Christ had accomplished the end for which it took place; viz. our reconciliation with God, and giving us a title to that eternal life, into which he has entered and taken with him our human nature, as the first-fruits of the resurrection of mankind.

1. From a careful examination of the divine oracles, it appears that the death of Christ was an atonement or expiation for the sin of the world: For him hath God set forth to be a PROPITIATION THROUGH FAITH IN HIS BLOOD, chap. iii. 25. For, when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ DIED FOR THE UN-GODLY, chap. v. 6. And when we were ENEMIES, we were RECONCILED TO GOD BY THE DEATH OF his Son, ver. 10. In whom we have REDEMPTION THROUGH HIS BLOOD, THE FORGIVENESS OF SINS, Eph. i. 7. Christ hath loved us, and GIVEN HIMSELF FOR US AN OFFERING AND A SACRIFICE TO GOD for a sweet-smelling savour, ibid. chap. v. 2. In whom we have REDEMPTION THROUGH HIS BLOOD, THE FORGIVENESS OF SINS; Col. i. 14. And having made PEACE THROUGH THE BLOOD of his cross, in the BODY of HIS FLESH through DEATH, ib. ver. 20, 22. Who GAVE HIMSELF A RANSOM for all, 1 Tim. ii. 6. Who GAVE HIMSELF FOR US, that he might REDEEM us from all iniquity, Tit. ii. 14. By which will we are sanctified, through the OFFERING of the BODY of Jesus Christ, Hebr. x. 14. So Christ was once OFFERED TO BEAR THE SINS of many, Hebr. ix. 28. See also Eph. ii. 13, 16. 1 Pet. i. 18, 19. Rev. v. 9. But it would be transcribing a very considerable part of the New Testament, to set down all the texts that refer to this most important and glorious truth.

2. And as his death was an atonement for our sins, so his resurrection was the proof and pledge of our eternal life. See 1 Cor. xv. 17. 1 Pet. i. 3. Eph. i. 13, 14, &c. &c.

3. The doctrine of justification by faith, which is so nobly proved in the preceding chapter, is one of the grandest displays of the mercy of God to mankind. It is so very plain, that all may comprehend it; and so free, that all may attain it. What more simple than this? Thou art a sinner; in consequence, condemned to perdition; and utterly unable to save thy own soul. All are in the same state with thyself, and no man can give a ransom for the soul of his neighbour. God, in his mercy, has provided a Saviour for thee. As thy life was forfeited to death, because of thy transgressions, Jesus Christ has redeemed thy life, by giving up his own; he died in thy stead, and has made an atonement to God for thy transgressions; and offers thee the pardon he has thus purchased, on the simple condition, that thou believe that his death is a sufficient sacrifice, ransom, and oblation for thy sin; and that thou bring it as such, by confident faith, to the throne of God, and plead it in thy own behalf there. When thou dost so, thy faith in that sacrifice shall be imputed to thee for righteousness; i. e. it shall be the means of receiving that salvation which Christ has bought by his blood.

4. The doctrine of the imputed righteousness of Christ, as held by many, will not be readily found in this chapter, where it has been supposed to exist in all its proofs. It is repeatedly said that FAITH is imputed for righteousness; but in no place here, that Christ's obedience to the moral law is imputed to any man. The truth is, the moral law was broken, and did not now require obedience; it required this before it was broken; but, after it was broken, it required death. Either the sinner must die, or some one in his stead: but there was none whose death could have been an equivalent for the transgressions of the world, but JESUS CHRIST. Jesus therefore died for man; and it is through his blood, the merit of his passion and death, that we have redemption: and not by his obedience to the moral law in our stead. Our salvation was obtained at a much higher price. Jesus could not but be righteous and obedient; this is consequent on the immaculate purity of his nature: but his death was not a necessary consequent. As the law of God can claim only the death of a transgressor, for, such only forfeit their right to life: it is the greatest miracle of all, that Christ could die, whose life was never forfeited. Here we see the indescribable demerit of sin, that it required such a death; and here we see the stupendous mercy of God in providing the sacrifice required. It is, therefore, by Jesus Christ's death, or obedience unto death, that we are saved, and not by his fulfilling any moral law. That he fulfilled the moral law, we know; without which he could not have been qualified to be our Mediator; but we must take heed lest we attribute that to an obedience (which was the necessary consequence of his immaculate nature,) which belongs to his passion and death. These were free-will offerings of eternal goodness, and not even a necessary consequence of his incarnation. The contrary doctrine is supremely dangerous.

5. This doctrine, of the imputed righteousness of Christ, is capable of great abuse. To say that Christ's personal righteousness is imputed to every true believer, is not scriptural: to say that he has fulfilled all righteousness for us, or in our stead, if by this is meant his fulfilment of all moral duties, is neither scriptural nor true: that he has died in our stead, is a great, glorious, and scriptural truth: that there is no redemption but through his blood, is asserted, beyond all contradiction, in the oracles of God. But there are a multitude of duties which the moral law requires, which Christ never fulfilled in our stead, and never could. We have various duties of a domestic kind which belong solely to ourselves, in the relation of parents, husbands, wives, servants, &c. in which relations Christ never stood. He has fulfilled none of these duties for us; but he furnishes grace to every true believer to fulfil them to God's glory, the edification of his neighbour, and his own eternal profit. The salvation which we receive from God's free mercy, through Christ, binds us to live in a strict conformity to the moral law; that law which prescribes our manners, and the spirit by which they should be regulated; and in which they should be performed. He who lives not in the due performance of every Christian duty, whatever faith he may profess, is either a vile hypocrite, or a scandalous Antinomian.

NOTES ON CHAP. V.

In the former chapter, the apostle, having proved that the believing Gentiles are justified in the same way with Abraham, and are, in fact, his seed, included with him in the promise and covenant; he judged this a proper place, as the Jews built all their glorifying upon the Abrahamic covenant, to produce some of the chief of those privileges and blessings in which the Christian Gentile can glory, in consequence of his justification by faith. And he produces three particulars, which, above all others, were adapted to this purpose. 1. The hope of eternal life, in which the law, wherein the Jew gloried, chap. ii. 17. was defective, ver. 2. 2. The persecutions and sufferings to which Christians were exposed, ver. 3, 4. and on account of which the Jews were greatly prejudiced against the Christian profession: but he shows that these had a happy tendency to establish the heart in the hope of the Gospel. 3. An interest in God as our God and FATHER; a privilege upon which the Jews valued themselves highly above all nations, ver. 11.

These three are the singular privileges belonging to the Gospel state; wherein true Christians may glory, as really belonging to them, and greatly redounding, if duly understood and improved, to their honour and benefit. Taylor, page 278.

Verse 1. Therefore, being justified by faith] The apostle takes it for granted that he has proved that justification is by faith: and that the Gentiles have an equal title with the Jews, to salvation by faith. And now he proceeds to show the effects produced in the hearts of the believing Gentiles, by this doctrine. We are justified, have all our sin pardoned, by faith, as the instrumental cause; for, being sinners, we have no works of righteousness that we can plead.

We have peace with God] Before, while sinners, we were in a state of enmity with God, which was sufficiently proved by our rebellion against his authority; and our transgression of his laws; but now, being reconciled, we have peace with God. Before, while under a sense of the guilt of sin, we had nothing but terror and dismay in our own consciences: now, having our sin forgiven, we have peace in our

3 And not only so, but we glory in tribulations also: knowing that tribuhearts; feeling that all our guilt is taken away. Peace is generally the first-fruits of our justification.

Through our Lord Jesus Christ] His passion and death being the sole cause of our reconciliation to God.

Verse 2. By whom also] We are not only indebted to our Lord Jesus Christ for the free and full pardon which we have received; but our continuance in a justified state depends upon his gracious influence in our hearts; and his intercession before the throne of God.

We have access] Προσάγωμεν ερχομεθα, we have received this access. It was only through Christ that we could at first approach God; and it is only through him that the privilege is continued to us. And this access to God, or introduction to the Divine presence, is to be considered as a lasting privilege. We are not brought to God for the purpose of an interview, but to remain with him; to be his household: and, by faith, to behold his face, and to walk in the light of his countenance.

Into this grace] This state of favour and acceptance.

Wherein we stand] Having firm footing, and a just title, through the blood of the Lamb, to the full salvation of God.

And rejoice] Have solid happiness, from the evidence we have of our acceptance with Him.

In hope of the glory of God.] Having our sins remitted, and our souls adopted into the heavenly family, we are become heirs; for if children, then heirs, Gal. iv. 7. and that glory of God is now become our endless inheritance. While the Jews boast of their external privileges; that they have the temple of God among them; that their priests have an entrance to God as their representatives, carrying before the mercy-seat the blood of their offered victims, we exult in being introduced by Jesus Christ to the Divine presence; his blood having been shed and sprinkled for this purpose; and thus we have spiritually and essentially, all that these Jewish rites, &c. signified. We are in the peace of God; and we are happy in the enjoyment of that peace; and have a blessed foretaste of eternal glory. Thus, we have heaven upon earth, and the ineffable glories of God in prospect.

Verse 3. And not only so] We are not only happy from being in this state of communion with our God, and the prospect of being eternally with him;—

But we glory in tribulation also] All the sufferings we endure for the testimony of our Lord, are so sanctified to us by his grace, that they become powerful instruments of increasing our happiness.

5 And hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us.

Tribulation worketh patience] Τροπονως, endurance under trials, without sustaining loss or deterioration. It is a metaphor taken from refining metals. We do not speak thus from any sudden raptures, or extraordinary sensations we may have of spiritual joy: for we find that the tribulations through which we pass are the means of exercising and increasing our patience, our meek forbearance of injuries received, or persecutions experienced, on account of the Gospel.

Verse 4. And patience, experience] Δοκιμασι, full proof by trial, of the truth of our religion, the solidity of our Christian state, and the faithfulness of our God. In such cases we have the opportunity of putting our religion to the test; and, by every such test, it receives the deeper sterling stamp. The apostle uses here also a metaphor, taken from the purifying, refining, and testing of silver and gold.

Experience, hope] For we thus calculate, that he who has supported us in the past, will support us in those which may yet come; and as we have received so much spiritual profiting by means of the sufferings through which we have already passed, we may profit equally by those which are yet to come: and this hope prevents us from dreading coming trials; we receive them as means of grace, and find that all things work together for good, to them that love God.

Verse 5. And hope maketh not ashamed] A hope that is not rationally founded, will have its expectation cut off; and then shame and confusion will be the portion of its possessor. But our hope is of a different kind; it is founded on the goodness and truth of God; and our religious experience shows us that we have not misapplied it; nor exercised it on wrong or improper objects.

Because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts] We have the most solid and convincing testimony of God's love to us, by that measure of it which he has communicated to our hearts. There ἀναχυσται, it is poured out, and diffused abroad; filling, quickening, and invigorating all our powers and faculties. This love is the spring of all our actions; it is the motive of our obedience; the principle through which we love God; we love him because he first loved us: and we love him with a love worthy of him self, because it springs from him: it is his own; and every flame that rises from this pure and vigorous fire, must be pleasing in his sight: it consumes what is unholy; refines every passion and appetite; sublimates the whole, and assimilates all to itself. And we know that this is the love of God; it differs widely from all that is earthly and sensual. The Holy Ghost comes with it; by his energy it is diffused, and pervades every part; and, by his light, we discover what it is; and know the state of grace in which we stand. Thus we are furnished to every good word and work: have produced in us the mind that was in Christ; are enabled to obey the pure law of our God in its spiritual sense, by loving him with all our heart, soul, mind, and strength; and our neighbour; any and every soul of man, as ourselves. This is, or ought to be, the common experience of every genuine believer: but, in addition to this, the primitive Christians had, sometimes, the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit.—These were then needful: and, were they needful now, they would be again communicated.

Verse 6. For when we were yet without strength] The apostle having pointed out the glorious state of the believing Gentiles, takes occasion to contrast this with their former state; and the means by which they were redeemed from it. Their former state he points out in four particulars; which may be applied to men in general.

I. They were aversus, without strength: in a weak, dying state: neither able to resist sin, nor do any good; utterly devoid of power to extricate themselves from the misery of their situation.

II. They were aversus, ungodly: without either the worship or knowledge of the true God; they had not God in them; and, consequently, were not partakers of the Divine nature: Satan lived in, ruled, and enslaved their hearts.

III. They were αμαρτωλοι, *sinner*s, ver. 8. aiming at happiness, but constantly missing the mark, which is the ideal meaning of the Hebrew man chata; and the Greek αμαρτανα. See this explained, Gen. xiii. 13. And in missing the mark, they deviated from the right way; walked in the wrong way; trespassed, in thus deviating; and, by breaking the commandments of God, not only missed the mark of felicity, but exposed themselves to everlasting misery.

IV. They were εχθροι, enemies, ver. 10. from εχθος, hatred, enmity, persons who hated God and holiness; and acted in continual hostility to both. What a gradation is here! 1. In our fall from God, our first apparent state is, that we are without strength; have lost our principle of spiritual power, by having lost the image of God, righteousness and true holiness, in which we were created. 2. We are ungodly, having lost our strength to do good; we have also lost all power to worship God aright. The mind which was made for God, is no longer his residence. 3. We are *sinner*s; feeling we have lost our centre of rest, and our happiness, we go about seeking rest, but find none: what we have lost in losing God, we seek in earthly things; and thus are continually missing the mark, and multiplying transgressions against our Maker. 4. We are enemies: sin, indulged, increases in strength; evil acts engender fixed and rooted habits; the mind, every where poisoned with sin, increases in averseness from good; and mere aversion produces enmity; and enmity, acts of hostility, fell cruelty, &c. So that the enemy of God hates his Maker and his service, is cruel to his fellow creatures; “a foe to God, was ne’er true friend to man;” and even torments his own soul! Though every man brings into the world the seeds of all these evils; yet, it is only by growing up in him, that they acquire their perfection. Nemo repenti fuit turpissimus, no man becomes a profligate at once; he arrives at it by slow degrees: and the speed he makes is proportioned to his circumstances; means of gratifying sinful passions, evil education, bad company, &c. &c. These make a great diversity in the moral states of men: all have the same seeds of evil, nemo sine vitii nascitur, all come defiled into the world; but all have not the same opportunities of cultivating these seeds. Besides, as God’s Spirit is continually convincing the world of sin, righteousness, and judgment; and the ministers of God are seconding its influence with their pious exhortations: as the Bible is in almost every house; and is less or more heard or read by almost every person, these evil seeds are receiving continual blasts and checks, so that, in many cases, they have not a vigorous growth. These causes make the principal moral differences that we find among men; though, in evil propensities, they are all radically the same.

That all the preceding characters are applied by some learned men to the Gentiles, exclusively as such, I am well aware; and that they may be all applied to them in a national point of view, there can be little doubt. But there are too many correspondences between the state of the modern Gentiles and that of the ancient Gentiles, to justify their propriety of applying the whole as fully to the former as to the latter. Indeed the four particulars already explained, point out the natural and practical state of every human being, previously to his regeneration by the grace and Spirit of God.

In due time Christ died for the ungodly] This due or proper time, will appear in the following particulars:—1. Christ was manifested in the flesh when the world needed him most—2. When the powers of the human mind had been cultivated to the utmost both in Greece and Rome; and had made every possible effort, but all in vain, to find out some efficient scheme of happiness—3. When the Jews were in the lowest state of corruption, and had the greatest need of the promised Deliverer—4. When the fulness of time came, foretold by the prophets—5. When both Jews and Gentiles, the one from their jealousy, the other from their learning, were best qualified to detect imposture, and to ascertain fact—6. In a word, Christ came when his advent was most likely to promote its great object, glory to God in the highest; and peace and good will among men. And the success that attended the preaching of Christ and his apostles, together with the wide and rapid spread of the Gospel, all prove that it was the due time, κατα καιρον, the proper season: and that Divine wisdom was justified in fixing upon that time in preference to all others.

Died for the ungodly] ἵνα ἀδικῶν ἀδικῶν, He died INSTEAD of the ungodly, see also ver. 8. so Luke xxii. 19. The body of Christ, το σῶμα ὑμῶν διδομενον, which was given FOR you; i. e. the life that was laid down in your STEAD. In this way the preposition, ὑπὲρ, is used by the best Greek writers.

Verse 7. For scarcely for a righteous man will one die] The Jews divide men, as to their moral character, into four classes. First, those who say, "What is mine is my own; and what is thine, is thy own." These may be considered the just, who render to every man his due; or rather, they who neither give nor take. The second class is made up of those who say, "What is mine is thine; and what is thine, is mine." These are they who accommodate each other; who borrow and lend. The third class is composed of those who say, "What is mine, is thine, and what is thine, let it be thine." These are the pious, or good, who give up all for the benefit of their neighbour. The fourth class are those who say, "What is thine, is mine; and what is thine shall be mine." These are the impious, who take all, and give nothing. Now, for one of the first class, who would die? There is nothing amiable in his life or conduct that would so endear him to any man, as to induce him to risk his life to save such a person.

Peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die.] That is, for one of the third class, who gives all he has for the good of others. This is the truly benevolent man, whose life is devoted to the public good; for such a person, peradventure, some who have had their lives perhaps preserved by his bounty, would even dare to die: but such cases may be considered merely as possible: they exist, it is true, in romance: and we find a few rare instances of friends exposing themselves to death for their friends. See the case of Jonathan and David; Damon and Pythias, Val. Max. lib. 4. c. 7. And our Lord says, John x. 11, 12, Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend. This is the utmost we can expect among men.

ἵνα ἡμεῖς, God hath set this act of infinite mercy in the most conspicuous light, so as to recommend it to the notice and admiration of all.

While we were yet sinners] We were neither righteous nor good: but impious and wicked.—See the preceding verse, and see the note on verse 6.

Verse 9. Much more then, being now justified] If Jesus Christ, in his endless compassion towards us, gave his life for ours, while we were yet enemies; being now justified by his blood, yet his death on the cross; and thus reconciled to God, we shall be saved from wrath, from punishment for past transgressions, through him, by what he has thus suffered for us.

Verse 10. For if, when we were enemies] See under ver. 6.

We were reconciled] The enmity existing before, rendered the reconciliation necessary. In every human heart there is a measure of enmity to holiness; and, consequently, to the Author of it. Men seldom suspect this: for one property of sin is, to blind the understanding, so that men do not know their own state.

We shall be saved by his life.] For, as he died for our sins, so he rose again for our justification: and his resurrection to life, is the grand proof that he has accomplished whatever he had purposed in reference to the salvation of man. 2. This may be also understood of his life of intercession: for it is written, He ever liveth to make intercession for us, Hebr. vii. 25. Through this life of intercession at the right-hand of God, we are spared and blessed. 3. And it will not be amiss to consider that, as our salvation implies the renovation of our nature, and our being restored to the image of God, so συνδομινα ἐν τῷ ζῶει αὐτοῦ, may be rendered, we shall be saved in his life; for, I suppose, it is pretty generally agreed that the life of God, in the soul of man, is essential to its salvation. 4. The example also of the life of Christ, is a means of salvation. He hath left us an example that we should follow his steps; and he that followeth him, shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of LIFE, John viii. 12.

Verse 11. We also joy (καυχόμενοι, we exult, or glory in God, &c.) We now feel that God is reconciled to us, and we are reconciled to him; the enmity is removed from our souls; and He, for Christ's sake, through whom we have received the atonement, καταλάσθην, the reconciliation, has remitted the wrath, the punishment which we deserved: and now through this reconciliation, we expect an eternal glory.

λαγν here, by atonement, instead of reconciliation; as καταλλαξω, signifies to reconcile, and is so rendered by our translators in all the places where it occurs. It does not mean the atonement here, as we generally understand that word, viz. the sacrificial death of Christ; but rather the effect of that atonement, the removal of the enmity, and by this, the change of our condition and state; from καρα, intensive, and αλλαξω, to change; the thorough change of our state from enmity to friendship. God is reconciled to us, and we are reconciled to him by the death of his Son; and thus there is a glorious change from enmity to friendship; and we can exult in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have received this reconciliation. Though boasting is forbidden to a Jew, because his is a false confidence; yet boasting is enjoined to a Christian; to one reconciled to God; for, his boasting is only in that reconciliation, and the endless mercy by which it was procured. So, he that glorieth, boasteth, must glory in the Lord.

Verse 12. Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world From this verse to the conclusion of the chapter, the apostle produces a strong argument to prove, that as all mankind stood in need of the grace of God in Christ, to redeem them from their sins; so this grace has been afforded equally to all, both Jews and Gentiles.

Dr. Taylor has given the following analysis of the apostle's mode of argumentation. The argument stands thus:—"The consequences of Christ's obedience extend as far as the consequences of Adam's disobedience. The consequences of Adam's disobedience extend to all mankind; and, therefore, so do the consequences of Christ's obedience. Now, if the Jews will not allow the Gentiles any interest in Abraham, as not being naturally descended from him; yet they must own that the Gentiles are the descendants of Adam, as well as themselves; and being all equally involved in the consequences of his sin, from which," (as far as the death of the body is concerned,) "they shall all equally be released at the resurrection, through the free gift of God; therefore they could not deny the Gentiles a share in all the other blessings included in the same gift."

This argument, besides proving the main point, goes to show—1. That the grace of God in the Gospel abounds beyond, or very far exceeds, the mere reversing of the sufferings brought upon mankind by Adam's one offence; it bestows a vast surplussage of blessings which have no relation to that offence, but to the many offences which mankind have committed; and to the exuberance of the Divine grace. 2. To show how justly the Divine grace is founded on the obedience of Christ; in correspondence to the dispensation Adam was under, and to the consequence of his disobedience: if this disobedience involved all mankind in death, it is proper that the obedience of Christ should be the cause not only of reversing that death to all mankind, but also of other blessings which God should see fit, (through him,) to bestow on the world. 3. It serves to explain, and set in a clear view, the difference between the law and grace. It was the law, which, for Adam's one transgression, subjected him and his posterity, as included in him when he transgressed, to death, without hopes of a revival. It is grace which restores all men to life at the resurrection; and over and above that, has provided a gracious dispensation for the pardon of their sins; for reducing them to obedience; for guarding them against temptations; supplying them with strength and comfort; and for advancing them to eternal life. This would give the attentive Jew a just notion of the law, which himself was under; and under which he was desirous of bringing the Gentiles.

The order in which the apostle handles this argument is this:—1. He affirms that death passed upon all men, by Adam's one transgression, ver. 12. 2. He proves this, ver. 13, 14. 3. He affirms there is a correspondence between Adam and Christ; or between the παραπτωμα, offence; and the χαρισμα, free gift, ver. 14. 4. This correspondence, so far as the two opposite parts answer to each other, is justly expressed, ver. 18, and 19. and there we have the main or fundamental position of the apostle's argument, in relation to the point which he has been arguing from the beginning of the epistle: namely, the extensiveness of the grace of the Gospel, that it actually reaches to ALL MEN, and is not confined to the Jews. 5. But before he laid down this position, it was necessary that he should show that the correspondence between Adam and Christ, or between the offence and the gift, is not to be confined strictly to the bounds specified in the position, as if the gift reached no further than the consequences of the offence; when in reality it extends vastly beyond them, ver. 15, 16, 17. 6. Having settled these points, as previously necessary to clear his fundamental position, and fit to his argument, he then lays down that position in a diversified manner of speech, ver. 18, 19. just as in 1 Cor. xv. 20, 21. and leaves us to conclude, from the premises laid down, ver. 15, 16, 17. that the gift and the grace, in its utmost extent, is as free to all mankind, who are willing to accept of it, as this particular instance, the resurrection from the dead. They shall all be raised from the dead hereafter: they may all be quickened by the Spirit here. 7. Having thus shown the extensiveness of the Divine grace, in opposition to the dire effects of the law under which Adam was; that the Jews

might not overlook what he intended they should particularly observe, he puts them in mind that the law given to Adam, transgress and die, was introduced into the Jewish constitution by the ministry of Moses; and for this end, that the offence with the penalty of death annexed to it, might abound, ver. 20. But, to illustrate the Divine grace, by setting it in contrast to the law, he immediately adds, where sin, subjecting to death, hath abounded, grace hath much more abounded; that is, in blessings bestowed; it has stretched far beyond both Adam's transgression, and the transgressions under the law of Moses, ver. 20, 21. and see the note on the first of these verses.

“1. As to the order of time; the apostle carries his arguments backwards from the time when Christ came into the world, (chap. i. 17. to chap. iv.) to the time when the covenant was made with Abraham, (chap. iv.) to the time when the judgment to condemnation, pronounced upon Adam, came upon all men, chap. v. 12. to the end. And thus he gives us a view of the principal dispensations from the beginning of the world.

“11. In this last case, as well as in the two former, he uses law, or forensic terms; judgment to condemnation, justification, justify, made sinners, made righteous. And therefore as he considers both Jews and Gentiles at the coming of Christ, and Abraham, when the covenant was made with him; so he considers Adam, and all men, as standing in the court before the tribunal of God. And this was the clearest and concise way of representing his arguments.”

Sin entered into the world] There was neither sin nor death before the offence of Adam: after that there were both. Adam's transgression was therefore the cause of both.

And death by sin] Natural evil is evidently the effect of moral evil: if man had never sinned, he had never suffered. Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return, was never spoken till after Adam had eaten the forbidden fruit.

Death passed upon all men] Hence we see, that all human beings partook in the consequences of Adam's sin. He propagated his like; and, with the rudiments of his own nature, propagated those of his moral likeness.

For that all have sinned] All are born with a sinful nature; and the seeds of this evil soon vegetate, and bring forth corresponding fruits. There has never been one instance of an immaculate human soul since the fall of Adam. Every man sins, and sins too after the similitude of Adam's transgression. Adam endeavoured to be independent of God: all his offspring act in the same way; hence prayer is little used, because prayer is the language of dependance; and this is inconsistent with every emotion of original sin. When these degenerate children of degenerate parents are detected in their sins, they act just as their parents did; each excuses himself, and lays the blame on another. What hast thou done?—The woman whom thou gavest me, to be with me, she gave me, and I did eat. What hast thou done?—The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat. Thus, it is extremely difficult to find a person who ingenuously acknowledges his own transgression. See the notes on Gen. iii. 6, &c. where the doctrine of original sin is particularly considered.

14 Nevertheless death reigned from ^c Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression,

Verse 13. For until the law, sin was in the world] As death reigned from Adam to Moses; so also did sin. Now, as there was no written law from Adam till that given to Moses; the death that prevailed could not be the consequence of the breach of that law; for sin, so as to be punished with temporal death, is not imputed when there is no law, which shows the penalty of sin to be death. Therefore, men are not subjected to death for their own personal transgressions, but for the sin of Adam; as through his transgression, all come into the world with the seeds of death and corruption in their own nature, superadded to their moral depravity. All are sinful—all are mortal—and all must die.

Verse 14. Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses] This supposes, as Dr. Taylor very properly observes:—1. That sin was in the world from Adam to Moses. 2. That law was not in the world from Adam to Moses, during the space of about 2500 years; for, after Adam's transgression, that law was abrogated; and from that time, men were either under the general covenant of grace, given to Adam or Noah; or under that which was specially made with Abraham. 3. That therefore the sins committed were not imputed unto them to death; for they did not sin after the similitude of Adam's transgression; that is, they did not, like him, transgress a law, or rule of action, to which death as the penalty, was annexed. And yet,—4. Death reigned over mankind, during the period between Adam and Moses. Therefore men did not die for their own transgressions, but in consequence of Adam's one transgression. See the note on this passage at the end of the Preface, p. 33.

Who is the figure of him that was to come] Adam was the figure, reverse, the type, pattern, or resemblance of him who was to come: i. e. of the Messiah. The correspondence between them appears in the following particulars:—1. Through him, as its spring and fountain, sin became diffused through the world, so that every man comes into the world with sinful propensities: for, by one man, sin entered into the world; and death by sin; and so judgment passed upon all men, ver. 12. Through Christ, as its spring and fountain, righteousness becomes diffused through the earth; so that every man is made partaker of a principle of grace and truth; for he is the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world. John i. 9. 2. As in Adam all die; so in Christ shall all be made alive, 1 Cor. xv. 22. For, since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead, ver. 21. 3. As in, or through Adam, guilt came upon all men; so, through Christ, the free gift comes upon all men unto justification of life, ver. 18. These alone seem to be the instances in which a similitude exists between Adam and Christ.

Verse 15. But not as the offence, so also is the free gift! The same learned writer quoted above, continues to observe; "It is evident that the apostle, in this and the two following verses, is running a parallel, or making a comparison between the offence of Adam and its consequence; and the opposite gift of God, and its consequences. And in these three verses he shows that the comparison will not hold good in all respects; because the free gift, χάρισμα, bestows blessings far beyond the consequences of the offence; and which, therefore, have no relation to it. And this was necessary, not only to prevent mistakes concerning the consequence of Adam's offence, and the extent of Gospel grace; but it was also necessary to the apostle's main design; which was not only to prove that the grace of the Gospel extends to all men, so far as it takes off the consequence of Adam's offence, [i. e. death, without the promise or probability of a resurrection,] but that it likewise extends to all men, with respect to the surplussage of blessings; in which it stretches far beyond the consequences of Adam's offence.—For, the grace that takes off the consequence of Adam's offence, and the grace which abounds beyond it, are both included in the same χάρισμα, or free gift, which should be well observed; for in this, I conceive, lie the connexion and sinews of the argument: the free gift, which stands opposed to Adam's offence; and which, I think, was bestowed immediately after the offence, Gen. iii. 15, The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head: this gift, I say, includes both the grace which exactly answers to the offence; and also that part of the grace which stretches far beyond it. And, if the one part of the gift be freely bestowed on all mankind, as the Jews allow, why not the other? especially, considering that the whole gift stands upon a reason and foundation in excellence and worth, vastly surpassing the malignity and demerit of the offence; and, consequently, capable of producing benefits vastly beyond the sufferings occasioned by the offence. This is the force of the apostle's argument: and, therefore, supposing that in the 18th and 19th verses, literally understood, he compares the consequence of Adam's offence, and Christ's obedience, only so far as the one is commensurate to the other; yet his reasoning, ver. 15, 16, 17, plainly shows, that it is his meaning and intention that we should take into his conclusion the whole of the gift, so far as it can reach, to all mankind."

For, if through the offence of one, many be dead] That the οἱ πολλοί, the many, of the apostle, here means all mankind, needs no proof to any but that person who finds himself qualified to deny that all men are mortal. And if the many, that is all mankind, have died through the offence of one; certainly the gift by grace, which abounds unto τοῖς πολλοῖς, the many, by Christ Jesus, must have reference to every human being. If the consequences of Christ's incarnation and death extend only to a few, or a select number of mankind, which, though they may be considered many in themselves, are few in comparison of the whole human race; then the consequences of Adam's sin have extended only to a few, or to the same select number: and if only many, and not all, have fallen, only that many had need of a Redeemer. For, it is most evident, that the same persons are referred to in both clauses of the verse. If the apostle had believed that the benefits of the death of Christ had extended only to a select number of mankind, he never could have used the language he has done here: though, in the first clause he might have said, without any qualification of the term, through the offence of one, many are dead: in the 2d clause, to be consistent with the doctrine of particular redemption, he must have said, The grace of God, and the gift by grace, hath abounded unto some. As by the offence of one, judgment came upon ALL men to condemnation; so, by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon SOME to justification, ver. 18. As, by one man's disobedience, many were made sinners; so, by the obedience of one, shall some be made righteous, ver. 19. As in Adam ALL die; so, in Christ shall some be made alive, 1 Cor. xv. 22. But neither the doctrine nor the thing ever entered the soul of this divinely inspired man.

Hath abounded unto many.] That is, Christ Jesus died for every man; salvation is free for all; saving grace is tendered to every soul; and a measure of the Divine light is actually communicated to every heart, John i. 9. And, as the grace is offered, so it may be received; and hence the apostle says, ver. 17, they which receive abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life by Christ Jesus; and, by receiving, is undoubtedly meant not only the act of receiving, but retaining and improving the grace which they receive; and, as all may receive, so ALL may improve and retain the grace they do receive; and, consequently, ALL may be eternally saved. But of multitudes, Christ still may say, They WILL not come unto me that they might have life.

Verse 16. And not as it was by one that sinned] That is, the judicial act that followed Adam's sin, (the sentence of death pronounced upon him, and his expulsion from Paradise,) took its rise from his one offence alone, and terminated in condemnation; but the free gift of God in Christ takes its rise also from the many offences which men, in a long course of life, have personally committed; and the object of this grace is to justify them freely, and bring them to eternal life.

Verse 17. Death reigned by one] Death is here personified, and is represented as reigning over the human race; and death of course reigns unto death; he is known as reigning, by the destruction of his subjects.

Shall reign in life] Those who receive, retain, and improve the abundant grace offered by Jesus Christ, shall be redeemed from the empire of death, and exalted to the throne of God, to live and reign with him ever, world without end. See Rev. i. 5, 6. ii. 7, 10, 11. iii. 21.

If we carefully compare ver. 15. with ver. 17. we shall find that there is a correspondence between abounding, ver. 17. and abounded, ver. 15. between the gift of righteousness, i. e. justification, ver. 17. and the gift by grace, ver. 15. Therefore, if we understand the abounding of grace, and the gift of justification, ver. 17. we shall understand the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which hath abounded unto the many, ver. 15. But the abounding of grace, and the gift of justification, ver. 17. is that grace and gift which is RECEIVED by those who shall reign in eternal life. Reigning in life, is the consequence of receiving the grace and gift. Therefore, receiving the grace, is a necessary qualification on our part, for reigning in life; and this necessarily implies our believing in Christ Jesus, as having died for our offences, receiving the grace so freely offered us; using the means in order to get more grace, and bringing forth the fruits of the Spirit. Receive, must here have the same sense as in Matt. xiii. 20. He heareth the word, and with joy RECEIVETH it. John i. 12. But as many as RECEIVED him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God. John iii. 11. Ye RECEIVE not our witness.—See also ver. 32, 33. ^b Or, by one offence.

I am come in my Father's name, and ye RECEIVE me not. John xii. 48. He that RECEIVETH not my words. John xiii. 20. He that receiveth whomsoever I send, RECEIVETH me. John xiv. 17. The Spirit of truth whom the world cannot RECEIVE. John xvii. 8. I have given them the words which thou gavest me; and they have RECEIVED them. In all these passages it is evident that receiving and not receiving imply improving or not improving.

Verse 18. Therefore, as by the offence of one, &c.] The Greek text of this verse is as follows, Αρα ουκ, ως δι' ενός παραπτώματος, ως παρτας ανθρωπων, ως κατακριμα' ουκ και δι' ενός δικαιωματος, ως παρτας ανθρωπων, ως δικαιωσις ζωης; which, literally rendered, stands thus—Therefore, as by one offence unto all men, unto condemnation; so likewise, by one righteousness unto all men, to justification of life. This is evidently an elliptical sentence, and its full meaning can be gathered only from the context. He who had no particular purpose to serve, would, most probably, understand it, from the context, thus—Therefore, as by one sin, all men came into condemnation; so also, by one righteous act, all men came unto justification of life; which is more fully expressed in the following verse. Now, leaving all particular creeds out of the question; and taking in the scope of the apostle's reasoning in this and the preceding chapter, is not the sense evidently this? Through the disobedience of Adam, a sentence of condemnation to death, without any promise or hope of a resurrection, passed upon all men; so by the obedience of Christ unto death, this one grand righteous act, the sentence was so far reversed, that death shall not finally triumph; for all shall again be restored to life; justice must have its due; and therefore all must die. The mercy of God in Christ Jesus, shall have its due also; and therefore all shall be put into a salvable state here, and the whole human race shall be raised to life at the great day. Thus, both justice and mercy are magnified; and neither is exalted at the expense of the other.

The apostle uses three remarkable words in these three verses: 1. δικαιοσυνη, justification, ver. 16. 2. δικαιωσις, which we render righteousness, verse 17. but is best rendered justification, as expressing that pardon and salvation offered to us in the Gospel: see the note, chap. i. 16. 3. δικαιωσις, which is also rendered justification, verse 18.

The first word δικαιοσυνη, is found in the following places, Luke i. 6. Rom. i. 32. ii. 26. v. 16, 18. viii. 4. Heb. ix. 1, 10. Rev. xv. 4. and xix. 8. to which the reader may refer. δικαιοσυνη, signifies, among the Greek writers, the sentence of a judge, acquitting the innocent, condemning and punishing the guilty; but in the one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so ^a by the righteousness of one, the free gift came ^b upon all men unto justification of life.

19 For, as by one man's ^c diso-

New Testament it signifies whatever God has appointed, or sanctioned as a law; and appears to answer to the Hebrew מִשְׁפָּט mişpat Yehovah, the statute, or judgment of the Lord. It has evidently this sense in Luke i. 6. *walking in all the commandments and ordinances, δικαιοσύνης, of the Lord blameless*; and it has the like meaning in the principal places referred to above: but in the verse in question, it most evidently means absolution, or liberation from punishment, as it is opposed to κατάκριμα, condemnation, verse 18.—See the note on ch. i. 16. and see Schleuser in voce.

The second word, δικαιοσύνη, I have explained at large in ch. i. 16. already referred to.

The third word, δικαιοσύνη, is used by the Greek writers, almost universally, to denote the punishment inflicted on a criminal, or the condemnatory sentence itself; but in the New Testament, where it occurs only twice, (Rom. iv. 25, *he was raised for our justification, *δικαιοσύνη, and chap. v. 18, *unto justification of life, *δικαιοσύνη (see,) it evidently signifies the pardon and remission of sins: and seems to be nearly synonymous with δικαιώσις. Dr. Taylor thinks that "δικαιοσύνη, is Gospel pardon and salvation; and has reference to God's mercy. δικαιοσύνη, is our being set quite clear and right; or our being restored to sanctity, delivered from eternal death, and being brought to eternal life; and has reference to the power and guilt of sin. And δικαιοσύνη, he thinks may mean no more than our being restored to life at the resurrection." Taking these in their order: there is, first, pardon of sin. Secondly, purification of heart, and preparation for glory. Thirdly, the resurrection of the body, and its being made like to his glorious body, so as to become a fit tabernacle for the soul in a glorified state for ever and ever.

The same writer observes, that when the apostle speaks of forgiveness of sins, simply, he insists on faith as the condition; but here, where he speaks of justification of life, he mentions no condition; and therefore he supposes justification of life, the phrase being understood in a forensic sense, to mean no more than the decree or judgment that determines the resurrection from the dead. This is a favourite point with the Doctor, and he argues largely for it: see his Notes.

Verse 19. For, as by one man's disobedience, &c.] The explanation of this verse has been anticipated in the foregoing.

Verse 20. The law entered that the offence might abound] After considering various opinions concerning the true meaning of this verse, (see under verse 12.) I am induced to prefer my own, as being the most simple. By law I understand the Mosaic law. By *entering in, *εἰσέρχεται, or rather coming in privily, see Gal. i. 4. (the only place where it occurs besides,) I understand the temporary or limited use of that law, which was, as far as its rites and ceremonies are considered, confined to the Jewish people; and to them only till the Messiah should come: but, considered as the moral law, or rule of conscience and life, it has in its spirit and power been slipped in, introduced into every conscience, that sin might abound, that the true nature, deformity, and extent of sin, might appear; for by the law is the knowledge of sin: for how can the finer deviations from a straight line be ascertained, without the application of a known straight edge? Without this rule of right, sin can only be known in a sort of general way; the innumerable deviations from positive rectitude can only be known by the application of the righteous statutes of which the law is composed. And it was necessary that this law should be given, that the true nature of sin might be seen, and that men might be the better prepared to receive the Gospel; finding that this law worketh only wrath, i. e. denounces punishment, forasmuch as all have sinned. Now, it is wisely ordered of God, that wherever the Gospel goes, there the law goes also; entering every where, that sin may be seen to abound, and that men may be led to despair of salvation in any other way, or on any terms, but those proposed in the Gospel of Christ. Thus the sinner becomes a true penitent, and is glad, seeing the curse of the law hanging over his soul, to flee for refuge to the hope set before him in the Gospel.

But where sin abounded] Whether in the world, or in the heart of the individual, being discovered by this most pure and righteous law; grace did much more abound: not only pardon for all that is past, is offered by the Gospel, so that all the transgressions for which the soul is condemned to death by the law, are freely and fully forgiven; but also the Holy Spirit, in the abundance of his gifts and graces, is communicated, so as to prepare the receiver for an exceeding great and eternal weight of glory. Thus, the grace of the Gospel not only redeems from death, and restores to life; but brings the soul into such a relationship with God, and into such a participation of eternal glory, as we have no authority to believe ever would have been the portion even of Adam himself, had he even eternally retained his innocence. Thus, where sin abounded; grace did much more abound.

Verse 21. That as sin hath reigned unto death] As extensively, as deeply, as universally, as sin, whether implying the act of transgression, or the impure principle from which the act proceeds, or both :—hath reigned, subjected the whole earth and all its inhabitants; the whole soul, and all its powers and faculties, unto death, temporal, of the body, spiritual of the soul, and eternal of both ; even so, as extensively, deeply, and universally, might grace reign, filling the whole earth, and pervading, purifying, and refining the whole soul : through righteousness, through this doctrine of free salvation, by the blood of the Lamb, and by the principle of holiness transfused through the soul by the Holy Ghost ; unto eternal life, the proper object of an immortal spirit's hope, the only sphere where the human intellect can rest, and be happy in the place and state where God is ; where he is seen AS HE IS ; and where he can be enjoyed without interruption in an eternal progression of knowledge and beatitude ; by Jesus Christ our Lord, as the cause of our salvation, the means by which it is communicated, and the source whence it springs. Thus we find, that the salvation from sin here, is as extensive and complete as the guilt and contamination of sin ; death is conquered, hell disappointed, the devil confounded, and sin totally destroyed. Here is glorying, to Him that loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and has made us kings and priests to God and his Father, be glory and dominion, for ever and ever. Amen! Hallelujah! The Lord God omnipotent reigneth ! Amen, and Amen.

What highly interesting and momentous truths does the preceding chapter bring to our view ! No less than the doctrine of the fall of man from original righteousness ; and the redemption of the world by the incarnation and death of Christ. On the subject of the FALL, though I have spoken much on the notes on Genesis, chap. iii. yet it may be necessary to make a few further observations :

1. That all mankind have fallen under the empire of death, through this original transgression, the apostle most positively asserts ; and few men who profess to believe the Bible, pretend to dispute. This point is indeed ably stated, argued, and proved, by Dr. Taylor, from whose observations the preceding notes are considerably enriched. But there is one point, which I think not less evident : which he has not only not included in his argument, but as far as it came in his way, has argued against it, viz. the degeneracy and moral corruption of the human soul. As no man can account for the death brought into the world, but on the ground of this primitive transgression ; so none can account for the moral evil that is in the world on any other ground. It is a fact, that every human being brings into the world with him the seeds of dissolution and mortality. Into this state we are fallen, according to divine revelation, through the one offence of Adam. This fact is proved by the mortality of all men. It is not less a fact, that every man that is born into the world brings with him the seeds of moral evil ; these he could not have derived from his Maker, for the most pure and holy God can make nothing impure, imperfect, or unholy. Into this state, we are reduced, according to the Scripture, by the transgression of Adam ; for by this one man, sin entered into the world, as well as death.

2. The fact, that all come into the world with sinful propensities, is proved by another fact, that every man sins ; that sin is his first work, and that no exception to this has ever been noticed, except in the human nature of Jesus Christ ; and that exempt case is sufficiently accounted for from this circumstance, that it did not come in the common way of natural generation.

3. As like produces its like, if Adam became mortal and sinful, he could not communicate properties which he did not possess ; and he must transmit those which constituted his natural and moral likeness. Therefore all his posterity must resemble himself. Nothing less than a constant miraculous energy presiding over the formation and development of every human body and soul, could prevent the seeds of natural and moral evil from being propagated. That these seeds are not produced in men by their own personal transgressions, is most positively asserted by the apostle in the preceding chapter ; and that they exist before the human being is capable of actual transgression, or of the exercise of will and judgment, so as to prefer and determine, is evident to the most superficial observer : 1st, from the most marked and evil propensities of children long before reason can have any influence or control over passion ; and 2dly, it is demonstrated by the death of millions in a state of infancy. It could not, therefore, be personal transgression that produced the evil propensities in the one case ; nor death in the other.

4. While misery, death, and sin, are in the world, we shall have incontrovertible proofs of the fall of man. Men may dispute against the doctrine of original sin ; but such facts as the above, will be a standing irrefragable argument against every thing that can be advanced against the doctrine itself.

5. The justice of permitting this general infection to become diffused, has been strongly oppugned. "Why should the innocent suffer for the guilty ?" As God made man to propagate his like on the earth, his transmitting the same kind of nature with which he was formed, must be a necessary consequence of that propagation. He might, it is true, have cut off forever, the offending pair; but this, most evidently, did not comport with his creative designs. "But he might have rendered Adam incapable of sin." This does not appear. If he had been incapable of sinning, he would have been incapable of holiness; that is, he could not have been a free agent; or, in other words, he could not have been an intelligent or intellectual being; he must have been a mass of inert and unconscious matter. "But God might have cut them off, and created a new race." He certainly might; and what would have been gained by this? Why, just nothing. The second creation, if of intelligent beings at all, must have been precisely similar to the first; and the circumstances in which these last were to be placed, must be exactly such as infinite wisdom saw to be the most proper for their predecessors; and consequently the most proper for them. They also must have been in a state of probation; they also must have been placed under a law; this law must be guarded by penal sanctions; the possibility of transgression must be the same in the second case as in the first; and the lapse as probable, because as possible to this second race of human beings, as it was to their predecessors. It was better, therefore, to let the same pair continue, to fulfil the great end of their creation, by propagating their like upon the earth; and to introduce an antidote to the poison, and by a dispensation as strongly expressive of wisdom as of goodness, to make the ills of life, which were the consequences of their transgression, the means of correcting the evil, and through the wondrous economy of grace, sanctifying even these to the eternal good of the soul.

6. Had not God provided a Redeemer, he no doubt would have terminated the whole mortal story, by cutting off the original transgressors; for it would have been unjust to permit them to propagate their like in such circumstances, that their offspring must be unavoidably and eternally wretched.

God has therefore provided such a Saviour, the merit of whose passion and death should apply to every human being, and should infinitely transcend the demerit of the original transgression, and put every soul that received that grace, (and ALL may.) into a state of greater excellence and glory than that was, or could have been, from which Adam, by transgressing, fell.

7. The state of infants, dying before they are capable of hearing the Gospel; and the state of heathens who have no opportunity of knowing how to escape from their corruption and misery; have been urged as cases of peculiar hardship. But, first, there is no evidence in the whole book of God, that any child dies eternally for Adam's sin. Nothing of this kind is intimated in the Bible; and as Jesus took upon him human nature, and condescended to be born of a woman in a state of perfect helpless infancy, he has, consequently, sanctified this state, and has said, without limitation or exception, Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God. We may justly infer, and all the justice as well as the mercy of the Godhead supports the inference, that all human beings, dying in an infant state, are regenerated by that grace of God which brings salvation to all men, Tit. ii. 11. and go infallibly to the kingdom of heaven. As to the Gentiles, their case is exceedingly clear. The apostle has determined this; see chap. ii. 14, 15. and the notes there. He who in the course of his providence, has withheld from them the letter of his word, has not denied them the light and influence of his SPiRiT: and will judge them in the great day, only according to the grace and means of moral improvement with which they have been favoured. No man will be finally damned, because he was a Gentile, but because he has not made a proper use of the grace and advantages which God had given him. Thus we see that the Judge of all the earth has done right; and we may rest assured that he will eternally act in the same way.

8. The term FALL we use metaphorically, to signify degradation: literally, it signifies stumbling, so as to lose the centre of gravity, or the proper poise of our bodies, in consequence of which we are precipitated to the ground. The term seems to have been borrowed from the παρρησια of the apostle, chap. v. 15—18. which we translate offence, and which is more literally FALL, from περα, intensive, and πιπτο, I fall, a grievous, dangerous, and ruinous fall, and is properly applied to transgression and sin in general; as every act is a degradation of the soul, accompanied with hurt, and tending to destruction. The term, in this sense, is still in common use; the degradation of a man in power, we term his fall; the impoverishment of a rich man we express in the same way: and when a man of piety and probity is overcome by any act of sin, we say he is fallen; he has descended from his spiritual eminence, is degraded from his spiritual excellence, is impure in his soul, and becomes again exposed to the displeasure of his God.

CHAPTER VI.

We must not abuse the boundless goodness of God by continuing in sin, under the wicked persuasion that the more we sin, the more the grace of God will abound, 1. For, having been baptized into Christ, we have professed thereby to be dead to sin, 2—4. And to be planted in the likeness of his resurrection, 5. For we profess to be crucified with him, to die and rise again from the dead, 6—11. We should not, therefore, let sin reign in our bodies, but live to the glory of God, 12—14. The Gospel makes no provision for living in sin, any more than the law did; and those who commit sin, are the slaves of sin, 15—19. The degrading and afflictive service of sin, and its wages, eternal death; the blessed effects of the grace of God in the heart; of which eternal life is the fruit, 20—23.

NOTES ON CHAP. VI.

The apostle having proved that salvation both to the Jew and Gentile must come through the Messiah, and he received by faith only, proceeds in this chapter to show the obligations under which both were laid to live a holy life; and the means and advantages they enjoyed for that purpose. This he does, not only as a thing highly and indispensably necessary in itself, for without holiness none can see the Lord; but to confute a calumny which appears to have been gaining considerable ground even at that time; viz. that the doctrine of justification by faith alone, through the grace of Christ Jesus, rendered obedience to the moral law useless; and that the more evil a man did, the more the grace of God would abound to him, in his redemption from that evil. That this calumny was then propagated, we learn from chap. iii. 8. and the apostle defends himself against it in the 31st verse of the same, by asserting that his doctrine, far from making void the law, served to establish it. But in this, and the two following chapters, he takes up the subject in a regular, formal manner; and shows both Jews and Gentiles, that the principles of the Christian religion absolutely required a holy heart, and a holy life, and made the amplest provision for both.

Verse 1. Shall we continue in sin] It is very likely that these are the words of a believing Gentile; who, having as yet received but little instruction, for he is but just brought out of his heathen state to believe in Christ Jesus, might imagine, from the manner in which God had magnified his mercy in blotting out his sin, on his simply believing on Christ; that, suppose he even gave way to the evil propensities of his own heart, his transgressions could do him no hurt, now that he was in the favour of God. And we need not wonder that a Gentile, just emerging from the deepest darkness, might entertain such thoughts as these; when we find that eighteen centuries after this, persons have appeared in the most Christian countries of Europe, not merely asking such a question, but defending the doctrine with all their might; and asserting in the most unqualified manner, "that believers were under no obligation to keep the moral law of God; that Christ had kept it for them; that his keeping it was imputed to them; and that God, who had exacted it from Him, who was their Surety and Representative, would not exact it from them; forasmuch as it would be injustice to require two payments for one debt." These are the Antinomians who once flourished in this land, and whose race is not yet utterly extinct.

Verse 2. God forbid!] Μη γάρω, let it not be, by no means; far from it; let not such a thing be mentioned!—any of these is the meaning of the Greek phrase, which is a strong expression of surprise and disapprobation: and is not properly rendered by our God forbid; which, though it may express the same thing, yet it is not proper to make the sacred NAME so familiar on such occasions.

How shall we, that are dead to sin] The phraseology of this verse is common among Hebrews, Greeks, and Latins. To die to a thing, or person, is to have nothing to do with it or him; to be totally separated from them: and to live to a thing or person, is to be wholly given up to them; to have the most intimate connexion with them. So Plautus Clitell. iii. 1—16, Nihil mecum tibi, MORTUUS TIBI SUM. I have nothing to do with thee; I am DEAD to thee. Persa. i. 1. 20, Mihi quidem tu jam MORTUUS ERAS, quia te non visitavi. Thou wert DEAD to me, because I have not visited thee. So Elian, Var. Hist. iii. 13. Οτι φιλοποτατοι εθνος το των Ταυρων, τσουτων, οσι ζιν αυτοις εν οινω, και το πλεον του σιου εν τη προς αυτοι ομιλια καταναλωσκειν. "The Tapyrians are such lovers of wine, that they LIVE in wine; and the principal part of their LIFE is DEVOTED to it." They live to wine; they are insatiable drunkards. See more examples in Welstein and Rosenmüller.

Verse 3. Know ye not, &c.] Every man who believes the Christian religion, and receives baptism as the proof that he believes it, and has taken up the profession of it, is bound thereby to a life of righteousness. To be baptized into Christ, is to receive the doctrine of Christ crucified, and to receive baptism as a proof of the genuineness of that faith, and the obligation to live according to its precepts.

Baptized into his death?] That, as Jesus Christ, in his crucifixion, died completely, so that no spark of the natural or animal life remained in his body; so, those who profess his religion, should be so completely separated and saved from sin, that they have no more connexion with it, nor any more influence from it, than a dead man has with or from his departed spirit.

Verse 4. We are buried with him by baptism into death] It is probable that the apostle here alludes to the mode of administering baptism by immersion, the whole body being put under the water, which seemed to say, the man is drowned, is dead; and, when he came up out of the water, he seemed to have a resurrection to life; the man is risen again; he is alive! He was, therefore, supposed to throw off his old Gentile state, as he threw off his clothes, and to assume a new character, as the baptized generally put on new, or by baptism into death: that glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of fresh garments. I say it is probable that the apostle alludes to this mode of immersion: but it is not absolutely certain that he does so, as some do imagine; for, in the next verse, our being incorporated into Christ by baptism is also denoted by our being planted, or rather grafted together in the likeness of his death: and Noah's ark floating upon the water, and sprinkled by the rain from heaven, is a figure corresponding to baptism, 1 Pet. iii. 20, 21. but neither of these gives us the same idea of the outward form, as burying. We must be careful, therefore, not to lay too much stress on such circumstances. Drowning among the ancients was considered the most noble kind of death: some think that the apostle may allude to this. The grand point is, that this baptism represents our death to sin, and our obligation to walk in newness of life; without which, of what use can it, or any other rite be?

Raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father] From this we learn that, as it required the glory of the Father, that is, his glorious energy, to raise up from the grave the dead body of Christ, so it requires the same glorious energy to quicken the dead soul of a sinner, and enable him to walk in newness of life.

Verse 5. For if we have been planted together] Συμμορτοι γαρ ἐσμεν; Dr. Taylor observes, that our translation does not completely express the apostle's meaning. Τα σμμορτα, are such plants as grow, the one upon, and in the other, deriving sap and nourishment from it, as the mistletoe upon the oak; or the scion upon the stock in which it is grafted. He would therefore translate the words, For if we have been growers together with Christ in the likeness of his death, (or in that which is like his death,) we shall be also growers together with him in the likeness of his resurrection; or in that which is like his resurrection. He reckons it a beautiful metaphor, taken from grafting, or making the scion grow together with the new stock.

But, if we take the word planted, in its usual sense, we shall find it to be a metaphor, as beautiful and as expressive as the former. When the seed, or plant, is inserted in the ground, it derives from that ground all its nourishment, and all those juices by which it becomes developed; by which it increases in size, grows firm, strong, and vigorous; and puts forth its leaves, blossoms, and fruit. The death of Jesus Christ is represented as the cause whence his fruitfulness, as the Author of eternal salvation to mankind, is derived; and genuine believers in him, are represented as being planted in his death, and growing out of it; deriving their growth, vigour, firmness, beauty, and fruitfulness, from it. In a word, it is by his death that Jesus Christ redeems a lost world: and it is from that vicarious death that believers derive that pardon and holiness which make them so happy in themselves, and so useful to others. This sacrificial death is the soil in which they are planted; and from which they derive their life, their fruitfulness, and their final glory.

Verse 6. Our old man is crucified with him] This seems to be a further extension of the same metaphor. When a seed is planted in the earth, it appears as if the whole body of it perished. All seeds, as they are commonly termed, are composed of two parts: the germ, which contains the rudiments of the future plant; and the lobes, or body of the seed, which, by their decomposition in the ground, become the first nourishment to the extremely fine and delicate roots of the embryo plant; and support it till it is capable of deriving grosser nourishment from the common soil. The body dies, that the germ may live. Parables cannot go on all fours: and in metaphors, or figures, there is always some one, (or more,) remarkable property by which the doctrine intended is illustrated. To apply this to the purpose in hand: how is the principle of life which Jesus Christ has implanted in us, to be brought into full effect, vigour, and usefulness? By the destruction of the body of sin, our old man, our wicked, corrupt, and fleshly self, is to be crucified; to be as truly slain as Christ was crucified; that our souls may as truly be raised from a death of sin, to a life of righteousness, as the body of Christ was raised from the grave, and afterward ascended to the right hand of God. But how does this part of the metaphor apply to Jesus Christ? Plainly and forcibly. Jesus Christ took on him a body; a body in the likeness of sinful flesh, Rom. viii. 3. and gave up that body to death; through which death alone, an atonement was made for sin; and the way laid open for the vivifying Spirit to have the fullest access to, and the most powerful operation in, the human heart. Here, the body of Christ dies, that he may be a quickenng Spirit to mankind. Our body of sin is destroyed by this quickening Spirit, that henceforth we should live unto Him who died and rose again. Thus the metaphor, in all its leading senses, is complete; and applies most forcibly to the subject in question. We find that παλαιος ανθρωπος, the old man, used here and in Eph. iv. 22. and Col. iii. 9. is the same as the flesh with its affections and lusts, Gal. v. 24; and the body of the sins of the flesh, Col. ii. 11. And the very same which the Jewish writers term חקמי אדם Adam hakadamoni, the old Adam; and which they interpret by יצר הרע yetzar hard, "evil concupiscence," the same which we mean by in-dwelling sin, or the infection of our nature, in the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin.

7 For ^b he that is dead is ^c freed from sin.

8 Now ^d if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him:

9 Knowing that ^e Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him.

consequence of the fall. From all which we may learn, that the design of God is to counter-work and destroy the very spirit and soul of sin, that we shall no longer serve it, δουλωσιν, no longer be its slaves. Nor shall it any more be capable of performing its essential functions, than a dead body can perform the functions of natural life.

Verse 7. He that is dead is freed from sin.
Δεδικαιωται, literally, is justified from sin; or, is freed or delivered from it. Does not this simply mean, that the man who has received Christ Jesus by faith, and has been, through believing, made a partaker of the Holy Spirit, has had his old man, all his evil propensities, destroyed; so that he is not only justified freely from all sin, but wholly sanctified unto God? The context shows that this is the meaning. Every instance of violence is done to the whole scope and design of the apostle, by the opinion, that "this text is a proof that believers are not fully saved from sin, in this life; because only he that is dead, is freed from sin." Then death is his justi- ficer and deliverer! Base and abominable insinnation, highly derogatory to the glory of Christ! Dr. Dodd, in his note on the preceding verse, after some inefficient criticism on the word καταρῆσθαι, destroyed, which, he thinks, should be rendered enervated, has the following most unevangelical sentiment—"The body of sin in believers, is, indeed, an enfeebled, conquered, and deposed tyrant, and the stroke of death finishes its destruction." So then, the death of Christ, and the influences of the Holy Spirit, were only sufficient to depose and en- feeble the tyrant sin; but our death must come in to effect his total destruction! Thus our death is at least partially our aviour: and thus, that which was an effect of sin, (for sin entered into the world, and death by sin,) becomes the means of finally destroying it! That is, the effect of a cause can become so powerful, as to re-act upon that cause, and produce its annihilation! The divinity and philosophy of this sentiment are equally absurd. It is the blood of Christ alone, that cleanses from all unrighteousness; and the sanctification of a believer, is no more dependent on death than his justification. If it be said, "that believers do not cease from sin till they die;" I have only to say, they are such believers as do not make a proper use of their faith. And 10 For, in that he died, he died unto sin once:

but in that he liveth, ^e he liveth unto God.

11 Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be ^b dead indeed unto sin, but ^c alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord.

12 ^d Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof.

what can be said more of the whole herd of transgressors and infidels? They cease to sin, when they cease to breathe. If the Christian religion bring no other privileges than this to its upright followers, well may we ask, wherein doth the wise man differ from the fool, for they have both one end? But the whole Gospel teaches a contrary doctrine.

Verse 8. Now if we be dead with Christ] According to what is stated in the preceding verses. See particularly on the fifth verse.

Verse 9. Christ being raised from the dead,
dieth no more] So we, believing in Christ Jesus, and having a death unto sin, and a life unto righteousness, should sin no more. If we be risen indeed with Christ, we should seek the things above; and set our affections on things above; and not on the earth. The man who walks in humble, loving obedience, to an indwelling Christ, sin has no more dominion over his soul, than death has over the immortal and glorified body of his Redeemer.

Verse 10. He died unto sin once] On this clause Rosenmüller speaks thus—"Τη ἀμαρτία ἀρῶσαν ἑαυτῆς: propter peccatum mortuus est semel, et quidem miserā morte. Τη ἀμαρτία, i. e. ὡπρὸς τὴν ἀμαρτίαν, ad expianda peccata; Res ipsa docet aliter homines, ἀποθνήσκον ἐν ἀμαρτίᾳ, aliter Christum: amat Paulus parallelismum, in quo interpretando multā cautione opus est."
"He died unto sin once: i. e. he died on account of sin, and truly a miserable death. Τη ἀμαρτία is the same as ὡπρὸς τὴν ἀμαρτίαν, for the expiation of sin. Common sense teaches us that men die to sin in one sense; Christ in another; St. Paul loves parallelisms, in the interpretation of which there is need of much caution." From the whole scope of the apostle's discourse, it is plain that he considers the death of Christ, as a death or sacrifice for sin; a sin-offering: in this sense no man has ever died for sin, or ever can die.

Verse 11. Reckon ye also yourselves to be dead] Die as truly unto sin, as he died for sin.
Live as truly unto God, as he lives with God.
This seems to be the spirit of the apostle's meaning.

Verse 12. Let not sin therefore reign] This is a prosopopœia, or personification. Sin is represented as a king, ruler, or tyrant, who has the desires of the mind, and the members of the body under his control; so that by influencing as ^a instruments of unrighteousness unto sin; but ^b yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead; and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God.

15 What then? shall we sin, ^d because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid.

16 Know ye not, that ^e to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey; whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?

the passions, he governs the body. Do not let sin reign; do not let him work; that is, let him have no place, no being, in your souls; because, wherever he is, he governs, less or more; and indeed sin is not sin without this. How is sin known? By evil influences in the mind, and evil acts in the life. But do not these influences and these acts prove his dominion? Certainly, the very existence of an evil thought to which passion or appetite attaches itself, is a proof that there sin has dominion; for without dominion such passions could not be excited. Wherever sin is felt, there sin has dominion; for sin is sin only as it works in action or passion against God. Sin cannot be a quiescent thing; if it do not work, it does not exist.

That ye should obey it in the lusts thereof.] Απειρὸν τὸ κατὰ τὴν ἀνάγκην ἄπειρῶν. This clause is wanting in the most ancient and reputable MSS. and in the principal Versions: Griesbach has left it out of his text; and professor White says, certissime delenda. "These words should certainly be expunged;" they are not necessary to the apostle's argument; it was enough to say, let not sin reign in your mortal bodies, that ye should obey it. If it be there, it will reign there; and its reign supposes, necessarily, the subjection of that in which it reigns. A king reigns when his laws are enforced; and the people obey them. When there is no executive government, there is no reign. There may be a royal shadow there, but there is no king.

Verse 13. Neither yield ye your members] Do not yield to temptation: It is no sin to be tempted; the sin lies in yielding. While the sin exists only in Satan's solicitation, it is the devil's sin, not ours: when we yield, we make the devil's sin our own; then we ENTER INTO temptation. Resist the devil, and he will flee from you. Satan himself cannot force you to sin: till he wins over your will, he cannot bring you into subjection. You may be tempted; but yield not to the temptation.

Yield yourselves unto God] Let God have your wills: keep them ever on his side; there, they are safe; and there, they will be active. Satan cannot force the will; and God will not. Indeed it would cease to be will, were it forced by either; it is essential to its being that it be free.

And your members as instruments, &c.] Let soul and body be employed in the service of your Maker: let him have your hearts; and with them, your heads, your hands, your feet. Think and devise what is pure: speak what is true, and to the use of edifying: work that which is just and good; and walk steadily in the way that leads to everlasting felicity. Be holy within, and holy without.

Verse 14. Sin shall not have dominion over you] God delivers you from it: and if you again become subject to it, it will be the effect of your own choice or negligence.

Ye are not under the law] That law which exacts obedience without giving power to obey; that condemns every transgression and every unholy thought, without providing for the extirpation of evil, or the pardon of sin.

But under grace.] Ye are under the merciful and beneficent dispensation of the Gospel: that, although it requires the strictest conformity to the will of God, affords sufficient power to be thus conformed, and in the death of Christ, has provided pardon for all that is past, and grace to help in every time of need.

Verse 15. Shall we sin, because we are not under the law] Shall we abuse our high and holy calling, because we are not under that law that makes no provision for pardon; but are under that Gospel which has opened the fountain to wash away all sin and defilement? Shall we sin because grace abounds? Shall we do evil that good may come of it? This, be far from us!

Verse 16. To whom ye yield yourselves] Can ye suppose that you should continue to be the servants of Christ, if ye give way to sin? Is he not the master who exacts the service, and to whom the service is performed? Sin, is the service of Satan; righteousness, the service of Christ. If ye sin, ye are the servants of Satan, and not the servants of God.

The word δουλος, which we translate servant, properly signifies slave: and a slave among the Greeks and Romans was considered as his master's property; and he might dispose of him as he pleased. Under a bad master, the lot of the slave was most oppressive and dreadful; his ease and comfort were never consulted; he was treated worse than a beast; and in many cases, his life hung on the mere caprice of the master. This state is the state of every poor miserable sinner; he is the slave of Satan, and his own evil lusts and appetites are his most cruel task-masters. The same word is applied to the servants of Christ, the more forcibly to show that they are their Master's property; and that, as he is infinitely good and benevolent, therefore his service must be perfect freedom. Indeed, he exacts no obedience

17 But God be thanked, that ye were the servants of sin, but ye have obeyed from the ^a heart that form of ^b doctrine which was delivered you.

18 Being then ^c made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness.

from them, which he does not turn to their eternal advantage, for this master has no self-interest to secure.—See on chap. i. 1.

Verse 17. But God be thanked, that ye were the servants of sin] This verse should be read thus: But thanks be to God, that, although ye were the servants of sin, nevertheless, ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine that was delivered unto you ; or, that mould of teaching into which ye were cast. The apostle does not thank God that they were sinners ; but that, although they were such, they had now received and obeyed the Gospel.

That form of doctrine] τοῦτο δόγμα ; here Christianity is represented under the notion of a mould, or die, into which they were cast ; and from which they took the impression of its excellence. The figure upon this die is the image of God, righteousness and true holiness, which was stamped on their souls, in believing the Gospel, and receiving the Holy Ghost. The words ὡς ἢ κηροτύπων τύπος, refer to the melting of metal : which, when it is liquified, is cast into the mould, that it may receive the impression that is sunk, or cut in the mould ; and therefore the words may be literally translated, into which mould of doctrine ye have been cast. They were melted down under the preaching of the word, and then were capable of being cast into its mould, and receiving the stamp of its purity.

Verse 18. Being then made free from sin] ἐκκαθαρισθέντες, is a term that refers to the manumission of a slave. They were redeemed from the slavery of sin, and became the servants of righteousness. Here is another προσποπαεῖα ; both sin and righteousness are personified : sin can enjoin no good and profitable work. Righteousness can require none that is unjust or injurious.

Verse 19. I speak after the manner of men] This phrase is often used by the Greek writers, to signify what was easy to be comprehended ; what was ad captum vulgi, level with common understandings ; delivered in a popular style ; what was different from the high flights of the poets, and the studied sublime obscurity of the philosophers.

20 For when ye were ^a the servants of sin ye were free ^b from righteousness.

21 ^c What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed ? for ^d the end of those things is death.

22 But now ^e being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life.

Because of the infirmity of your flesh] As if he had said, I make use of metaphors and figures connected with well known natural things ; with your trades and situation in life ; because of your inexperience in heavenly things, of which ye are only just beginning to know the names and the names.

Servants to uncleanness, &c.] These different expressions show how deeply immersed in, and enslaved by, sin, these Gentiles were, before their conversion to Christianity. Several of the particulars are given in the first chapter of this epistle.

Verse 20. Ye were free from righteousness] These two servitudes are incompatible : if we cannot serve God and mammon ; surely we cannot serve Christ and Satan. We must be either sinners or saints : God's servants or the devil's slaves. It cannot be, as a good mistaken man has endeavoured to sing :

I'm both a devil and a saint.”

I know not whether it be possible to paint the utter prevalence of sin in stronger colours than the apostle does here, by saying they were free from righteousness. It seems tantamount to that expression in Genesis, chap. vi. ver. 5. where speaking of the total degeneracy of the human race, the writer says, every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. They were all corrupt ; they were altogether abominable ; there was none that did good ; no, not one.

Verse 21. What fruit had ye then in those things] God designs that every man shall reap benefit by his service. What benefit have ye derived from the service of sin ?

Whereof ye are now ashamed] Ye blush to remember your former life. It was scandalous to yourselves, injurious to others, and highly provoking to God.

The end of those things is death] Whatever sin may promise of pleasure or advantage ; the end to which it necessarily tends, is the destruction of body and soul.

Verse 22. But now being made free from sin] As being free from righteousness is the finished character of a sinner; so being made free from sin, is the finished character of a genuine Christian.

And become servants to God] They were transferred from the service of one master to that of another: they were freed from the slavery of sin, and engaged in the service of God.

Fruit unto holiness] Holiness of heart was the principle; and righteousness of life the fruit.

Verse 23. For the wages of sin is death] The second death, everlasting perdition. Every sinner earns this, by long, sore, and painful service. Oh! what pains do men take to get to hell! Early and late they toil at sin; and would not divine justice be in their debt, if it did not pay them their due wages?

But the gift of God is eternal life] A man may MERIT hell, but he cannot MERIT heaven. The apostle does not say that the wages of righteousness is eternal life: no, but that this eternal life, even to the righteous, is το χάρισμα τοῦ Θεοῦ, THE GRACIOUS GIFT of God: and even this gracious gift comes through Jesus Christ our Lord. He alone has procured it; and it is given to all those who find redemption in his blood. A sinner goes to hell, because he deserves it; a righteous man goes to heaven, because Christ has died for him: and communicated that grace by which his sin is pardoned, and his soul made holy. The word χαρισμα, which we here render wages, signified the daily pay of a Roman soldier. So every sinner has a daily pay, and this pay is death: he has misery because he sins. Sin constitutes hell; the sinner has a hell in his own bosom; all is confusion and disorder where God does not reign; every indulgence of sinful passions increases the disorder, and consequently the misery of a sinner. If men were as much in earnest to get their souls saved, as they are to prepare them for perdition, heaven would be highly peopled; and devils would be their own companions. And will not the living lay this to heart?

1. In the preceding chapter we see the connexion that subsists between the doctrines of the Gospel, and the practice of Christianity. A doctrine, is a teaching, instruction, or information concerning some truth that is to be believed, as essential to our salvation. But all teaching that comes from God, necessarily leads to him. That Christ died for our sins, and rose again for our justification, is a glorious doctrine of the Gospel. But this is of no use to him who does not die to sin, rise in the likeness of Christ's resurrection, and walk in newness of life: this is the use that should be made of the doctrine. Every doctrine has its use; and the use of it consists in the practice founded on it. We hear there is a free pardon; we go to God and receive it: we hear that we may be made holy; we apply for the sanctifying Spirit: we hear there is a heaven of glory, in which the righteous alone shall enter; we watch and pray, believe, love, and obey, in order that, when he doth appear, we may be found of Him in peace, without spot, and blameless.—Those are the doctrines; these are the uses or practice founded on those doctrines.

2. It is strange that there should be found a person believing the whole Gospel system, and yet living in sin! SALVATION FROM SIN is the long continued sound, as it is the spirit and design of the Gospel. Our Christian name, our baptismal covenant, our profession of faith in Christ, and avowed belief in his word, all call us to this. Can it be said that we have any louder calls than these? Our self-interest, as it respects the happiness of a godly life and the glories of eternal blessedness; the pains and wretchedness of a life of sin, leading to the worm that never dies, and the fire that is not quenched, seconds most powerfully the above calls. Reader, lay these things to heart; and answer this question to God: How shall I escape, if I neglect so great salvation? And then, as thy conscience shall answer, let thy mind and thy hand begin to act.

CHAPTER VII.

The law has power over a man as long as he lives, 1. And a wife is bound to her husband only as long as he lives, 2, 3. Christian believers are delivered from the Mosaic law by Christ Jesus, and united to God, 5—7. By the law, is the knowledge of sin, 8. But it gives no power over it, 9—11. Yet it is holy, just, and good, 12. How it convinces of sin, and brings into bondage, 13—24. No deliverance from its curse but by Jesus Christ, 25.

NOTES ON CHAP. VII.

The apostle having, in the preceding chapter, shown the converted Gentiles the obligations they were under to live a holy life; addresses himself here to the Jews, who might hesitate to embrace the Gospel; lest, by this means, they should renounce the law, which might appear to them as a renunciation of their allegiance to God. As they rested in the law, as sufficient for justification and sanctification; it was necessary

3 So then ^a if, while her husband liveth, she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress: but if her husband be dead, she is free from that law; so, that she is no adulteress, though she be married to another man.

4 Wherefore, my brethren, ye also are become ^b dead to the law by the body of Christ; that ye should be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead, that we should ^c bring forth fruit unto God.

to convince them of their mistake. That the law was insufficient for their justification, the apostle had proved, in chapters iii. iv. and v.; that it is insufficient for their sanctification, he shows in this chapter; and introduces his discourse by showing that a believing Jew is discharged from his obligations to the law; and is at liberty to come under another, and much happier constitution; viz. that of the Gospel of Christ, 1—4. In the 5th verse he gives a general description of the state of a Jew, in servitude to sin, considered as under mere law. In the 6th verse he gives a summary account of the state of a Christian or believing Jew, and the advantages he enjoys under the Gospel. Upon the 5th verse he comments, from ver. 7. to the end of the chapter, and upon the 6th verse he comments, chap. viii. 1—11.

In explaining his position in the 5th verse, he shows—1. That the law reaches to all the branches and latent principles of sin, ver. 7. 2. That it subjected the sinner to death, ver. 8—12. without the expectation of pardon. 3. He shows the reason why the Jew was put under it, ver. 13. 4. He proves that the law, considered as a rule of action, though it was spiritual, just, holy, and good in itself, yet was insufficient for sanctification, or for freeing a man from the power of inbred sin. For, as the prevalence of sensual appetites cannot wholly extinguish the voice of reason and conscience; a man may acknowledge the law to be holy, just, and good, and yet his passions reign within him, keeping him in the most painful and degrading servitude, while the law supplied no power to deliver him from them, ver. 14—24. as that power can only be supplied by the grace of Jesus Christ, ver. 25. See Taylor.

Verse 1. For I speak to them that know the law] This is a proof that the apostle directs this part of his discourse to the Jews.

As long as he liveth] Or, As long as he liveth: law does not extend its influence to the dead; nor do abrogated laws bind. It is all the same whether we understand these words as speaking of a law abrogated, so that it cannot command; or of its objects, being dead, so that it has none to bind. In either case the law has no force.

Verse 2. For the woman which hath a husband] The apostle illustrates his meaning by a familiar instance. A married woman is bound to her husband while he lives; but when her husband is dead, she is discharged from the law, by which she was bound to him alone.

Verse 3. So then, if while her husband liveth] The object of the apostle's similitude is to show, that each party is equally bound to the other; but that the death of either dissolves the engagement.

So—she is no adulteress, though she be married to another] And do not imagine that this change would argue any disloyalty in you to your Maker; for, as he has determined that this law of ordinances shall cease, you are no more bound to it than a woman is to a deceased husband; and are as free to receive the Gospel of Christ, as a woman, in such circumstances, would be to re-marry.

Verse 4. Wherefore, my brethren] This is a parallel case. You were once under the law of Moses, and were bound by its injunctions; but now ye are become dead to that law; a modest inoffensive mode of speech, for the law, which was once your husband, is dead; God has determined that it shall be no longer in force; so that now, as a woman whose husband is dead, is freed from the law of that husband, or from her conjugal vow, and may legally be married to another: so God, who gave the law under which ye have hitherto lived, designed that it should be in force only till the advent of the Messiah. That advent has taken place, the law has, consequently, ceased, and now ye are called to take on you the yoke of the Gospel, and lay down the yoke of the law; and this is the design of God, that you should do so.

That ye should be married to another—who is raised from the dead] As Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth, the object of God in giving the law, was to unite you to Christ; and as he has died, he has not only abolished that law which condemns every transgressor to death, without any hope of a revival; but he has also made that atonement for sin by his own death, which is represented in the sacrifices prescribed by the law. And as Jesus Christ is risen again from the dead, he has thereby given the fullest proof, that by his death he has procured the resurrection of mankind; and made that atonement required by the law.

That we should bring forth fruit unto God] We, Jews, who believe in Christ, have, in consequence of our union with him, received the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit; so that we bring forth that fruit of holiness unto God, which, without this union, it would be impossible for us to produce. Here is a delicate allusion to the case of a promising and numerous progeny, from a legitimate and happy marriage.

Verse 5. For, when we were in the flesh] When we were without the Gospel, in our carnal unregenerated state, though believing the law of Moses, and performing the rites and offices of our religion.

The motions of sins, which were by the law] Τα παθήματα των αμαρτιών, the passions of sins, the evil propensities to sins;—to every particular sin, there is a propensity; one propensity does not excite to all kinds of sinful acts; hence the apostle uses the plural number, the PASSIONS or PROPENSITIES of sins; sins being not more various than their propensities in the unregenerate heart, which excite to them. These πάθηματα, propensities, constitute the fallen nature; they are the disease of the heart; the pollution and corruption of the soul.

Did work in our members] The evil propensity acts, ως τὸν μύσωνα, in the whole nervous and muscular system; applying that stimulus to every part, which is necessary to excite it to action.

To bring forth fruit unto death] To produce those acts of transgression which subject the sinner to death, temporal and eternal. When the apostle says, the motions of sin which were by the law; he points out a most striking and invariable characteristic of sin; viz. its rebellious nature; it ever acts against law, and the most powerfully against known law. Because the law requires obedience; therefore, it will transgress. The law is equally against evil passions and evil actions; and both these exert themselves against it. So, these motions which were by the law, became roused into the most powerful activity, by the prohibitions of the law. They were comparatively dormant till the law said, thou shalt not do this, thou shalt do that; then, the rebellious principle in the evil propensity became roused, and acts of transgression and omissions of duty were the immediate consequences.

Verse 6. But now we are delivered from the law] We, who have believed in Christ Jesus, are delivered from that yoke by which we were bound, which sentenced every transgressor to perdition, but provided no pardon even for the penitent; and no sanctification for those who are weary of their inbred corruptions.

That being dead wherein we were held] To us believers in Christ, this commandment is abrogated; we are transferred to another constitution; that law which kills, ceases to bind us: it is dead to us who have believed in Christ to that. ch. 6. 2. ver. 4.—^a ch. 2. 29. 2 Cor. 3. 6.

Jesus, who is the end of the law for justification and salvation to every one that believes.

That we should serve in newness of spirit] We are now brought under a more spiritual dispensation; now we know the spiritual import of all the Mosaic precepts. We see that the law refers to the Gospel, and can only be fulfilled by the Gospel.

The oldness of the letter.] The merely literal rites, ceremonies, and sacrifices, are now done away; and the newness of the Spirit, the true intent and meaning of all, are now fully disclosed; so that we are removed from an imperfect state into a state of perfection and excellence. We sought justification and sanctification, pardon and holiness, by the law; and have found that the law could not give them: we have sought these in the Gospel scheme, and we have found them. We serve God now, not according to the old literal sense, but in the true spiritual meaning.

Verse 7. Is the law sin?] The apostle had said, ver. 5. The motions of sin, which were by the law, did bring forth fruit unto death; and now he anticipates an objection, "is therefore the law sin?" to which he answers, as usual, μη γινώσκω, by no means. Law is only the means of disclosing this sinful propensity, not of producing it: as a bright beam of the sun introduced into a room, shows millions of moths which appear to be dancing in it in all directions; but these were not introduced by the light, they were there before; only there was not light enough to make them manifest; so the evil propensity was there before, but there was not light sufficient to discover it.

I had not known sin but by the law] Mr. Locke and Dr. Taylor have properly remarked the skill used by St. Paul in dexterously avoiding, as much as possible, the giving offence to the Jews: and this is particularly evident in his use of the word I in this place. In the beginning of the chapter, where he mentions their knowledge of the law, he says we. In the 4th verse he joins himself with them, and says we; but here, and so to the end of the chapter, where he represents the power of sin, and the inability of the law to subdue it, he appears to leave them out, and speaks altogether in the first person, though it is plain he means all those who were under the law. So chap. iii. 7, he uses the singular pronoun, why am I judged a sinner? when he evidently means the whole body of unbelieving Jews.

There is another circumstance in which his address is peculiarly evident; his demonstrating the insufficiency of the law, under colour of vindicating it. He knew that the Jew would take fire at the least reflection on the law, which he held in the highest veneration; and therefore he very naturally introduces him

A. M. cir. 4000. Nay, "I had not known catching at that expression, ver. 5. the motions of sin which were by the law; or, notwithstanding the law. "What!" says this Jew, "do you vilify the law, by charging it with favouring sin?" By no means, says the apostle, I am far from charging the law with favouring sin. The law is holy, and the commandment is holy, just, and good, ver. 12. Thus he writes in vindication of the law; and yet at the same time shows, 1. That the law requires the most extensive obedience, discovering and condemning sin in all its most secret and remote branches, verse 7. 2. That it gives sin a deadly force, subjecting every transgression to the penalty of death, verses 13—14. And yet, 3. Supplies neither help nor hope to the sinner, but leaves him under the power of sin, and the sentence of death, verse 14, &c. This, says Dr. Taylor, is the most ingenious turn of writing I ever met with. We have another instance of the same sort, chap. xiii. 1—7.

It is not likely that a dark, corrupt human heart, can discern the will of God. His law is his will: it recommends what is just, and right, and good; and forbids what is improper, unjust, and injurious. If God had not revealed himself by this law, we should have done precisely what many nations of the earth have done, who have not had this revelation; put darkness for light, and sin for acts of holiness. While the human heart is its own measure, it will rate its workings according to its own propensities; for, itself is its highest rule. But when God gives a true insight of his own perfections, to be applied as a rule, both of passion and practice, then sin is discovered; and discovered too, to be exceedingly sinful. So, strong propensities, because they appear to be inherent in our nature, would have passed for natural and necessary operations; and their sinfulness would not have been discovered, if the law had not said, Thou shalt not covet. And thus determined, that the propensity itself, as well as its outward operations, is sinful. The law is the straight edge which determines the quantum of obliquity in the crooked line to which it is applied.

It is natural for man to do what is unlawful, and to desire especially to do that which is forbidden. The heathens have remarked this propensity in man.

But it is needless to multiply examples; this most wicked principle of a sinful, fallen nature, has been felt and acknowledged by ALL mankind.

Verse 8. Sin, taking occasion by the commandment] I think the pointing, both in this and in the 11th verse, to be wrong; the comma should be after occasion, and not after commandment. But sin taking occasion, wrought in me, by this commandment, all manner of concupiscence. There are different opinions concerning the meaning of the word Occasus, which we here translate occasion. Dr. Waterland translates the clause, sin, taking advantage. Dr. Taylor contends that all commentators have mistaken the meaning of it, and that it should be rendered having received force. For this acceptance of the word, I can find no adequate authority, except in its etymology—ex, from, and opus, impetus. The word appears to signify, in general, whatsoever is necessary for the completion or accomplishment of any particular purpose. Xenophon uses oppasus; τοις σινοις, to signify whatever is necessary for the support of life. There is a personification in the text: sin is represented as a murderer watching for life, and snatching at every means, and embracing every opportunity, to carry his fell purpose into effect. The miserable sinner has a murderer, sin, within him; this murderer can only destroy life in certain circumstances: finding that the law condemns the object of his cruelty to death, he takes occasion from this, to work in the soul all manner of concupiscence, evil and irregular desires and appetites of every kind; and, by thus increasing the evil, exposes the soul to more condemnation, and thus it is represented as being slain, ver. 11. That is, the law, on the evidence of those sinful dispositions, and their corresponding practices, condemns the sinner to death: so that he is dead in law. Thus the very prohibition, as we have already seen in the preceding verse, becomes the instrument of exciting the evil propensity; for, although a sinner has the general propensity to do what is evil; yet he seems to feel most delight in transgressing known law: stat pro ratione voluntas; "I will do it, because I will."

For, without the law, sin was dead] Where there is no law, there is no transgression; for sin is the transgression of the law; and no fault can be imputed unto death, where there is no statute, by which such a fault is made a capital offence.

Dr. Taylor thinks that χρονος νωστος, without the law, means the time before the giving the law from Mount Sinai, which took in the space of 430 years, during which time the people were under the Abrahamic covenant of grace: and without the law that was given on Mount Sinai, the sting of death, which is sin, had not power to slay the sinner: for, from the time that Adam sinned, the law was not re-enacted till it was given by Moses, chap. v. 13. The Jew was then alive, because he was not under the law subjecting him to death for his transgressions: but when the commandment came, with the penalty of death annexed, sin revived, and the Jew died. Then the sting of death acquired life: and the Jew, upon the first transgression, was dead in law. Thus, sin, the sting of death, received force or advantage, to destroy by the commandment, ver. 8, 11.

All manner of concupiscence] It showed what was evil, and forbid it; and then the principle of rebellion, which seems essential to the very nature of sin, rose up against the prohibition: and he was the more strongly incited to disobey, in proportion as obedience was enjoined. Thus the apostle shows that the law had authority to prohibit, condemn, and destroy; but no power to pardon sin, root out enmity, nor save the soul.

The word αρεσνυια, which we render concupiscence, signifies simply strong desire of any kind: but in the New Testament, it is generally taken to signify irregular and unwholy desires. Sin, in the mind, is the desire to do, or to be, what is contrary to the holiness and authority of GOD.

For, without the law, sin was dead—This means, according to Dr. Taylor's hypothesis, the time previous to the giving of the law.—See before. But it seems also consistent with the apostle's meaning, to interpret the place as implying the time in which Paul, in his unconverted Jewish state, had not the proper knowledge of the law; while he was unacquainted with its spirituality. He felt evil desire, but he did not know the evil of it; he did not consider that the law tried the heart and its workings: as well as outward actions. This is further explained in the next verse.

Verse 9. I was alive without the law once] Dr. Whitby paraphrases the text thus: "For the seed of Abraham was alive without the law once, before the law was given, I being not obnoxious to death for that to which the law had not threatened death: but when the commandment came, forbidding it under that penalty, sin revived, and I died; i. e. it got strength to draw me to sin, and to condemn me to death. Sin is, in Scripture, represented as an enemy that seeks our ruin and destruction; and takes all occasions to effect it. It is here said to war against the mind, ver. 23. elsewhere to war against the soul, 1 Pet. ii. 11. to surround and beset us, Hebr. xii. 1. to bring us into bondage and subjection, and get the dominion over us, Rom. vi. 12. to entice us, and so to work our death, James i. 15, 16. and to do all that Satan, the grand enemy of mankind, doth, by tempting us to the commission of it. Whence Chrysostom, upon those words, Heb. xii. 4, Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, against sin: represents sin as an armed and flagrant adversary. When, therefore, it finds a law which threatens death to the violator of it; it takes occasion thence, more earnestly, to tempt and allure to the violation of it: that so it may more effectually subject us to death and condemnation on that account; for the sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law, condemning us to death for transgressing it. Thus, when God had forbidden, on pain of death, the eating the fruit of the tree of knowledge; Satan thence took occasion to tempt our first parents to transgress, and so slew them; or made them subject to death: απατασεν, he deceived them, Gen. iii. 13. 1 Tim ii. 14. which is the word used, ver. 11. The phrase, without the law, sin was dead, means that sin was then, (before the law was given,) comparatively dead, as to its power of condemning to death; and this sense the antithesis requires, without the law; αμαρτια νεκρη ην εως του νομου, sin was dead, but I was living; but when the commandment came, (i. e. the law,) sin revived, and I died. How were men living before the law, but because then, no law condemned them? Sin, therefore, must be then dead, as to its condemning power. How did they die when the law came, but by the law condemning them to death? Sin, therefore, revived then, as to its power of condemning, which it received first from the sin of Adam, which brought death into the world; and next, from the law of Moses, which entered that the offence might abound, and reign more unto death, chap. v. 20, 21. For though sin was in the world from Adam to Moses; or, until the law was given; yet it was not imputed unto death, when there was no law that did threaten death; so that death reigned from that interval, by virtue of Adam's sin alone; even over them who had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression; i. e. against a positive law, forbidding it under the penalty of death; which law being delivered by Moses, sin revised; i. e. it had again its force to condemn men as before, to death, by virtue of a law which threatened death. And in this sense the apostle seems to say, Gal. iii. 19. the law was added because of transgressions, to convince us of the wrath and punishment due to them; and that the law, therefore, worketh wrath, because where no law is, there is no transgression, Rom. iv. 15. subjecting us to wrath; or, no such sense of the Divine wrath, as where a plain Divine law, threatening death and condemnation, is violated." See Whitby, in loco.

Verse 10. And the commandment] Meaning the law in general; which was ordained to life; the rule of righteousness teaching those statutes which, if a man do, he shall live in them, Lev. xviii. 5. I found, by transgressing it, to be unto death; for it only presented the duty, and laid down the penalty, without affording any strength to resist sin, or subdue evil propensities.

Verse 11. Sin, taking occasion] Sin deriving strength from the law, threatening death to the transgressor, (see the note on ver. 8.) deceived me, drew me aside to disobedience, promising me gratification, honour, independence, &c. as it promised to Eve; for to her history the apostle evidently alludes, and uses the very same expression, deceived me, ἐπαταράσασθε με. See the preceding note; and see the Septuagint, Gen. iii. 13.

And by it slew me.] Subjected me to that death which the law denounced against transgressors; and rendered me miserable during the course of life itself. It is well known to scholars, that the verb ἀπαρτύνω, signifies not only to slay or kill, but also to make wretched. Every sinner is not only exposed to death, because he has sinned, and must, sooner or later, die; but he is miserable in both body and mind, by the influence and the effects of sin. He lives a dying life, or a living death.

Verse 12. Wherefore the law is holy] As if he had said, to sooth his countrymen, to whom he had been showing the absolute insufficiency of the law, either to justify or save from sin: I do not intimate that there is any thing improper or imperfect in the law as a rule of life: it prescribes what is holy, just, and good; for it comes from a holy, just, and good God. The LAW which is to regulate the whole of the outward conduct is holy; and the COMMANDMENT, Thou shalt not covet which is to regulate the heart, made death unto me? God forbid. But ^d sin, that it might appear sin, working death in me by that which is good; that sin by the commandment might become exceeding sinful.

14 For, we know that the law

c Ch. 1. 20. & 5. 20. — d Ch. 3. 20. 2 Cor. 13. 7. Gal. 1. 13.

is not less so. All is excellent and pure; but it neither pardons sin, nor purifies the heart; and it is because it is holy, just, and good, that it condemns transgressors to death.

Verse 13. Was then that which is good made death unto me?] This is the question of the Jew, with whom the apostle appears to be disputing. "Do you allow the law to be good, and yet say, it is the cause of our death?" The apostle answers, God forbid! μὴ γάρ, by no means: it is not the law that is the cause of your death, but sin; it was sin which subjected us to death by the law, justly threatening sin with death. Which law was given, that sin might appear, might be set forth in its own colours; when we saw it subjected us to death by a law perfectly holy, just, and good; that sin, by the law, might be represented what it really is: καὶ ὑπερέλαβεν ἀμαρτανός, AN EXCEEDING GREAT and deadly evil.

Thus it appears that man cannot have a true notion of sin, but by means of the law of God. For this I have already given sufficient reasons in the preceding notes. And it was one design of the law to show the abominable and destructive nature of sin; as well as to be a rule of life. It would be almost impossible for a man to have that just notion of the demerit of sin, so as to produce repentance, or to see the nature and necessity of the death of Christ, if the law were not applied to his conscience by the light of the Holy Spirit; it is then alone, that he sees himself to be carnal, and sold under sin; and that the law and the commandment are holy, just, and good. And let it be observed, that the law did not answer this end merely among the Jews, in the days of the apostle; it is just as necessary to the Gentiles, to the present hour. Nor do we find that true repentance takes place where the moral law is not preached and enforced. Those who preach only the Gospel to sinners, at best, only heat the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly. The law, therefore, is the grand instrument in the hands of a faithful minister, to alarm and awaken sinners: and he may safely show, that every sinner is under the law, and consequently under the curse, who has not fled for refuge to the hope held out by the Gospel: for, in this sense also Jesus Christ is the END of the LAW for justification to them that believe.

Verse 14. For, we know that the law is spiritual] This is a general proposition, and probably, in the apostle's autograph, concluded the above sentence. The law is not to be considered as a system of external rites and ceremonies; nor even as a rule of moral action; it is a spiritual system; it reaches to the most hidden purposes, thoughts, dispositions, and desires of the heart and soul; and reproveth and condemns every thing, without hope of reprove or pardon, that is contrary to eternal truth and rectitude.

A. M. cir. 4002. is spiritual: but I

But I am carnal, sold under sin] This was probably, in the apostle's letter, the beginning of a new paragraph. I believe it is agreed, on all hands, that the apostle is here demonstrating the insufficiency of the law, in opposition to the Gospel. That by the former, is the knowledge; by the latter, the cure of sin. Therefore, by I here he cannot mean himself, nor any Christian believer; if the contrary could be proved, the argument of the apostle would go to demonstrate the insufficiency of the Gospel, as well as the law.

It is difficult to conceive how the opinion could have crept into the church, or prevailed there; that "the apostle speaks here of his regenerate state; and that what was, in such a state, true of himself, must be true of all others in the same state." This opinion has, most pitifully and most shamefully, not only lowered the standard of Christianity, but destroyed its influence, and disgraced its character. It requires but little knowledge of the spirit of the Gospel, and of the scope of this epistle, to see that the apostle is here either personating a Jew, under the law and without the Gospel, or showing what his own state was, when he was deeply convinced that by the deeds of the law no man could be justified; and had not as yet heard those blessed words, Brother Saul, the Lord Jesus that appeared unto thee in the way, hath sent me that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost, Acts ix. 17.

In this, and the following verses, he states the contrariety between himself or any Jew, while without Christ; and the law of God. Of the latter he says, it is spiritual; of the former, I am carnal, sold under sin. Of the carnal man, in opposition to the spiritual, never was a more complete or accurate description given. The expressions in the flesh, and after the flesh, in ver. 5. and in chap. viii. 5, 8, 9, &c. are of the same import with the word carnal, in this verse. To be in the flesh, or to be carnally minded, solely respects the unregenerate. While unregenerate, a man is in a state of death and enmity against God, chap. viii. 6—9. This is St. Paul's own account of a carnal man. The soul of such a man has no authority over the appetites of the body, and the lusts of the flesh: reason has not the government of passion. The work of such a person, is to make provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof, chap. xiii. 14. He minds the things of the flesh, chap. viii. 5. He is at enmity with God. In all these things the spiritual man is the reverse; he lives in a state of friendship with God in Christ, and the Spirit of God dwells in him; his soul has dominion over the appetites of the body and the lusts of the flesh; his passions submit to the government of reason; and he, by the Spirit, mortifies the deeds of the flesh; he mindeth the things of the Spirit, chap. viii. 5. The Scriptures, therefore, place these two characters in direct opposition to each other. Now, the apostle begins this passage by informing us that it is his carnal state that he is about to describe, in opposition to the spirituality of God's holy law, saying, But I am carnal.

Those who are of another opinion, maintain that by the word carnal here, the apostle meant that corruption, which dwelt in him after his conversion: but this opinion is founded on a very great mistake; for, although there may be, after justification, the remains of the carnal mind, which will be less or more felt, till the soul is completely sanctified; yet the man is never denominated from the inferior principle, which is under control, but from the superior principle, which habitually prevails. Whatever epithets are given to corruption or sin in Scripture, opposite epithets are given to grace or holiness. By these different epithets, are the unregenerate and regenerate denominated. From all this it follows, that the epithet carnal, which is the characteristic designation of an unregenerate man, cannot be applied to St. Paul, after his conversion; nor indeed, to any Christian in that state.

But the word carnal, though used by the apostle to signify a state of death and enmity against God, is not sufficient to denote all the evil of the state which he is describing; hence, he adds, sold under sin. This is one of the strongest expressions which the Spirit of God uses in Scripture, to describe the full depravity of fallen man. It implies a willing slavery: Ahab had sold himself to work evil, 1 Kings xxi. 20. And of the Jews it is said, in their utmost depravity, Behold, for your iniquities, ye have sold yourselves, Isa. l. 1. They forsook the holy covenant, and joined themselves to the heathen, and were sold to do mischief, 1 Maccab. i. 15. Now, if the word carnal, in its strongest sense, had been sufficiently significant of all he meant, why add to this charge another expression still stronger? We must therefore understand the phrase, sold under sin, as implying, that the soul was employed in the drudgery of sin; that it was sold over to this service, and had no power to disobey this tyrant, until it was redeemed by another. And if a man be actually sold to another, and he acquiesce in the deed; then he becomes the legal property of that other person. This state of bondage was well known to the Romans. The sale of slaves they saw daily, and could not misunderstand the emphatical sense of this expression. Sin is here represented as a person; and the apostle compares the dominion which sin has over the man in question, to that of a master over his legal slave. Universally through the Scriptures, man is said to be in a state of bondage to sin, until the Son of God make him free: but in no part of the Sacred Writings is it ever said that the children of God are sold under sin.—Christ came to deliver the lawful captive, and take away the prey from the mighty. Whom the Son maketh free, they are free indeed. Then, they yield not up their members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: for sin shall not have the dominion over them; because the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, has made them free from the law of sin and death, chap. vi. 13, 14. and viii. 2. Anciently, when regular cartels were not known, the captives became the slaves of their victors, and by them were sold to any purchaser; their slavery was as complete and perpetual, as if the slave had resigned his own liberty, and sold himself: the laws of the land secured him to his master; he could not redeem himself, because he had nothing that was his own, and nothing could rescue him from that state, but a stipulated redemption. The apostle speaks here, not of the manner in which the person in question became a slave; he only asserts the fact, that sin had a full and permanent dominion over him. See Smith, on the carnal man's character.

I am carnal, sold under sin—I have been the more particular in ascertaining the genuine sense of this verse, because it determines the general scope of the whole passage.

Verse 15. For, that which I do, I allow not, &c.] The first clause of this verse is a general assertion concerning the employment of the person in question, in the state which the apostle calls carnal, and sold under sin. The Greek word καρναλίζουαι, which is here translated, I do, means a work which the agent continues to perform, till it is finished, and is used by the apostle, Phil. ii. 12. to denote the continued employment of God's saints in his service to the end of their lives. Work out your own salvation; the word here denotes an employment of a different kind; and therefore the man who now feels the galling dominion of sin, says, What I am continually labouring at, I allow not: ου γινώσκω, I do not acknowledge to be right, just, holy, or profitable.

But what I hate, that do I.] I am a slave, and under the absolute control of my tyrannical master; I hate his service, but am obliged to work his will. Who, without blasphemy, can assert that the apostle is speaking this of a man in whom the Spirit of the Lord dwells? From ver. 7. to this one, the apostle, says Dr. Taylor, denotes the Jew in the flesh, by a single I; here he divides that I into two I's, or figurative persons; representing two different and opposite principles which were in him. The one I, or principle, assents to the law that it is good: and wills and chooses what the other does not practise, ver. 16. This principle he expressly tells us, ver. 22. is the inward man, the law of the mind, ver. 23. the mind, or rational faculty, ver. 25. for he could find no other inward man, or law of the mind, but the rational faculty, in a person who was carnal, and sold under sin. The other I, or principle, transgresses the law, ver. 23. and does those things which the former principle allows not. This principle he expressly tells us, ver. 18. is the flesh, the law in the members, or sensual appetite, ver. 23. and he concludes in the last verse that these two principles were opposite to each other; therefore it is evident, that those two principles, residing and counteracting each other in the same person, are reason and lust; or sin that dwells in us. And it is very easy to distinguish these two I's, or principles, in every part of this elegant description of iniquity, domineering over the light and remonstrances of reason. For instance, ver. 17. Now then, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. The I, he speaks of here, is opposed to indwelling or governing sin; and therefore plainly denotes the principle of reason, the inward man, or law of the mind: to which, I add, a measure of the light of the Spirit of God shines, in order to show the sinfulness of sin. These two different principles he calls, one flesh, and the other spirit; Gal. v. 17. where he speaks of their contrariety in the same manner that he does here.

And we may give a probable reason why the apostle dwells so long upon the struggle and opposition between these two principles; it appears intended to answer a tacit but very obvious objection. The Jew might allege, "But the law is holy and spiritual; and I assent to it as good, as a right rule of action which ought to be observed; yea, I esteem it highly; I glory and rest in it, convinced of its truth and excellency. And, is not this enough to constitute the law a sufficient principle of sanctification?" The apostle answers, "No; wickedness is consistent with a sense of truth. A man may assent to the best rule of action, and yet still be under the dominion of lust and sin; from which nothing can deliver him but a principle and power proceeding from the Fountain of life."

The sentiment in this verse may be illustrated by quotations from the ancient heathens; many of whom felt themselves in precisely the same state, (and expressed it in nearly the same language,) which some most monstrously tell us, was the state of this heavenly apostle, when vindicating the claims of the Gospel against those of the Jewish ritual! Thus OVID describes the conduct of a depraved man:—

Mens aliud suadet. Video meliora, proboque; Deteriora sequor.*

EURIP. Med. v. 1077.

—But I am overcome by sin, And I well understand the evil which I presume to commit.

Passion, however, is more powerful than my reason; Which is the cause of the greatest evils to mortal men.

Thus we find that enlightened heathens, both among the Greeks and Romans, had that same kind of religious experience; which some suppose to be, not only the experience of St. Paul in his best state; but to be even the standard of Christian attainments! See more examples in Wetstein.

The whole spirit of the sentiment is well summed up and expressed by St. Chrysostom: οἷα τινοὶ ἐπιθυμοῦμεν, οἷα κολυμβοῦμεν, αἰστανται μάλιστα τῆς ἐπιθυμίας ἢ φιλίας. If we lust after any thing, which is afterwards prohibited, the flame of this desire burns the more fiercely.

Verse 16. [If then I do that which I would not, &c.] Knowing that the law condemns it, and that, therefore, it must be evil. I consent unto the law; I show by this circumstance, that I acknowledge the law to be good.

Verse 17. Now then, it is no more [I] It is not that I, which constitutes reason and conscience; but sin, corrupt and sensual inclinations, that dwelleth in me: that have the entire domination over my reason, darkening my understanding, and perverting my judgment; for which there is condemnation in the law, but no cure. So we find here that there is a principle, in the unregenerate man, stronger than reason itself: a principle which is, properly speaking, not of the essence of the soul, but acts in it, as its lord; or as a tyrant. This is inbred, and indwelling sin, the seed of the serpent; by which the whole soul is darkened, confused, perverted, and excited to rebellion against God.

Verse 18. For I know that in me, &c.] I have learned, by experience, that in an unregenerate man, there is no good. There is no principle by which the soul can be brought into the light; no principle by which it can be restored to purity: fleshly appetites alone prevail; and the brute runs away with the man.

For to will is present with me] Though the whole soul has suffered indescribably by the fall, yet there are some faculties that appear to have suffered less than others; or rather have received larger measures of the supernatural light, because their concurrence with the Divine principle is so necessary to the salvation of the soul. Even the most unconcerned about spiritual things, have understanding, judgment, reason, and will. And by means of these, we have seen even scoffers at Divine revelation, become very eminent in arts and sciences: some of our best metaphysicians, physicians, mathematicians, astronomers, chymists, &c. have been known, to their reproach be it spoken and published, to be without religion; nay, some of them have blasphemed it, by leaving God out of his own work, and ascribing to an idol of their own, whom they call nature, the operations of the wisdom, power, and goodness, of the Most High. It is true that many of the most eminent in all the above branches of knowledge, have been conscientious believers in Divine revelation: but the case of the others proves, that fallen as man is, he yet possesses extraordinary powers; which are capable of very high cultivation and improvement. In short, the soul seems capable of any thing, but knowing, fearing, loving, and serving God. And it is not only incapable of itself, for any truly religious acts; but what shows its fall in the most indisputable manner, is, its enmity to sacred things. Let an unregenerate man pretend what he pleases, his conscience knows that he hates religion; his soul revolts against it; his carnal mind is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can it be. There is no reducing this fell principle to subjection: it is sin, and sin is rebellion against God: therefore sin must be destroyed, not subjected; if subjected, it would cease to be sin;

because sin is in opposition to God; hence the apostle says, most conclusively, it cannot be subjected; i. e. it must be destroyed, or it will destroy the soul for ever.

When the apostle says, to will is present with me, he shows that the will is on the side of God and truth; so far, that it consents to the propriety and necessity of obedience. There has been a strange clamour raised up against this faculty of the soul, as if the very essence of evil dwelt in it; whereas the apostle shows, throughout this chapter, that the will was regularly on God's side, while every other faculty appears to have been in hostility to him. The truth is, men have confounded the will with the passions; and laid to the charge of the former what properly belongs to the latter. The will is right, but the passions are wrong. It discerns and approves, but is without ability to perform: it has no power over sensual appetites; in these the principle of rebellion dwells: it wills evil, it wills good, but can only command through the power of Divine grace: but this, the person in question, the unregenerate man, has not received.

Verse 19. For the good that I would I do not] Here again is the most decisive proof that the will is on the side of God and truth.

But the evil which I would not] And here is equally decisive proof that the will is against, or opposed to evil. There is not a man in ten millions who will carefully watch the operations of this faculty, that will find it opposed to good and obstinately attached to evil, as is generally supposed. Nay, it is found almost uniformly on God's side, while the whole sensual system is against him. It is not the WILL that leads men astray; but the corrupt PASSIONS which oppose and oppress the will. It is truly astonishing into what endless mistakes men have fallen on this point, and what systems of divinity have been builded on these mistakes. The will, this almost only friend to God in the human soul, has been slandered as God's worst enemy: and even by those who had the seventh chapter to the Romans before their eyes! Nay, it has been considered so fell a foe to God and goodness, that it is bound in the adamant chains of a dire necessity, to do evil only; and the doctrine of will, (absurdly called free will, as if will did not essentially imply what is free;) has been considered one of the most destructive heresies. Let such persons put themselves to school to their Bibles, and to common sense.

The plain state of the case is this: the soul is so completely fallen, that it has no power to do good, till it receive that power from on high. But it has power to see good, to distinguish between that and evil; to acknowledge the excellence of this good, and to will it, from a conviction of that excellence; but further it cannot go. Yet, in various cases, it is solicited, and consents to sin; and because it is will, that is, because it is a free principle, it must necessarily possess this power; and although it can do no good, unless it receive grace from God; yet it is impossible to force it to sin. Even Satan himself cannot do this; and before he can get it to sin, he must gain its consent. Thus God, in his endless mercy, has endued this faculty with a power in which, humanly speaking, resides the salvability of the soul; and without this, the soul must have eternally continued under the power of sin, or been saved as an inert, absolutely passive machine; which supposition would go as nearly to prove that it was as incapable of vice, as it were of virtue.

“But does not this arguing destroy the doctrine of free grace? No! it establishes that doctrine. 1. It is through the grace, the unmerited kindness of God, that the soul has such a faculty, and that it has not been extinguished by sin. 2. This will, though a free principle, as it respects its willing of evil, and choosing good; yet, properly speaking, has no power by which it can subjugate the evil, or perform the good. We know that the eye has a power to discern objects: but without light, this power is perfectly useless; and no object can be discerned by it. So, of the person represented here by the apostle, it is said, to will is present with me, το γαρ θελον παρασκευται μεν. To will is ever in readiness, it is ever at hand, it lies constantly before me: but how to perform that which is good, I find not: that is, the man is unregenerate, and he is seeking justification and holiness from the law. The law was never designed to give these; it gives the knowledge, not the cure of sin: therefore, though he kills evil, and wills good: yet he can neither conquer the one, nor perform the other, till he receives the grace of Christ; till he seeks and finds redemption in his blood. Here then, the free agency of man is preserved, without which he could not be in a salvable state: and the honour of the grace of Christ is maintained, without which, there can be no actual salvation. There is a good sentiment on this subject in the following words of an eminent poet:

Thou great first CAUSE, least understood;
Who all my sense confined To know but this, that thou art good
And that myself am blind.

Yet gave me in this dark estate
To see the good from ill;
And binding nature fast in state,

which has possessed itself of all my carnal appetites and passions, and thus subjects my reason, and domineers over my soul. Thus, I am in perpetual contradiction to myself. Two principles are continually contending in me for the mastery; my reason, on which the light of God shines, to show what is evil; and my passions, in which the principle of sin works, to bring forth fruit unto death.

This strange self-contradictory propensity led some of the ancient philosophers to imagine, that man has two souls, a good and a bad one; and it is on this principle that Xenophon, in his life of Cyrus, causes Araspes, a Persian nobleman, to account for some misconduct of his, relative to Panthea, a beautiful female captive, whom Cyrus had entrusted to his care. "O Cyrus, I am convinced that I have two souls: if I had but one soul, it could not, at the same time, pant after vice and virtue: wish and abhor the same thing. It is certain, therefore, that we have two souls: when the good soul rules, I undertake noble and virtuous actions: but when the bad soul predominates, I am constrained to do evil. All I can say at present, is, that I find my good soul, encouraged by thy presence, has got the better of my bad soul." See Spectator, Vol. VIII. No. 564. Thus, not only the ancients, but also many moderns have trifled, and all will continue to do so, who do not acknowledge the scriptural account of the fall of man, and the lively comment upon that doctrine, contained in the seventh chapter of the Epistle to the Romans.

Verse 21. I find then a law] I am in such a condition and state of soul; under the power of such habits and sinful propensities, that when I would do good: when my will and reason are strongly bent on obedience to the law of God, and opposition to the principles of sin: evil is present with me, κακὸν παρασῆται, evil is at hand, it lies constantly before me. That, as the will to do good is constantly at hand, ver. 18. so the principle of rebellion exciting me to sin, is equally present: but as the one is only will, wish, and desire, without power to do what is willed, and to obtain what is wished, or to perform what is desired, sin continually prevails.

The word ἰσχυρὸς, law, in this verse, must be taken as implying any strong or confirmed habit, ἐπιθυμία, as Hesychius renders it, under the influence of which the man generally acts; and in this sense, the apostle most evidently uses it in ver. 23.

Verse 22. I delight in the law of God after the inward man] Every Jew, and every unregenerate man, who receives the Old Testament as a revelation from God, must acknowledge the great purity, excellence, and utility of its maxims, &c. though he will ever find, that without the grace of our Lord Jesus, he can never act according to those heavenly maxims; and without the mercy of God, can never be redeemed from the curse entailed upon him for his past transgressions. To say that the inward man means the regenerate part of the soul, is supportable by no argument. Ὁ ἴσως ἀρσένος, and ὁ ἴσως ἀρσένος, especially the latter, are expressions frequently in use among the purest Greek ethic writers, to signify the soul or rational part of man in opposition to the body of flesh; see the quotations in Wetstein from Plato and Plotinus. The Jews have the same form of expression; so in Yalcut Rubeni, fol. 10. 3. it is said, The flesh is the inward garment of the man; but the spirit is the inward man, the garment of which is the body: and St. Paul uses the phrase in precisely the same sense, in 2 Cor. iv. 16. and in Eph. iii. 16. If it be said, that it is impossible for an unregenerate man to delight in the law of God, the experience of millions contradicts the assertion. Every true penitent admires the moral law: longs most earnestly for a conformity to it: and feels that he can never be satisfied till he awakes up after this divine likeness; and he hates himself, because he feels that he has broken it, and that his evil passions are still in a state of hostility to it.

The following observations of a pious and sensible writer on this subject cannot be unacceptable. "The inward man always signifies the mind; which either may, or may not, be the subject of grace. That which is asserted of either the inward or outward man, is often performed by one member or power, and not with the whole. If any member of the body perform an action, we are said to do it with the body, although the other members be not employed. In like manner if any power or faculty of the mind be employed about any action, the soul is said to act. This expression, therefore, I delight in the law of God after the inward man, can mean no more than this, that there are some inward faculties in the soul, which delight in the law of God. This expression is particularly adapted to the principles of the Pharisees, of whom St. Paul was one before his conversion. They received the law as the oracles of God, and confessed that it deserved the most serious regard. Their veneration was inspired by a sense of its original, and a full conviction that it was true. To some parts of it they paid the most superstitious regard. They had it written upon their phylacteries, which they carried about with them at all times. It was often read and expounded in their synagogues: and they took delight in studying its precepts. On that account, both the prophets and our Lord agree in saying, that they delighted in the law of God, though they regarded not its chief and most essential precepts." See further observations on this point at the end of the chapter.

So far, then, is it from being true, that none but a REGENERATE man can delight in the law of God, we find that even a proud, unhumiliated

PHARISEE can do it, and much more a poor sinner, who is humbled under a sense of his sin, and sees, in the light of God, not only the spirituality, but the excellence of the divine law.

Verse 23. But I see another law in my members] Though the person in question is less or more under the continual influence of reason and conscience, which offer constant testimony against sin; yet, as long as help is sought only from the law, and the grace of Christ in the Gospel is not received, the remonstrances of reason and conscience are rendered of no effect by the prevalence of sinful passions; which, from repeated gratifications, have acquired all the force of habit; and now give law to the whole carnal man.

Warring against the law of my mind] There is an allusion here to the case of a city besieged, at last taken by storm, and the inhabitants carried away into captivity; αριστριωμοισι, carrying on a system of warfare, laying continual siege to the soul; repeating incessantly its attacks; harassing, battering, and storming the spirit; and, by all these assaults, reducing the man to extreme misery. Never was a picture more impressively drawn, and more effectually finished; for the next sentence shows, that this spiritual city was at last taken by storm, and the inhabitants who survived the sackage, led into the most shameful, painful, and oppressive captivity.

Bringing me into captivity to the law of sin] He does here speak of an occasional advantage gained by sin; it was a complete and final victory gained by corruption; which, having stormed and reduced the city, carried away the inhabitants, with irresistible force, into captivity. This is the consequence of being overcome; he was now in the hands of the foe, as the victor's lawful captive; and this is the import of the original word, αχμαλωτισθησα; and is the very term used by our Lord, when speaking of the final ruin, dispersion, and captivity of the Jews. he says, αχμαλωτισθησονται, they shall be led away captives, into all the nations. Luke xxi. 24. When all this is considered, who in his right mind can apply it to the holy soul of the apostle of the Gentiles? Is there any thing in it that can belong to his gracious state? Surely, nothing. The basest slave of sin, who has any remaining checks of conscience, cannot be brought into a worse state than that described here by the apostle. Sin and corruption have a final triumph; and conscience and reason are taken prisoners, laid in fetters, and sold for slaves. Can this ever be said of a man in whom the Spirit of God dwells; and whom the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, has made free from the law of sin and death? See chap. viii. 2.

Verse 24. O wretched man that I am, &c.] This affecting account is finished more impressively by the groans of the wounded captive. Having long maintained a useless conflict against innumerable hosts and irresistible might, he is at last wounded and taken prisoner; and, to render his state more miserable, is not only encompassed by the slaughterer, but chained to a dead body; for there seems to be here an allusion to an ancient custom of certain tyrants, who bound a dead body to a living man, and obliged him to carry it about, till the contagion from the putrid mass took away his life! Virgil paints this in all its horrors, in the account he gives of the tyrant Mezentius. Æneid. lib. viiii. ver. 485.

Quid memorem infandas cædes, quid facta tyranni—

MORTUA quin etiam jungebat corpora vivis, Componens manibusque manus, atque oribus ora; Tormenti genus! et sanie taboque fluentis Complexu in misero, longâ, sic morte necabat.

What tongue can such barbarities record,
Or count the slaughters of his ruthless sword?
'Twas not enough the good, the guiltless bled,
Still worse, he bound the living to the dead:
These, limb to limb, and face to face he joined,
Oh! monstrous crime, of unexampled kind!
Till chok'd with stench, the lingering wretches lay,

And, in the loath'd embraces, died away!

PITT.

Servius remarks, in his comment on this passage, that Sanies, mortui est; tabo viventis scilicet sanguis: "the sanies, or putrid ichor, from the dead body, produced the tabes in the blood of the living." Roasting, burning, racking, crucifying, &c. were nothing, when compared to this diabolically invented punishment.

We may naturally suppose that the cry of such a person would be, Wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from this dead body? And how well does this apply to the case of the person to whom the apostle refers? A body, a whole mass of sin and corruption was bound to his soul, with chains which he could not break; and the mortal contagion transfused through his whole nature, was pressing him down to the bitter pains of an eternal death. He now finds that the law can afford him no deliverance; and he despairs of help from any human being: but while he is emitting his last, or almost expiring groan, the redemption by Christ Jesus is proclaimed to him; and, if the apostle refers to his own case, Ananias unexpectedly accosts him with, Brother Saul! the Lord Jesus, who hath appeared unto thee in the way, hath sent me unto thee, that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost. He sees then an open door of hope; and he immediately, though but in the prospect of this deliverance, returns God thanks for the well grounded hope which he has of salvation through Jesus Christ our Lord.

me from ^athe body of this death? 25 ^bI thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord.

^a Or, this body of death.

Verse 25. I thank God through Jesus Christ Instead of εὐχαριστῶ τῷ Θεῷ, I thank God; several excellent MSS. with the Vulgate, some copies of the Itala, and several of the Fathers, read χαρις τοῦ Θεοῦ, or τῶν Κυρίων, the grace of God, or the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ; this is an answer to the almost despairing question in the preceding verse. The whole, therefore, may be read thus: O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? ANSWER—The grace of God, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Thus we find, that a case of the kind described by the apostle in the preceding verses, whether it were his own, before he was brought to the knowledge of Christ, particularly during the three days that he was at Damascus, without being able to eat or drink, in deep penitential sorrow; or whether he personates a Pharisee, yet conscientious Jew, deeply concerned for his salvation; I say, we find that such a case can be relieved by the Gospel of Christ only: or, in other words, that no scheme of redemption can be effectual to the salvation of any soul, whether Jew or Gentile, but that laid down in the Gospel of Christ.

Let any, or all means be used, which human wisdom can devise, guilt will still continue uncancelled; and inbred sin will laugh them all to scorn, prevail over them, and finally triumph. And this is the very conclusion to which the apostle brings his argument in the following clause; which, like the rest of the chapter, has been most awfully abused, to favour anti-evangelical purposes.

So then, with the mind I myself serve the law of God] That this clause contains the inference from the preceding train of argumentation, appears evident from the αὐτῷ ὡς, therefore, with which the apostle introduces it. As if he had said—“To conclude: the sum of what I have advanced, concerning the power of sin in the carnal man, and the utter insufficiency of all human means, and legal observances, to pardon sin, and expel the corruption of the heart, is this, that the very same person, the αὐτός ἐγώ, the same I, while without the Gospel, under the killing power of the law, will find in himself two opposite principles, the one subscribing to, and approving the law of God; and the other, notwithstanding, bringing him into captivity to sin: his inward man, his rational powers and conscience, will assent to the justice and propriety of the requisitions of the law; and yet, notwithstanding this, his fleshly appetites, the law in his members, will war against the law of his mind, and continue, till he receives the Gospel of Christ, to keep him in the galling captivity of sin and death.”

1. The strong expressions in this clause have led many to conclude, that the apostle himself, in his regenerated state, is indisputably the person intended. That all that is said in this chapter, of the carnal man, sold under sin, did apply to Saul of Tarsus, no man can doubt: that what is here said can ever be, with propriety, applied to Paul the apostle, who can believe? Of the former all is natural; of the latter, all here said would be monstrous, and absurd, if not blasphemous.

2. But it is supposed that the words must be understood as implying a regenerate man, because the apostle says, ver. 22. I delight in the law of God; and in this verse, I myself, with the mind, serve the law of God. These things, say the objectors, cannot be spoken of a wicked Jew, but of a regenerate man, such as the apostle then was. But when we find that the former verse speaks of a man who is brought into captivity to the law of sin and death; surely there is no part of the regenerate state of the apostle to which the words can possibly apply. Had he been in captivity to the law of sin and death, after his conversion to Christianity, what did he gain by that conversion? Nothing for his personal holiness. He had found no salvation under an inefficient law; and he was left in thralldom under an equally inefficient Gospel. The very genius of Christianity demonstrates that nothing like this can, with any propriety, be spoken of a genuine Christian.

3. But, it is further supposed, that these things cannot be spoken of a proud or wicked Jew: yet we learn the contrary from the infallible testimony of the word of God. Of this people, in their fallen and iniquitous state, God says by his prophet, They seek me daily, and delight to know my way as a nation that did righteousness, and forsook not the ordinances of their God: they ask me of the ordinances of justice, and take delight in approaching to God. Isa. lviii. 2. Can any thing be stronger than this? And yet, at that time, they were most dreadfully carnal, and sold under sin, as the rest of that chapter proves. It is a most notorious fact, that how little soever the life of a Jew was conformed to the law of his God, he notwithstanding professed the highest esteem for it, and gloried in it; and the apostle says nothing stronger of them in this chapter, than their conduct and profession verify to the present day. They are still delighting in the law of God, after the inward man; with their mind, serving the law of God; asking for the ordinances of justice, seeking God daily, and taking delight in approaching to God; they even glory, and greatly exult and glory in the Divine original and excellency of their law; and all this while they are most abominably carnal, sold under sin, and brought into the most degrading captivity to the law of sin and death.

If then all that the apostle states of the person in question, be true of the Jews, through the whole period of their history, even to the present time;—if they do, in all their professions and their religious services, which they zealously maintain, confess, and conscientiously too, that the law is holy, and the commandment holy, just, and good; and yet, with their flesh serve the law of sin; the same certainly may be said with equal propriety of a Jewish penitent, deeply convinced of his lost estate, and the total insufficiency of his legal observances to deliver him from his body of sin and death. And, consequently, all this may be said of Paul the Jew, while going about to establish his own righteousness, his own plan of justification; he had not as yet submitted to the righteousness of God, the divine plan of redemption by Jesus Christ.

4. It must be allowed that, whatever was the experience of so eminent a man, Christian, and apostle, as St. Paul, it must be a very proper standard of Christianity. And if we are to take what is here said, as his experience as a Christian, it would be presumption in us to expect to go higher; for, he certainly had pushed the principles of his religion to their utmost consequences. But his whole life, and the account which he immediately gives of himself in the succeeding chapter, prove, that he, as a Christian, and an apostle, had a widely different experience; an experience which amply justifies that superiority, which he attributes to the Christian religion over the Jewish; and demonstrates that it not only is well calculated to perfect all preceding dispensations; but that it affords salvation to the uttermost, to all those who flee for refuge to the hope that it sets before them. Besides, there is nothing spoken here of the state of a conscientious Jew, or of St. Paul in his Jewish state; that is not true of every genuine penitent; even before, and, it may be, long before he has believed in Christ, to the saving of his soul. The assertion, that "every Christian, howsoever advanced in the divine life, will, and must feel all this inward conflict," &c. is as untrue as it is dangerous. That many, called Christians, and probably sincere, do feel all this, may be readily granted; and such we must consider to be in the same state with Saul of Tarsus, previously to his conversion: but that they must continue thus, is no where intimated in the Gospel of Christ. We must take heed how we make our experience, which is the result of our unbelief and unfaithfulness, the standard for the people of God: and lower down Christianity to our most reprehensible and dwarfish state: at the same time, we should not be discouraged at what we thus feel, but apply to God, through Christ, as Paul did; and then we shall soon be able, with him, to declare, to the eternal glory of God's grace, that the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, has made us free from the law of sin and death. This is the inheritance of God's children; and their salvation is of me, saith the Lord.

I cannot conclude these observations, without recommending unto the notice of my readers a learned and excellent discourse on the latter part of this chapter, preached by the Rev. James Smith, minister of the Gospel in Dumfermline, Scotland, a work to which I am indebted for some useful observations, and from which I should have been glad to have copied much, had my limits permitted. Reader, do not plead for Baal; try, fully try, the efficiency of the blood of the covenant; and be not content with less salvation than God has provided for thee. Thou art not straitened in God, be not straitened in thy own bowels.

NOTES ON CHAP. VIII.
Verse 1. There is, therefore, now no condemnation] To do justice to St. Paul's reasoning, this chapter must be read in the closest connexion with the preceding. There, we have seen the unavailing struggles of an awakened Jew, who sought pardon and holiness from that law which he was conscious he had broken, and in which he could find no provision for pardon; and no power to sanctify. This conviction having brought him to the very brink of despair; and being on the point of giving up all hope, he hears of redemption by Jesus Christ, thanks God for the prospect he has of salvation, applies for, and receives it; and now magnifies God for the unspeakable gift of which he has been made a partaker.

Those who restrain the word now, so as to indicate by it the Gospel dispensation only, do not take in the whole of the apostle's meaning. The apostle has not been dealing in general matters only, but also in those which are particular. He has not been pointing out merely the difference between the two dispensations, the Mosaic and the Christian; but he marks out the state of a penitent under the former, and that of a believer under the latter. The last chapter closed with an account of the deep distress of the penitent: this one opens with an account of his salvation. The now, therefore, in the text, must refer more to the happy transition from darkness to light, from condemnation to pardon, which this believer now enjoys; than to the Christian dispensation taking the place of the Jewish economy.

Who walk not after the flesh, &c.] In this one verse we find the power and virtue of the Gospel scheme: it pardons and sanctifies; the Jewish law could do neither. By faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, the penitent, condemned by the law, is pardoned; the carnal man, labouring under the overpowering influence of the sin of his nature, is sanctified. He is first freely justified; he feels no condemnation; he is fully sanctified, he walks not after the FLESH, but after the SPIRIT.

This last clause is wanting in the principal MSS. Versions and Fathers. Griesbach has excluded it from the text, and Dr. White says, certissime delenda, it should most undoubtedly be expunged. Without it, the passage reads thus: There is, therefore, no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus; for the law of the Spirit of life, &c. It is a fairly assumed point, that those which are in Christ Jesus, who believe in his name, have redemption in his blood; are made partakers of his Spirit, and have the mind in them that was in him; will not walk after the flesh, but after the Spirit: therefore, the thing itself is included in the being in Christ, whether it be expressed or not; and it was probably to make the thing more obvious, that this explanatory clause was added by some copyist: for it does not appear to have made an original part of the text: and it is most likely that it was inserted here from the fourth verse.

Verse 2. For the law of the Spirit of life] The Gospel of the grace of Christ, which is not only a law or rule of life, but affords that sovereign energy by which guilt is removed from the conscience, the power of sin broken, and its polluting influence removed from the heart. The law was a spirit of death, by which those who were under it were bound down, because of their sin, to condemnation and death. The Gospel proclaims Jesus the Saviour; and what the law bound unto death, it looses unto life eternal. And thus the apostle says, whether of himself or the man whom he is still persuading, the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death. Most people allow that St. Paul is here speaking of his own state; and this state is so totally different from that described in the preceding chapter, that it is absolutely impossible that they should have been the state of the same being, at one and the same time. No creature could possibly be carnal, sold under sin, brought into captivity to the law of sin and death; and at the same time be made free from that law of sin and death, by the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus! Until the most palpable absurdities and contradictions can be reconciled, these two opposite states can never exist in the same person at the same time.

Verse 3. For what the law could not do] The law could not pardon; the law could not sanctify, the law could not dispense with its own requisitions; it is the rule of righteousness, and therefore must condemn unrighteousness. This is its unalterable nature. Had there been perfect obedience to its dictates, instead of condemning, it would have applauded and rewarded; but, as the flesh, the carnal and rebellious principle, had prevailed, and transgression had taken place; it was rendered weak, inefficient to undo this work of the flesh, and bring the sinner into a state of pardon and acceptance with God.

God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh] Did that which the law could not do; i. e. purchased pardon for the sinner, and brought every believer unto the favour of God. And this is effected by the incarnation of Christ; He in whom dwelt the fullness of the Godhead bodily, took upon him the likeness of sinful flesh, that is, a human body like ours; but not sinful as ours; and for sin, καὶ τῆς ἀναγνῶντος, and as a SACRIFICE FOR SIN, (this is the sense of the word in a multitude of places) condemned sin in the flesh; condemned that to death and destruction, which had condemned us to both: and this he did—

Verse 4. That the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us] That the guilt might be pardoned through the merit of that sacrifice; and that we might be enabled, by the power of his own grace and Spirit, to walk in newness of life; loving God with all our heart, soul, mind, and strength; and our neighbour as ourselves:

might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.

5 For, they that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the Spirit, the things of the Spirit.

6 For to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace.

and thus the righteousness, the spirit, design, and purpose of the law, is fulfilled in us, through the strength of the Spirit of Christ, which is here put in opposition to the weakness of the law through the flesh.

It is very likely that the concluding clause of this verse, which is the very same as that found in the common text of the first verse, has been transferred to that verse from this place.

Condemned sin in the flesh] The design and object of the incarnation and sacrifice of Christ were to condemn sin, to have it executed and destroyed; not to tolerate it, as some think; or to render it subservient to the purposes of his grace, as others; but to annihilate its power, guilt, and being, in the soul of a believer.

Verse 5. For they that are after the flesh] And here is the great distinction between Jews and genuine Christians; the former are after the flesh; are under the power of the carnal, rebellious principle; and consequently mind, savour, relish the things of the flesh; the things which appertain merely to the present life;
having no relish for spiritual and eternal things.

But they that are after the Spirit] They who are regenerated, who are born of the Spirit, being redeemed from the influence and law of the carnal mind; these relish the things of the Spirit; they are spiritually minded, and pass through things temporal, so as not to lose the things which are eternal. And this, which in these apostolic times distinguished between the carnal Jew, and the spiritual believer in Christ, is the grand mark of distinction between the nominal and the real Christian now.
The former are earthly minded, and live for this world; the latter are spiritually minded, and live for the world to come.

Verse 6. For to be carnally minded is death] To live under the influence of the carnal mind, is to live in the state of condemnation; and,
consequently, liable to death eternal: whereas,
on the contrary, he who is spiritually minded, has the life and peace of God in his soul; and is in full prospect of life eternal.

Verse 7. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God] Because it is a carnal mind, and relishes earthly and sinful things; and lives in opposition to the pure and holy law of God; therefore it is enmity against God, it is irreconcilable and implacable hatred.

It is not subject to the law of God] It will 7 Because the carnal mind is enmity against God: for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be.

8 So then, they that are in the flesh cannot please God.

9 But ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now, if any man come under no obedience; for it is sin, and the very principle of rebellion; and therefore it cannot be subject, nor subjected; for it is essential to sin to show itself in rebellion; and when it ceases to rebel, it ceases to be sin.

From this we learn, that the design of God, in the economy of the Gospel, is not to weaken, curtail, or lay the carnal principle in bonds, but to destroy it. As it is not subject, and cannot be subject to the law of God, it must be destroyed; else it will continue to rebel against God. It cannot be mended, or rendered less offensive in its nature, even by the operations of God; it is ever sin, and sin is ever enmity;
and enmity, wherever it has power, will invariably show itself in acts of hostility and rebellion.

Verse 8. So then] Because this carnal mind is enmity against God; they that are in the flesh, who are under the power of the workings of this carnal mind, (which every soul is, that has not received redemption in the blood of the Lamb.)

Cannot please God] Because of the rebellious workings of this principle of rebellion and hatred. And, if they cannot please God, they must be displeasing to him; and, consequently, in the broad road to final perdition.

Verse 9. But ye are not in the flesh] Ye Christians who have believed in Christ Jesus as the sin-offering which has condemned sin in the flesh; and having been justified by faith, and made partakers of the Holy Spirit, are enabled to walk in newness of life.

If so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you] Or seeing that, were, the Spirit of God dwelleth in you. The flesh, the sinful principle, dwelt in them before; and its motions were the proofs of its indwelling: but now the Spirit dwells in them; and its testimony in their conscience, and its powerful operations in their hearts, are (the proofs of its indwelling. God made man in union with himself, and his heart was his temple. Sin being committed, the temple was defiled, and God abandoned it.
Jesus Christ is come by his sacrifice and Spirit to cleanse the temple, and make man again a habitation of God through the Spirit. And when this Almighty Spirit again makes the heart his residence; then the soul is delivered from the moral effects of the fall. And, that this is absolutely necessary to our present peace, and final salvation, is proved from this;

have not ^a the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.

10 And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the Spirit is life because of righteousness.

that if any man have not the Spirit of Christ; the mind that was in him, produced there, by the power of the Holy Ghost; he is none of his, he does not belong to the kingdom, flock, or family of God. This is an awful conclusion!—Reader, lay it to heart.

Verse 10. And if Christ be in you, &c.] This is the criterion by which you may judge of the state of grace in which you stand. If Christ dwell in your hearts by faith, the body is dead because of sin; δὲ σαρξικῆς, in reference to sin; the members of your body no more perform the work of sin, than the body of a dead man does the functions of natural life. Or the apostle may mean, that although because of sin, the life of man is forfeited; and the sentence, dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return, must be fulfilled on every human being, till the judgment of the great day; yet, their souls being quickened by the indwelling Spirit of Christ, enables them to live a life of righteousness, and gives them a full assurance that their bodies, which are now condemned to death because of sin, shall be raised again to a life of immortal glory.

Verse 11. But if the Spirit, &c.] This verse confirms the sense given to the preceding. He, who here receives the grace and Spirit of Christ, and continues to live, under its influence, a life of obedience to the Divine will, shall have a resurrection to eternal life; and the resurrection of Christ shall be the pattern after which they shall be raised.

By his Spirit that dwelleth in you] Instead of διὰ τοῦ πνεύματος αὐτοῦ ἑνωμένου, because of the Spirit of him who dwelleth in you, DEF. G. a great many others, with the Vulgate, Itala, and several of the Fathers, have διὰ τοῦ πνεύματος αὐτοῦ ἑνωμένου, which gives almost no variety of meaning. The latter may be neater Greek, but it is not better sense than the preceding.

Verse 12. Therefore, brethren, &c.] Dr. Taylor is of opinion that the apostle, having spoken separately both to Jews and Gentiles concerning holiness, and the obligations to it, now addresses himself to both conjointly, and—

and advances several arguments to fortify their minds under all trials:—as (1.) that they suffered with Christ—(2.) In order to be glorified with him in a manner which will infinitely compensate all sufferings, ver. 17, 18.—(3.) All mankind are under various pressures, longing for a better state, ver. 19—22.—(4.) Many of the most eminent Christians are in the same distressed condition, ver. 23.—(5.) According to the plan of the Gospel, we are to be brought to glory after a course of patience, exercised in a variety of trials, ver. 24, 25.—(6.) The Spirit of God will supply patience to every upright soul under persecution and suffering, ver. 26, 27.—(7.) All things, even the severest trials, shall work together for their good, ver. 28. And this he proves, by giving us a view of the several steps which the wisdom and goodness of God have settled in order to our complete salvation, ver. 29, 30. Thence he passes to the affair of our perseverance; concerning which he concludes, from the whole of his preceding arguments, that as we are brought into a state of pardon, by the free grace of God, through the death of Christ, who is now our Mediator in heaven; no possible cause, providing we continue to love and serve God, shall be able to pervert our minds, or separate us from his love in Christ Jesus, ver. 31—39. Therefore, ἀπαύστη, is the grand inference, from all that he has been arguing in relation to sanctity of life, both to the Gentiles, chap. vi. and to the Jews, chap. vii. and viii. to this verse, where I suppose he begins to address himself to both in a body, to the end of the chapter.—Taylor, p. 317.

Verse 13. For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die] Though μολοῦσι ἀποθνήσκουσι may mean, ye shall afterwards die, and this seems to intimate a temporal death; yet not exclusively of an eternal death; for both, and especially the latter, are necessarily implied.

But if ye, through the Spirit] If ye seek that grace and spiritual help which the Gospel of Christ furnishes; resist, and by resisting, mortify the deeds of the flesh, against which the law gave you no assistance; ye shall live a life of faith, love, and holy obedience here; and a life of glory hereafter.

Verse 14. For as many as are led by the Spirit, &c.] No man who has not divine assistance can either find the way to heaven, or walk in it when found. As Christ, by his sacrificial offering, has opened the kingdom of God to all believers; and as a mediator, transacts the concerns of their kingdom before the throne: so the Spirit of God is the great agent here below, to enlighten, quicken, strengthen, and guide the true disciples of Christ; and all that are born of this Spirit are led and guided by it; and none can pretend to be the children of God who are not thus guided.

Verse 15. Ye have not received the spirit of bondage] All that were under the law were under bondage to its rites and ceremonies; and as, through the prevalence of that corrupt nature with which every human being is polluted, and to remove which the law gave no assistance, they were often transgressing; consequently, they had forfeited their lives, and were continually, through fear of death, subject to bondage, Heb. ii. 15: The believers in Christ Jesus were brought from under that law, and from under its condemnation; and, consequently, were freed from its bondage. The Gentiles were also in a state of bondage, as well as the Jews: they had also a multitude of burdensome rites and ceremonies, and a multitude of deities to worship; nor could they believe themselves secure of protection while one of their almost endless host of gods, celestial, terrestrial, or infernal, was left unpropitiated.

But ye have received the Spirit of adoption] Ye are brought into the family of God by adoption; and the agent that brought you into this family is the Holy Spirit; and this very Spirit continues to witness to you the grace in which ye stand, by enabling you to call God your Father, with the utmost filial confidence and affection.

The Spirit of adoption] Adoption was an act frequent among the ancient Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans; by which a person was taken out of one family, and incorporated with another. Persons of property, who had no children of their own, adopted those of another family. The child thus adopted, ceased to belong to his own family, and was, in every respect, bound to the person who had adopted him, as if he were his own child; and in consequence of the death of his adopting father, he possessed his estates. If a person, after he had adopted a child, happened to have children of his own; then the estate was equally divided between the adopted and real children. The Romans had regular forms of law by which all these matters were settled.

Whereby we cry, Abba, Father.] The reason why the Syriac and Greek words are here conjoined, may be seen in the note on Mark xiv. 36. to which the reader is referred. The introduction of the words here shows that the persons in question had the strongest evidence of the excellence of the state in which they stood; they knew that they were thus adopted; and they knew this by the Spirit of God which was given them on their adoption; and let me say, they could know it by no other means. The Father who had adopted them, could be seen by no mortal eye; and the transaction being purely of a spiritual nature, and transacted in heaven, can be known only by God's supernatural testimony of it upon earth. It is a matter of such solemn importance to every Christian soul, that God in his mercy has been pleased not to leave it to conjecture, assumption, or inductive reasoning; but attests it by his own Spirit in the soul of the person whom he adopts through Christ Jesus. It is the grand and most observable case, in which the intercourse is kept up between heaven and earth; and the genuine believer in Christ Jesus is not left to the quibbles or casuistry of polemic divines or critics, but receives the thing, and the testimony of it, immediately from God himself. And were not the testimony of the state thus given, no man could possibly have any assurance of his salvation which would beget confidence and love. If, to any man, his acceptance with God be hypothetical, then his confidence must be so too. His love to God must be hypothetical, his gratitude hypothetical, and his obedience also. IF God have forgiven me my sins, then I should love him, and I should be grateful, and I should testify this gratitude by obedience. But who does not see that these must necessarily depend on the IF in the first case. All this uncertainty, and the perplexities necessarily resulting from it, God has precluded by sending the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, by which we cry, Abba, Father! and thus our adoption into the heavenly family is testified and ascertained to us in the only way in which it can possibly be done, by the direct influence of the Spirit of God. Remove this from Christianity, and it is a dead letter.

It has been remarked that slaves were not permitted to use the term Abba, father, or Imma, mother, in accosting their masters and mistresses. The Hebrew canon, relative to this is extant in the tract Berachoth, fol. 16. 2. הַבְּרִיּוֹת שֶׁחֲשָׁפוּ אֶת פְּרִיזוֹת אֲבוֹתָם לֹא אָבָא פִּלְתִּי וְלֹא הַבְּרִיּוֹת שֶׁחֲשָׁפוּ אֶת פְּרִיזוֹת אִמָּתָם לֹא אִמָּא פִּלְתִּי korin otham. lo Abba N. velo Imma N. Menservants and maid-servants do not call to their master, Abba, (father.) N. nor to their mistress, Imma, (mother.) N. And from this, some suppose that the apostle intimates, that being now brought from under the spirit of bondage in which they durst not call God their Father; they are now not only brought into a new state, but have got that language which is peculiar to that state. It is certain that no man who has not redemption in the blood of the cross, has any right to call God Father; but merely as he may be considered the Father of the spirits of all flesh.

Some have supposed that the apostle, by using the Syriac and Greek words which express

Father, shows the union of Jewish and Gentile believers in those devotions which were dictated by a filial spirit. Others have thought that these were the first words which those generally uttered, who were made partakers of the Holy Spirit. It is enough to know that it was the language of their sonship; and that it expressed the clear assurance they had of being received into the Divine favour, the affection and gratitude they felt for this extraordinary blessing, and their complete readiness to come under the laws and regulations of the family, and to live in the spirit of obedience.

Verse 16. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit] Αυτο το πνευμα that same Spirit, the Spirit of adoption; that is, the Spirit who witnesses this adoption, which can be no other than the Holy Ghost himself, and certainly cannot mean any disposition or affection of mind which the adopted person may feel; for such a disposition must arise from a knowledge of this adoption; and the knowledge of this adoption cannot be given by any human or earthly means; it must come from God himself: therefore, the αυτο το πνευμα must have reference to that Spirit, by whom alone the knowledge of the adoption is witnessed to the soul of the believer.

With our spirit—In our understanding, the place or recipient of light and information; and the place or faculty to which such information can properly be brought. This is done that we may have the highest possible evidence of the work which God has wrought. As the window is the proper medium to let the light of the sun into our apartments; so the understanding is the proper medium of conveying the Spirit's influence to the soul. We, therefore, have the utmost evidence of the fact of our adoption, which we can possibly have: we have the word and Spirit of God; and the word sealed on our spirit by the Spirit of God. And this is not a momentary influx: if we take care to walk with God, and not grieve the Holy Spirit, we shall have an abiding testimony; and while we continue faithful to our adopting Father, the Spirit that witnesses that adoption will continue to witness it; and hereby we shall know that we are of God by the Spirit which he giveth us.

Verse 17. And if children, then heirs] For the legitimate children can alone inherit the estate. This is not an estate to which they succeed in consequence of the death of a former possessor: it is like the Promised Land, given by God himself, and divided among the children of the family.

they are to inherit; it is God, who is infinitely greater and more glorious than heaven itself. With such powers has God created the soul of man, that nothing less than himself can be a sufficient and satisfactory portion for the mind of this most astonishing creature.

Joint heirs with Christ] Partaking of the same eternal glory with the glorified human nature of Christ.

If so be that we suffer with him] Observe, says Dr. Taylor, how prudently the apostle advances to the harsh affair of suffering. He does not mention it till he had raised up their thoughts to the highest object of joy and pleasure, the happiness and glory of a joint inheritance with the ever blessed Son of God.

We are heirs, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ, if so be that we suffer with him— This, with the additional consideration, that we suffer with Christ; or, as he himself suffered, would greatly qualify the transitory afflictions of this world, and dispose them to attend to the other arguments he had to offer.

Verse 18. For I reckon that the sufferings, &c.] If the glory that is to be revealed be the enjoyment of God himself, (see above,) then the sufferings of this life, which, when compared with eternity, are but as for a moment, are not worthy to be put in competition with this glory which shall be revealed in us. This case is perfectly clear.

Verse 19. For the earnest expectation of the creature] There is considerable difficulty in this and the four following verses: and the difficulty lies chiefly in the meaning of the κτισις, which we translate the creature, and creation. Some think that by it the brute creation is meant, others apply it to the Jewish people, others to the godly, others to the Gentiles, others to the good angels, and others to the fallen spirits, both angelic and human. Dissertations without end have been written on it; and it does not appear that the Christian world are come to any general agreement on the subject. Dr. Lightfoot's mode of explanation appears to me to be the best, on the whole. "There is," says he, "a twofold key hanging at this place, which may unlock the whole, and make the sense plain and easy.

"1. The first is the phrase πασα κτισις, which we render the whole creation, ver. 22. and with which we meet twice elsewhere in the New Testament. Mark xvi. 15, Preach the Gospel, πασα τη κτισου, to every creature; and Col. 1. 23, the Gospel was preached, ο πασα τη κτισου, to every creature. Now it is sufficiently apparent what is meant by πασα κτισις in both these places, viz. all nations, or the heathen world.

the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God.

20 For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope,

21 Because the creature itself also a 1 John 3. 2.—b ver. 22. Gal. 3. 19.

For that which, in St. Mark, is, preach the Gospel to every creature; is, in St. Matthew, go and teach πάντα τα ἔθνη, all nations. And this very phrase in this place, lays claim to that very interpretation. And the Hebrew מְרִיבָה לָא col haberiobh, which answers to the Greek ματαιότης, every creature, is applied by the Jews to the Gentiles, and that, by way of opposition to Israel.

"2. The second key is the word ματαιότης, ver. 20. which is not unfitly rendered vanity; but then this vanity is improperly applied to the vanishing, dying, changing state of the creation. For ματαιότης, vanity, does not so much denote the vanishing condition of the outward state, as it does the inward vanity or emptiness of the mind. So the apostle, speaking of the Gentiles, concerning whom he speaks here, tells us, ματαιώθησαν, They became vain in their imaginations, Rom. i. 21. and again, The Gentiles walk, in ματαιότητι, in the vanity of their mind, Eph. iv. 17. So also, The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise, οτι ματαιον ἔστιν, that they are vain, 1 Cor. iii. 20. To all which let me add this further observation, that throughout this whole place, the apostle seems to allude to the bondage of the Israelites in Egypt, and their deliverance from it; with a comparison made betwixt the Jewish and the Gentile church. When God would deliver Israel from his bondage, he challenges him for his son, and his first-born, Exod. iv. 22. And in like manner the Gentiles earnestly expect and wait for such a kind of manifestation of the sons of God, within and among themselves. The Romans, to whom the apostle writes, knew well how many predictions and promises it had pleased God to publish by his prophets, concerning gathering together and adopting sons to himself among the Gentiles, the manifestation of which sons the whole Gentile world, with a neck as it were stretched out, as the word εξενεσθῆναι implies, (from εξο, and σπε, the head, and σπασ, to expect), doth now wait for." See the observations at the end of this chapter.

Verse 20. For the creature was made subject to vanity] The Gentile world were subject to vanity of mind;—but how? not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same. May we not say, it became vain willingly? but was made subject to vanity unwillingly. For, let us recur to the origin of Gentilism, the confusion of languages, by reason of the attempt to build the tower of Babel; and though there are some passages in the glosses of the Targumists upon this matter, that are sufficiently ridiculous; yet as to their scope and design they are worthy of notice. "They said, Go to, let us build us a city and a tower, and let its head reach unto the top of heaven; and let us make a house of worship in the top of it; and let us put a sword in his hand, that he may wage war for us against our enemies, before we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth." It is an ancient tradition among the Jews, that this tower was built on an idolatrous account. The confusion of tongues, by which true religion was lost in the world, is a proof that the builders of this tower sinned against God in the highest degree. They were inclined to vanity, i. e. idolatry, WILLINGLY; but they were subjected to vanity UNWILLINGLY; for this proceeded from the just indignation and vengeance of God. From this time the world lay under heathenism, till the bringing in of the Gospel, upwards of 2000 years after.—See Lightfoot.

Verse 21. Because the creature] This and the preceding verse should be thus connected; in hope THAT (οτι) the creature itself also shall be delivered. The word σῶμα, denotes, very frequently, sinful corruption. So 2 Pet. i. 4, Corruption through lust, σῶμα καὶ ἐπιθυμία. 2 Cor. xi. 3, lest your minds should be corrupted. 1 Cor. xv. 33, Evil communication corrupts good manners. The sense, therefore, of the apostle in this place, seems to be; the Gentile world shall, in time, be delivered from the bondage of their sinful corruption; i. e. the bondage of their lusts and vile affections; and be brought into such a noble liberty as the sons of God enjoy.

Verse 22. The whole creation groaneth and travaileth] If it be inquired how the Gentile world groaned and travailed in pain; let them who explain this of the fabric of the material world, tell us how that groans and travails? They must needs own it to be a borrowed and allusive phrase: but, in the sense above given, the very literal construction may be admitted.

Verse 23. And not only they, but ourselves also] Neither the Gentiles only, but we Jews also, (however we belong to a nation envious of the heathen,) to whom God hath granted the first-fruits of the Spirit; we sigh among ourselves for their sakes, waiting for the adoption; that is, the redemption of our mystical body, whereof the Gentiles make a very great part. Lightfoot's Works, Vol. II. pages 359 and 707.

The scope and design of St. Paul in these verses may be thus summed up:—The apostle shows that the whole creation is in a suffering state, into which it has been brought by the disobedience of one man, Adam; therefore, it was made subject to vanity; pain, sickness, and death;

also, which have the first-fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body.

24 For we are saved by hope: but not willingly, for mankind had no part in that transgression, which "brought death into the world, and all our wo;" but God subjected the whole, purposing to afford them a deliverance, and infusing into every heart a hope that a more auspicious era should take place; and it is through the influence of this hope, which every man possesses, that the present ills are so patiently borne, because all are expecting better days. The great Deliverer is the Messiah, and the Gospel days the auspicious era which God intended to bring forward. They who believe in Christ, with a heart unto righteousness, are freed from the bondage of their sinful corruption, and brought into the glorious liberty of the sons of God; and they look forward with joyous expectation, waiting for the general resurrection, when their bodies also shall be redeemed from corruption, and the whole man, body and soul, be adopted into the family of heaven ABOVE; as their souls had been previously adopted into the family of faith BELOW. And although it may be said that the redemption provided by the Gospel, cannot be an object of hope to those who have never heard of it; yet, as every man has hope, and this hope is inspired by God for this very purpose, that it may be the means of supporting them in the ills of life; and God, in inspiring it, had respect to the glorious state of Christianity; therefore, it is this state, in effect, that the whole creation are longing for. So Jesus Christ is said, by the prophet Haggai, ii. 7, to be the Desire of all nations; and yet not one of the nations of the earth had at that time heard of him. And thus, as Dr. Whitby has very properly remarked, "desire and expectation are ascribed to creatures, in reference to things they want, and which tend to their advantage; notwithstanding they explicitly know nothing of them."

Verse 24. For we are saved by hope] We are supported, and are comfortable in the expectation we have of receiving, from the hand of our God, all the good we need, in the troubles and adversities of this life; and in having our bodies raised from corruption and death, at the general resurrection.

Hope that is seen is not hope] As hope signifies the expectation of future good; so, it necessarily supposes that the object of it is not seen; i. e. not enjoyed; for to see, in scripture language, sometimes signifies to enjoy, as in Job vii. 7, Mine eyes shall no more see (margin, ενjoy) good. Job ix. 25, My days see away, and see no good; i. e. enjoy no prosperity. Psal. i. 23, I will show the salvation of God: I will give that man to enjoy my salvation who walks uprightly. Matt. v. 8, Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God: that is, they shall enjoy his favour and blessing. See also, John iii. 36. Heb. xii. 14. and 1 John iii. 2. The hope that is seen, that is enjoyed, is no longer hope; it is fruition: and a man cannot hope for that which he has in his possession.

Verse 25. But if we hope for that we see not] If we have a well-grounded expectation of our resurrection, and final glorification, knowing that such things are necessarily future, and must, for a certain time, be delayed; then do we patiently wait for them, continue patiently to endure the common ills of life, and whatever tribulations we may be exposed to in consequence of our Christian profession; for we know, FAITHFUL is he who has promised. Hope is a sort of universal blessing; and one of the greatest which God has granted to man. To mankind in general, life would be intolerable without it; and it is as necessary as faith is, even to the followers of God.

The ancients have a very instructive and elegant fable concerning it. "Prometheus, having made a human body, went up to heaven, and stole some celestial fire to animate it. Jupiter, incensed at the theft, sent down Pandora, with a box full of diseases and plagues of every kind, as an ensnaring present to Prometheus; but he refused to accept it. Epimetheus took and opened it; and instantly all those diseases, &c. by which mankind have been made miserable, flew out and spread themselves over the whole earth; and only HOPE remained at the bottom of the box." This fable explains itself, as to its main design. Men find life, with its various and unavoidable ills, only supportable by the hope they have of not only getting safely through them, but of enjoying a state of blessedness in the end. Hope is still at the bottom; and therefore man is encouraged to bear up in all the pressures of life. Take away hope, and then black despair, and indescribable wretchedness, would be the instant result. Hope stands justly among the highest mercies of God.

Verse 26. The Spirit also helpeth our infirmities] The same Spirit, το πνευμα, mentioned before, as bearing witness with ours that we are the children of God; and consequently it is not a disposition or frame of mind, for the disposition of our mind surely cannot help the infirmities of our minds.

The word συνεπιβοηθουσα is very inadequately expressed by helpeth. It is compounded of εν, together, αντι, against, and λαβομεθα, to support, or help; and signifies such assistance as is afforded by any two persons to each other, who mutually bear the same load; or carry it between them. He who prays, receives help from the Spirit of God; but he who prays not, receives no such help. Whatever our strength

For we know not what we should pray for as we ought] And should therefore be liable to endless mistakes in our prayers, if suitable desires were not excited by the Holy Spirit; and power received to bring these desires, by prayer, before the throne of grace.

But the Spirit itself] Αὐτὸς τοῦ πνεύματος, the same Spirit, viz. the Spirit that witnesses of our adoption and sonship, ver. 15, 16. makes intercession for us. Surely if the apostle had designed to teach us, that he meant our own sense and understanding by the Spirit, he never could have spoken in a manner in which plain common sense was never likely to comprehend his meaning. Besides, how can it be said that our own spirit, our filial disposition, bears witness with our own spirit; that our own spirit helps the infirmities of our own spirit; that our own spirit teaches our own spirit that of which it is ignorant; and that our own spirit maketh intercession for our own spirit, with groanings unutterable? This would have been both incongruous and absurd. We must therefore understand these places of that help and influence which the followers of God receive from the Holy Ghost; and, consequently, of the fulfilment of the various promises relative to this point which our Lord made to his disciples, particularly in John xiv. 16, 17, and 26. xv. 26, 27. xvi. 7. and particularly ver. 13, and 14. Howbeit, when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth; and he will show you things to come. He shall glorify me; for he shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you.

Verse 27. He maketh intercession for the saints] The word παρακαλεῖται, signifies to apply oneself to a person in behalf of another: to intercede, or negotiate for. Our Lord makes intercession for us, by negotiating and managing, as our Friend and Agent, all the affairs pertaining to our salvation. And the Spirit of God makes intercession for the saints; not by supplication to God on their behalf, but by directing and qualifying their supplications in a proper manner, by his agency and influence upon their hearts; which, according to the Gospel scheme, is the peculiar work and office of the Holy Spirit. See Taylor.

According to the will of God.] Κατὰ Θεοῦ according to the mind, intention, or design of God. And thus the prayers which we offer up, and the desires which subsist in the unutterable groanings, are all such as are pleasing in the sight of God. So that God, whose is the Spirit, knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit: ^d because he maketh intercession for the saints, ^e according to the will of God.

and who is acquainted with the mind of the Spirit, knows what he means when he leads the saints to express themselves in words, desires, groans, sighs, or tears: in each God reads the language of the Holy Ghost; and prepares the answer according to the request.

From all this we learn, that a fluency in prayer is not essential to praying; a man may pray most powerfully in the estimation of God, who is not able to utter even one word. The unutterable groan is big with meaning, and God understands it, because it contains the language of his own Spirit. Some desires are too mighty to be expressed; there is no language expressive enough to give them proper form and distinct vocal sound. Such desires show that they came from God: and as they came from him, so they express what God is disposed to do; and what he has purposed to do. This is a matter of great encouragement to all those who are agonizing to enter in at the strait gate.

Verse 28. And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God] To understand this verse aright, let us observe—1. That the persons in whose behalf all things work for good, are they who love God; and, consequently, who live in the spirit of obedience.—2. It is not said that all things shall work for good: but that συγγιγναι, they work now in the behalf of him who loveth now, αγαπαει; for both verbs are in the present tense.—3. All these things work together; while they are working, God's providence is working, his Spirit is working, and they are working together with him. And whatever troubles, or afflictions, or persecutions may arise, God presses them into their service; and they make a part of the general working, and are caused to contribute to the general good of this person who now loves God, and who is working by faith and love under the influence and operation of the Holy Ghost. They who say sin works for good to them that love God, speak blasphemous nonsense. A man who now loves God, is not now sinning against God; and the promise belongs only to the present time: and as love is the true incentive to obedience, the man who is entitled to the promise, can never, while thus entitled, (loving God,) be found in the commission of sin. But though this be a good general sense for those words, yet the all things mentioned here by the apostle seem more particularly to mean those things mentioned in the 28th, 29th, and 30th verses.

To them who are the called according to his purpose.] Dr. Taylor translates τοῖς κλητοῖς, the invited; and observes, that it is a metaphor taken from inviting guests, or making them welcome to a feast. As if he had said, Certainly all things work together for their good; for this reason, because they are called, invited, or made welcome to the blessings of the covenant, (which is ratified in eating of the covenant sacrifice,) according to God's original purpose first declared to Abraham, Gen. xvii. 4. Thou shalt be a father of many nations—and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him, xviii. 18. Thus this clause is to be understood; and thus it is an argument to prove, that all things, how afflictive soever, shall work for our good, while we continue to love God. Our being called or invited, according to God's purpose, proves that all things work for our good, on the supposition that we love God, and not otherwise. For our loving God, or making a due improvement of our calling, is evidently inserted by the apostle to make good his argument. He does not pretend to prove that all things shall concur to the everlasting happiness of all that are called; but only to those of the called, who love God. Our calling, thus qualified, is the ground of his argument, which he prosecutes and completes in the two next verses. Our calling he takes for granted, as a thing evident and unquestionable among all Christians. But you will say, how is it evident and unquestionable that we are called? I answer, from our being in the visible church, and professing the faith of the Gospel. For always, in the apostolic writings, all that are in the visible church, and profess the faith of the Gospel, are numbered among the called or invited: i. e. among the persons who are invited to feast on the covenant sacrifice: and who, thus, in reference to themselves, confirm and ratify the covenant. As for what is termed effectual calling, as distinguished from the general invitations of the Gospel, it is a distinction which divines have invented without any warrant from the Sacred Writings. Our calling, therefore, is considered by the apostle in the nature of a self-evident proposition, which nobody doubts or denies; or which, indeed, no Christian ought to doubt, or can call in question. Taylor's Notes.

Verse 29, For whom he did foreknow, &c.] "In this, and the following verse, the apostle shows how our calling is an argument that all things work together to advance our eternal happiness; by showing the several steps which the wisdom and goodness of God have settled, in order to complete our salvation. In order to this, he first gives us, in this verse, the foundation and finishing; or the beginning and end of the scheme of our redemption: For whom God did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son. To foreknow, here signifies to design before, or at the first forming of the scheme: to bestow the favour and privilege of being God's people upon any set of men, as Rom. xi. 2. This is the foundation, or first step of our salvation; namely, the purpose and grace of God, which was given us in Christ Jesus, before the world began, 2 Tim. i. 9. Then he knew, or favoured us, for in this sense the word to know is taken in a great variety of places, both in the Old and New Testaments. And as he knew the Gentiles then, when the scheme was laid, and before any part of it was executed; consequently, in reference to the execution of this scheme, he foreknew us, that is, he allowed, granted, and purposed, that we should be thus favoured. This is the first step of our salvation; and the end or finishing of it, is our conformity to the Son of God in eternal glory, ver. 17. which includes and supposes our moral conformity to him. When God knew us, at the forming of the Gospel scheme, or when he intended to bestow on us the privilege of being his people; he then destined, or designed us to be conformed to the image of his Son: and as he destined or determined us then to this very high honour and happiness; he predestinated, foreordained, or predetermined us to it. Thus we are to understand the foundation and finishing of the scheme of our salvation. The foundation is the foreknowledge, or gracious purpose of God; according to which ample provision is made for the salvation of the Gentiles. The finishing is our being joint heirs with Christ. Now our calling, or invitation, (see on ver. 28.) stands in connexion with both these—1. It stands in connexion with God's foreknowledge; and so it is a true and valid calling: for we are called, invited, or chosen, according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, who may bestow his blessings upon any people, as may seem good in his sight, 1 Pet. i. 2. Consequently, we have a good title to the blessings of the Gospel, to which we are called or invited. And this was to be proved, that the Jews, to whom the apostle particularly wrote, might see that the Gentiles, being now called into the church of God, was not an accidental thing, but a matter which God had determined when he conceived the Gospel scheme. Thus our calling is connected with God's foreknowledge.—2. It stands also in connexion with our being conformed to the image of his Son; for we are invited by the Gospel to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ, 2 Thess. ii. 14. And, therefore, supposing what the apostle supposes, that we love God, it is certain, from our being called, that we shall be glorified with the sons of God: and so our calling proves the point, that all things should work together for our good, in our present state; because it proves that we are intended for eternal glory, as he shows in the next verse. For we must understand his foreknowing, predestinating, calling, and justifying, in relation to his glorifying; and that none are finally glorified, but those, who, according to his purpose, have been invited, brought into his church; and are conformed to the image of his Son.⁷ See Taylor.

[The first-born among many brethren.] That he might be the Chief, or Head, of all the redeemed; for his human nature is the first-fruits of the resurrection from the dead; and He is the first human being, that, after having passed through death, was raised to eternal glory.

Verse 30. Whom he did predestinate, &c.] The Gentiles, whom He determined to call into his church with the Jewish people: He called, He invited by the preaching of the Gospel, to believe on his Son Jesus Christ. It is worthy of note, that all that is spoken here, refers to what had already taken place; for the calling, justifying, and glorifying, are here represented as having already taken place, as well as the foreknowing, and the predestinating: this should be carefully noticed. It is, therefore, reasonable to suppose, that the apostle principally refers to what God had already done among the Jews and Gentiles; though he may also speak of the things that were not, as though they were.

He also justified] Pardoned the sins of all those who, with hearty repentance, and true faith, turned unto him.

He also glorified] He has honoured and dignified the Gentiles with the highest privileges; and he has already taken many of them to the kingdom of glory; and many more are on their way thither; and all who love him, and continue faithful unto death, shall inherit that glory eternally. Hence it is added, them he also glorified; for all the honours which he confers on them have respect to, and are intended to promote, their endless felicity: and though the terms are here used in a more general sense, yet if we take them more restrictedly, we must consider that, in the work of justification, sanctification is implied; justification being the foundation, and beginning of that work. From all this we learn, that none will be glorified who have not been sanctified and justified: that the justified are those who have been called or invited by the Gospel of Christ. That those who have had this calling, are they to whom God determined to grant this privilege: they did not choose this salvation first; but God sent it to them, when they knew him not: and therefore the salvation of the Gentile world, as well as that of the Jews, comes through the gratuitous mercy of God himself; and was the result of infinite designs; and stands on the same ground as the calling, &c. of the Jewish people. The word δοξα, which we render glory, and δοξασω, to glorify, both mean to render illustrious, eminent, &c. &c. in various parts of the New Testament; and in this sense the verb is used, John xi. 4. xii. 23, 28. xiii. 31, 32. xiv. 13. xv. 8. xxi. 19. Acts iii. 13. and in Rom. xi. 13. in none of which places eternal beatification can be intended. Here it seems to mean, that those whom God had called into a state of justification, he had rendered illustrious by innumerable gifts, graces, and privileges; in the same manner as he had done to the Israelites of old. This is the sense in which the passage should be understood.

The whole of the preceding discourse will show that every thing here is conditional, as far as it relates to the ultimate salvation of any person professing the Gospel of Christ; for the promises are made to character, and not to persons, as some have most injudiciously affirmed. The apostle insists upon a character all along from the beginning of the chapter: ver. 1. There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. Verse 13, If ye live after the flesh ye shall die, &c. The absolute necessity of holiness to salvation, is the very subject of his discourse; this necessity he positively affirms, and establishes by the most solid arguments. At the very entrance of his argument here, he takes care to settle the connexion between our calling and our love and obedience to God, on purpose to prevent that mistake into which so many have fallen, through their great inattention to the scope of his reasoning. Ver. 28. All things work together for good—To whom? To them that love God: to them that are called according to his purpose. To them that love God, because they are called according to his purpose; for those only who love God, can reap any benefit by this predestination, vocation, or any other instance of God's favour. See the observations at the end of this chapter.

Verse 31. What shall we then say to these things? What conclusion should we draw from the above premises? From all that was already laid down in the preceding chapters, but especially in the preceding verses, from ver. 28—30. inclusive. As if he had said—What comfort may we derive from these doctrines? God has called us all to holiness; and to love him, which is the principle of holiness. We are persecuted and despised, it is true, and we may be more so; but, as God has called us to love him, and all things work together for good to them that love him: and as his covenant with Abraham, while he was in his Gentile state, shows his gracious purpose towards us Gentiles, whom he has foreknown, who have been objects of his gracious foreknowledge, as well as the Jews: and who have now the fullest proof that we were so, by his sending us the Gospel; and showing us in it, that if the Israelites were to be a holy priesthood, a royal nation, we are no less favoured, as he has predestinated, from the beginning determined, that we should be conformed to the image of his Son, who is to be the first-born among many brethren: the Head and Chief of all converted Jews and Gentiles: and, in order to our final salvation, has called, invited us to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ; has justified those who do believe, and has glorified, highly honoured, and adorned them with innumerable gifts and graces; and if they continue to possess that faith which worketh by love, will bring them, both body and soul, to his eternal glory; their bodies being made like unto his glorious body. Seeing, therefore, all these things are so, what comfort in our tribulations shall we derive from them?—Why this: If God be for us, who can be against us? He, who is infinitely wise, has undertaken to direct us: He who is infinitely powerful, has undertaken to protect us: He who is infinitely good, has undertaken to save us. What cunning, strength, or malice, can prevail against his wisdom, power, and goodness? None! Therefore, we are safe who love God: and not only shall sustain no essential damage by the persecutions of ungodly men; but even these things work together for our good.

Verse 32. He that spared not his own Son] And can we, his sincere followers, doubt of the safety of our state, or the certainty of his protection? No—for if he loved us, Gentiles and Jews, so intensely, as to deliver up to death his own Son for us all, can he withhold from us any minor blessing? Nay, will he not, on the contrary, freely give us all things? For if he told Abraham, who is the father of the faithful, and representative of us all; and with whom the covenant was made, that because he had not withheld from him, his only son Isaac, but delivered him up to that death which he thought his God had required; in blessing, he would bless him; and in multiplying, he would multiply him; that his seed should possess the gate of his enemies; and that in it all the nations of the earth should be blessed, Gen. xxii. 16—18. Will we not give us all that was spiritually intended by these promises, whose only begotten Son was not sacrificed in a figure, but really; in order to purchase every blessing that the soul of man can need; and that the hand of God can dispense.

Verse 33. This, and the two following verses, contain a string of questions most appropriately introduced, and most powerfully urged; tending 34 ^c Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, ^d who is even at the right hand of God, ^e who also maketh intercession for us.

to show the safety of the state of those who have believed the Gospel of the grace of God. I shall lay these verses down as they are pointed by the best Greek critics:—

“Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?—God who justifieth? Who is he that condemneth?—Christ who died? Or rather who is risen again? He, who is at the right hand of God? He, who maketh intercession for us? Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?—Tribulation? or distress? or persecution? or famine? or nakedness? or peril? or sword?”—In all these questions the apostle intimates that, if neither God nor Christ would bring any charge against them who love him, none else could. And as God justifies, through Christ who died; consequently no charge can lie against these persons, as God alone could produce any; and He, so far from doing this, has justified, freely forgiven them their trespasses.

For the proper meaning and sense of the terms chosen, elect, called, &c. see the discourse prefixed to this epistle: and especially sect. vi. p. xix. &c. and sect. vii. p. xxiii. &c.

Verse 34. Who is even at the right hand of God] To which he has exalted our human nature, which he took in conjunction with his Divinity; and there, he maketh intercession for us: manages all the concerns of his own kingdom in general; and of every member of his church in particular.

Verse 35. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?] I do think that this question has been generally misunderstood. The apostle is referring to the persecutions and tribulations to which genuine Christians were exposed through their attachment to Christ: and the gracious provision God had made for their support and final salvation. As in this provision, God had shown his infinite love to them in providing Jesus Christ as their sin-offering; and Jesus Christ had shown his love in suffering death upon the cross for them; so here, he speaks of the love of the followers of God, to that Christ who had first loved them. Therefore, the question is not, Who shall separate the love of Christ from us? or prevent Christ from loving us? But who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Who or what shall be able to remove our affection from him? And the questions that immediately follow, show that this is the sense of the passage; for the tribulation, distress, &c. which he enumerates, are things by which they might be affected; but by which Christ could not be affected: and, consequently, the question most evidently refers to their love to him who had first loved them: and while it affords a strong presumption of their perseverance; furnishes a most powerful argument against apostacy. And that this is the meaning, is further evident from the 37th verse, leaving out the 36th, which is a parenthesis, Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Tribulation? or distress? or persecution? or famine? or nakedness? or peril? or sword? Nay: for in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us. His love in us, keeps us in all these things steadily attached to him, so that they cannot separate us from him.

Shall tribulation?] Θλιψις, grievous affliction, or distress of any kind: from θλιβω, to compress, oppress, straiten, &c. any thing by which a man is rendered miserable.

Or distress?] Στενοχωρια, a word of nearly the same import with the former; but more intense in its signification. It signifies straitness, being hemmed in on every side, without the possibility of getting out, or escaping: from στενος, strait, or narrow; and χωρος, a place.

Or persecution?] διωξις, from διωκω to pursue, press upon, prosecute: signifies such pursuing as an enemy uses, in order to overtake the object of his malice, that he may destroy him.

Or famine?] λιπας, from λιπω, to fail; the total want of bread, and all the necessaries of life.

Or nakedness?] Γυμνοτης, being absolutely without clothing; forcibly expressed by the deprivation of the word χλις μονα εχων, having one's limbs only, being totally unclothed.

Or peril?] κινδυνος, a state of extreme and continued danger, perplexing and distressing, with grievous forebodings and alarms; derived from κινω τας συνας, it excites anguish; because much evil is felt, and much more feared.

Or sword?] Μαχαιρα, slaughter; the total destruction of life; and especially beheading, and such like, done by order of the civil magistrate; for the word is used in this epistle, chap. xiii. 14. to signify the authority and power which he has of judiciously terminating life; i. e. of inflicting capital punishment.

Verse 36. As it is written] And these are no more than we may naturally expect from the present constitution of the world; and the positive predictions of the prophet, Psa. xlv. 22. who foresaw that a wicked world would always persecute and oppress the true followers of God.

than conquerors: WE abide faithful in the new covenant of our God; and HE is faithful who has promised to support and make us more than conquerors; i. e. to give us a complete triumph over sin, and death, and hell; not leaving one enemy unsubdued.

Verse 38. For I am persuaded] After the blessed experience we have had of support, by the grace and Spirit of him that loved us; that neither fear of death, nor hope of life, nor evil angels, nor principalities, nor powers, persecuting us for Christ's sake; nor the things we endure at present, nor the things to come, whatever tribulations we may be called to suffer in future.

Verse 39. Nor height of honour, nor depth of ignominy; nor any other creature, ουτε τις κτισα ουρα, (nor any other thing whatever,) shall be able to separate us, who love God, from the love of God, which he has vouchsafed to us, in Christ Jesus. See Whitby. And for further observations on the subject of the 29th and 30th verses, see at the end of the epistle.

1. The confidence expressed by the apostle, at the end of this chapter, is as rational as it is bold. On the premises laid down by him, in reference to which he has most logically conducted his whole argument, the conclusion at which he arrives, is as natural and forcible as it is legitimate. The permanency of the Christian church in all the tribulations it has endured from Pagans and Papias, is a full proof of the correctness of the apostle's reasoning. The true followers of Christ can never be forsaken by him. And his church, which is founded on the rock, can never be shaken down by the tempests of persecution. And what God does for his church, in general, (the collective body of those who believe in the Lord Jesus, love and obey him,) he does for every individual in that body; no man that trusts in him can be confounded. While the love of God is in his heart, and the work of God in his hand, he may be as fully persuaded as he is of his own being, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other thing whatsoever, shall be able to separate him from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus. The reader, who has any knowledge of what is great, commanding, and sublime in composition, will not hesitate to add here, with Dr. Taylor, "The conclusion of this chapter is the most elegant and sublime piece of writing I remember ever to have read. It is founded on the grand and solid principles of the Gospel; it breathes the true spirit of Christian magnanimity; raises our minds far above all things created; and shows, in a bright and heavenly view, the greatness of soul, and the strong consolation which the Gospel inspires. God grant, that it may stand clear before our understandings, and be transcribed into all our hearts! They who despise the Gospel, despise all that is great, and happy, and glorious!"

2. The doctrine of the necessity of personal holiness, so clearly and strongly laid down in the former part of this chapter, should be deeply considered by every person professing godliness; and while from the seventh chapter, they learn that they have an infected and morally diseased nature, they should learn from the eighth that, to destroy the work of the devil, was Jesus Christ manifested; and that no soul can be said to be saved by Jesus Christ who is not saved from its sins. What a full proof is it of the fallen state of man, that there should be found persons, professing Christianity, more fervent in their pleadings for the necessary continuance of indwelling sin, than they are for the mind that was in Christ. The seventh chapter, because there are some expressions which, being misunderstood, seem to favour this doctrine, is read and incessantly quoted: the eighth chapter, though given by the same inspiration, yet because it so strongly shows the necessity of being saved from all sin, is seldom read, and scarcely ever quoted!

3. The restoration of the brute creation to a state of happiness, has been thought by several to be the doctrine of verses 19—25. In the notes on those verses I have given reasons against this opinion; and have proved that the Gentiles, and not the irrational part of the creation, are the persons of whom the apostle speaks; nor can any consistent interpretation be given of the place, if it be applied to the brute creation. But although this doctrine is not contained in the above verses, it does not follow that the doctrine itself is not true. Indeed there are several reasons which render the supposition very probable. 1. The brute creation never sinned against God; nor are they capable of it: and, consequently, cannot be justly liable to punishment. 2. But the whole brute creation is in a state of suffering; and partake of the common infirmities and privations of life, as well as mankind: they suffer, but who can say that they suffer justly? 3. As they appear to be necessarily involved in the sufferings of sinful man; and yet neither through their fault, nor their folly; it is natural to suppose that the Judge of all the earth, who ever does right, will find some means, by which these innocent creatures shall be compensated for their sufferings. 4. That they have no compensation here, their afflictions, labours, and death, prove: and if they are to have any compensation, they must have it in another state. 5. God, the Fountain of all goodness, must have originally designed them for that measure of happiness which is suited to the powers with which he had endowed them. But, since the fall of man, they never had that happiness; and, in their present circumstances, never can. 6. As to intelligent beings, God has formed his purposes in reference to their happiness, on the ground of their rational natures. He has decreed that they shall be happy, if they will, all the means of it being placed within their power; and, if they be ultimately miserable, it is the effect of their own unconstrained choice;—Therefore, his purpose is fulfilled, either in their happiness or misery; because he has purposed that they shall be happy, if they please; and that misery shall be the result of their refusal. 7. But it does not appear that the brute creation are incapable of this choice; and it is evident that they are not placed in their present misery through either their choice or their sin: and if no purpose of God can be ultimately frustrated, these creatures must be restored to that state of happiness for which they have been made; and of which they have been deprived through the transgression of man. 8. To say, that the enjoyments which they have in this life, are a sufficient compensation, is most evidently false; for, had not sin entered into the world, they would have had much greater enjoyments, without pain, excessive labour, and toil, and without death; and all those sufferings which arise from its predisposing causes. Nor does it appear that they have much happiness from eating, drinking, and rest, as they have these only in the proportion in which they are necessary to their existence, as the slaves of men. Therefore, allowing that they have even gratification and enjoyment in life, they have much less than they would have had, had not sin entered into the world; and, consequently, they have been deprived of the greater portion of the happiness designed for them by their bountiful Creator. 9. It is therefore obvious that the gracious purpose of God has not been fulfilled in them: and that, as they have not lost their happiness through their own fault, both the beneficence and justice of God are bound to make them a reparation. 10. Hence it is reasonable to conclude, that as from the present constitution of things, they cannot have the happiness designed for them in this state, they must have it in another.

4. On the subject of the foreknowledge of God, some observations have been made at the conclusion of the notes on the 2d chapter of Acts. On the subject of the preexistence and predestination mentioned here, verses 29 and 30, vast volumes have been written, and the Christian world greatly agitated and perplexed. These doctrines of men have very little place in the texts in question. After a long and serious investigation of this business, I am led to conclude that whether the doctrine of the decrees be true or false, it does not exist in these verses.

No portion of the word of God has been more unhappily misunderstood, than several parts of the Epistle to the Romans; because men have applied to individuals, what belongs to nations; and referred to eternity, transactions which have taken place in time.

We have already seen that one grand aim of the apostle in writing this epistle, was—1. To prove, to both Jews and Gentiles, that they were all under sin, and that neither of them had any claim either on the justice or beneficence of God: yet he, of his own free mercy, had revealed himself to the Jews, and crowned them with innumerable privileges: and 2. That as he was no respecter of persons, his mercy was as free to the Gentiles as to them, being equally their God as he was the God of the Jews; and therefore had, by the Gospel, called them to a state of salvation; and to this display of his mercy, the two verses in question seem particularly to refer; and show us not what God will do for some selected individuals, but what he has already done for nations.

After having shown that the whole Gentile world was groaning and travailling in pain together, waiting for the manifestation of the sons of God; he shows us that it was according to the affectionate purpose, προβουη, of God, that the Gentiles should be also called into the glorious liberty of the sons of God; into equal privileges with the Jews. He therefore represents them as objects of God's gracious foreknowledge. That the word προγνωσκω, which literally signifies to know, or discern beforehand; and to know, so as to determine, signifies also to approve, or to love before, to be well affected to, is not only evident from yada, in Hebrew, but also from the simple verb γινωσκω, in Greek, by which it is translated; and to which the compound verb repeatedly answers, without any extension of meaning by means of the preposition, as its use among the best Greek writers proves: and it is evident that the apostle uses the word in the sense of loving, being graciously affected to, in chap. xi. 2. I say, then, hath God cast away his people, which he foreknew, or προγνω; to whom he has been so long graciously affected? By no means. As, therefore, he had been so long graciously affected towards the Jews, so has he towards the Gentiles. His call of Abraham, and the promises made to him, are the proofs of it. The Jews, thus foreknown, were called into a glorious state of salvation, and endowed with privileges the most extraordinary ever bestowed on any people; as their whole history testifies. But is God the God of the Jews only? Is he not also the God of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also, chap. iii. 29. and to prove this, is the main subject of the ninth chapter. Now, as he is the God of the Gentiles, he foreknew, had from the beginning a gracious purpose to them as well as to the Jews: and being thus graciously disposed towards them, he determined, προσποιη, from προ, before, and ποιω, to bound, define, &c. he defined, circumscribed, and determined the boundaries of this important business, from the beginning, that they also should be taken into his church, and conformed to the image of his Son; and as Jesus Christ was to be their pattern, it must be by his Gospel that they should be brought into the church, and, consequently, that bringing in, could not take place before the revelation of Christ. Having, therefore, thus foreknown, and thus predestinated them also, he called them also by the Gospel: he justified them also, on their believing; and he glorified them also, dignified them also with the same privileges, blessings, honours, and divine gifts: so that they were now, what the Jews had been before, the peculiar people of God. The apostle, therefore, speaks here not of what they should be, or of what they might be, but of what they then were: the called, the justified, the highly honoured of God.—See the Note on ver. 30.

It is strange that so obvious a meaning of the passage should not have been noticed; but the word δοξαζω, which we render to glorify, and by which we understand eternal beatification, which it is very seldom used to express, being taken in this sense, in the passage in question, fixed the meaning of the preceding terms; and thus the whole passage was applied to things eternal, which had reference only to things in time. This seems to me to be the true key of the passage; and the whole scope of the epistle, and especially of the context, shows, that this is the sense in which it should be understood. The passages understood in this way, illustrate the infinite mercy and wisdom of God; they show that whatever appearances his providential dealings may assume of partiality towards any particular people, yet he is equally the Father of the spirits of all flesh; hateth nothing that he hath made; is loving to all: that his tender mercies are over all his works; and that he is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come unto the knowledge of the truth, and be saved. Hence, whatever he did for the Jews, he purposed to do for the Gentiles: if he foreknew, predestinated, called, justified, and glorified the former; he also foreknew, predestinated, called, justified, and glorified the latter; having brought them into the same state of salvation, with a vast extension of blessings and higher degrees of honour. As the Jews forfeited their privileges, and now, instead of being glorified, instead of being highly honoured, and rendered illustrious, they are degraded, brought down, and rendered contemptible: because they have not made a proper use of their election, they are now reprobated: so a similar reverse awaits the Gentiles if they sin after the similitude of their transgression; and it is against this that the apostle so solemnly warns them, chap. xi. 17—22. Because of unbelief, they (the Jews) were broken off—thou (the Gentiles) standest by faith.—If God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he also spare not thee. Behold the goodness and severity of God! on them which fell, severity; but towards thee, goodness, if thou continue in his goodness; otherwise, thou also shall be cut off.

5. This is also a lesson of solemn instruction to Christians in general: God has called them into a glorious state of salvation; and has furnished them with every requisite help to enable them to work out that salvation with fear and trembling. As it is an awful thing to receive the grace of God in vain, (whether that grace imply the common benefits of the Gospel, or those especial blessings received by believing souls;) so every person professing godliness, should be jealous over himself, lest he should trifle with matters of eternal moment; for, should he even neglect so great a salvation, his escape would be impossible; Heb. ii. 3. and if so, to what severe punishment must they be exposed, who despise and reject it?

CHAPTER IX.

Paul expresses his great sorrow for the unbelief and obstinacy of the Jews, 1—3. Whose high privileges he enumerates, 4, 5. Points out the manner in which God has chosen to communicate the knowledge of his name, to both Jews and Gentiles; and how he deals, whether in judgment or mercy, with individuals; and produces the cases of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Esau, and Pharaoh, 6—17. God shows mercy and judgment as he thinks proper, and none has a right to find fault with his proceedings, 18—20. He has the same power over the human race as the potter has over the clay, 21—23. The prophets predicted the calling of the Gentiles, and the rejection of the Jews, 24—29. The Gentiles have attained to the knowledge of God's method of saving sinners; while the Jews have not attained this knowledge, 30, 31. The reason why the Jews have not attained the salvation provided for them in the Gospel, 32, 33.

NOTES ON CHAP. IX.

To this and the tenth chapter, Dr. Taylor has prefixed the following judicious summary:—

The apostle having largely proved, in the preceding chapters, that the grace of God extends to the Gentiles, as well as to the Jews; and that the dispensation of God's mercy was absolutely, and in itself, free to all who believe, whether Jews or Gentiles, in opposition to the merit of any works, or of conformity to any law whatever; and that the Gentiles have, by faith, a good title to the blessings of God's covenant; to which blessings the Jews cannot have a title any other way. Hitherto the apostle has not considered the Jews as rejected, except in an indirect way; but that they had the possibility of continuing in the church, from entering into which they should not attempt to prevent the Gentiles, but allow them to be sharers in the mercies of God:—and hence his language is in sum this: Why may not believing Gentiles be admitted, pardoned, and saved, as well as you?

But in this chapter, and the two following, the apostle considers the reception of the Gentiles into the kingdom and covenant of God, under the notion of calling or invitation, and of election or choice: which shows that he views the two parties in a light different to that in which he had before placed them. The Gentiles he considers as invited into the kingdom of God, and as chosen to be his people; and the Jews, he considers as left out and rejected; for, as the main body of them had now rejected the Gospel of Christ, he saw that God was about to unchurch them, overturn their polity, destroy their temple, and disperse them over the face of the earth. Thus, he knew they would be accused, or anathematized from Christ, and reduced to a level with the heathen nations of the world. And the event has proved that his declarations were dictated by the Spirit of truth.

that he himself were accused from Christ for them, or to prevent them from being accused from Christ; (ix. 3.) till he comes to chap. xi. where he has much to say in their favour, even considered, as at present, rejected. But it is very evident that his arguments, in this chapter, rest on the supposition that the main body of the Jewish nation would be cast out of the visible kingdom of God; and it is for this reason, that in this, and the two following chapters, he considers the reception of any people into the kingdom and covenant of God under the relative notion of inviting and choosing; or of calling and election. The Jews were rejected and reprobated: the Gentiles were chosen and called, or elect. As this is most obviously the apostle's meaning, it is strange that any should apply his doctrine to the particular and unconditional reprobation and election of individuals.

It is upon this rejection of the Jews, that the calling and election of the Gentiles rest. If the Jews be not rejected, but are still the visible church and kingdom of God; then, the Gentiles, according to the most proper inference from the apostle's doctrine, have no right to the blessings of the kingdom. Instead of being invited or called, they are intruders at the heavenly feast; and this, the unbelieving Jews laboured to prove, and thus unhinge the believing Gentiles, by persuading them that they were not duly taken into the church of God; that the Jews were, and ever must continue to be the only church and kingdom of God; and that they could not be cast off, so long as God was faithful to his promise to Abraham; and that the Gentiles were most miserably deceived, when they supposed they were brought into that kingdom by faith in Christ; whereas, there was no way of entering it, or of being entitled to its privileges, but by submitting to the law of Moses. This being the fixed opinion of the Jews, and the ground on which they opposed the Gentiles, and endeavoured to sap the foundation of their hope of salvation from the Gospel of Christ; it was therefore a matter of the utmost importance to be able to prove, that the Jews, by rejecting Christ and his Gospel, were themselves cast out of the church; and this, in a way perfectly consistent with the truth of the promise made to Abraham. He had slightly touched on this subject at the beginning of the third chapter; but it would have broken in too much on the thread of his discourse, to have pursued the argument there, for which reason he appears to have reserved it to this place; where he (1.) Solemnly declares, his tenderest affection for his countrymen, and his real grief of heart, for their infidelity, and consequent rejection, ver. 1—6. (2.) Answers objections against this rejection, ver. 6—23. (3.) Proves the calling of the Gentiles, from their own Scriptures, ver. 24—30. (4.) Gives the true state and reasons of the rejection of the Jews, and the calling of the Gentiles, ver. 30. to ver. 14. of chap. x. (5.) Proves the necessity of the apostolic mission to the Gentiles, in order to their salvation, chap. x. 14. to the end.

And all this was intended, at once, to vindicate the divine dispensations, (to convince the infidel Jew, to satisfy the believing Gentile that his calling or invitation into the church of God was valid; to arm him against the cavils and objections of the unbelieving Jew, and to dispose the Christian Jew to receive and own the believing Gentile as a member of the family and kingdom of God, by a divine right equal to any to which he himself could pretend.

Verse 1. I say the truth in Christ, I lie not] This is one of the most solemn oaths any man can possibly take. He appeals to Christ as the Searcher of hearts, that he tells the truth; asserts that his conscience was free from all guile in this matter, and that the Holy Ghost bore him testimony that what he said was true. Hence, we find that the testimony of a man's own conscience, and the testimony of the Holy Ghost, are two distinct things, and, that the apostle had both, at the same time.

As the apostle had still remaining a very awful part of his commission to execute, namely, to declare to the Jews not only that God had chosen the Gentiles, but had rejected them, because they had rejected Christ and his Gospel; it was necessary that he should assure them, that however he had been persecuted by them, because he had embraced the Gospel, yet, it was so far from being a gratification to him that they had now fallen under the displeasure of God, that it was a subject of continual distress to his mind; and that it produced in him great howness and continual sorrow.

Verse 3. For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ] This, and the two preceding verses, are thus paraphrased by Dr. Taylor. I am so far from insisting on the doctrine of the rejection of the Jews) out of any ill-will to my countrymen, that I solemnly declare, in the sincerity of my heart, without the least fiction or dissimulation, and herein I have the testimony of my own conscience, enlightened and directed by the Spirit of God, that I am so far from taking pleasure in the rejection of the Jewish nation, that, contrariwise, it gives me continual pain and uneasiness, insomuch that as Moses formerly, when God proposed to cut them off, and in their stead to make him a great nation, Exod. xxxii. 10. begged that he himself should rather die than that the children of Israel should be destroyed, ver. 32. So, I could even wish that the exclusion from the visible church, which will happen to the Jewish nation, might fall to my own share; if hereby they might be kept in it. And to this I am inclined by natural affection, for the Jews are my dear brethren and kindred.

Very few passages in the New Testament have puzzled critics and commentators more than this. Every person saw the perfect absurdity of understanding it in a literal sense; as no man in his right mind could wish himself eternally damned in order to save another; or to save even the whole world. And the supposition that such an effect could be produced by such a sacrifice was equally absurd and monstrous. Therefore various translations have been made of the place, and different solutions offered. Mr. Wakefield says, I see no method of solving the difficulty in this verse, which has so exercised the learning and ingenuity of commentators, but by the αχρημα ως of Homer, I profess myself to be; and he translates the passage in a parenthesis, thus, (for I also was once an alien from Christ) on account of my brethren, &c. But how it does appear that Saul of Tarsus was ever an alien from Christ on account of his kinsmen, is to me perfectly indiscernible. Let us examine the Greek text. Νυχρημα γαρ αυτος ην αναθημα ως απο του Χριστου υπη τον αδελφον μου, "For I did wish myself to be an anathema from Christ, (was, by Christ, as some ancient MSS. read,) for my brethren." As αχρημα is the first per. sing. of the imperfect tense, some have been led to think that St. Paul is here mentioning what had passed through his own mind, when, filled with the love of God, he learned the rejection of the Jews; and that he only mentions it here as a thing which, in the effusions of his loving zeal, had been felt by him inconsiderately, and without any divine afflatus leading him to it; but that he does not intimate that now, he felt any such unreasonable and preposterous wish. I am afraid this is but ill calculated to solve the difficulty.

The Greek word αναθημα, anathema, properly signifies any thing devoted to God, so as to be destroyed: it answers to the Hebrew חרם cherem, by which the Septuagint translate it; and means either a thing or person separated from its former state or condition, and devoted to destruction. In this sense it is used Deut. vii. 25, 26. Josh. vi.

17, 18; vii. 12. This is the key to the whole passage.

It is certain that the word, both among the Hebrews and Greeks, was used to express a person devoted to destruction for the public safety. In Midrash hanneclam, in Sohar Chadash, fol. 15. Rabbi Chaiyah the elder said, "There is no shepherd found like unto Moses, who was willing to lay down his life for the sheep; for Moses said, Exod. xxxii. 32, 'If thou wilt not pardon their sin, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written.'" Such anathemas, or persons devoted to destruction for the public good, were common among all ancient nations. See the case of M. Curtius and Decius among the Romans. When a plague took place, or any public calamity, it was customary to take one of the lowest or most execrable of the people, and devote him to Dii Mares, or infernal gods. See proofs in Schleuser, and see the observations at the end of the chapter. This one circumstance is sufficient to explain the word in this place. Paul desired to be devoted to destruction, as the Jews then were, in order to redeem his countrymen from this most terrible excision. He was willing to become a sacrifice for the public safety, and to give his life to redeem theirs. And as Christ may be considered as devoting them to destruction, see Matt. xxiv. Paul is willing that in their place Christ should devote him, for I could wish myself, arabas was ara, (or, as some excellent MSS. have it, ara) ra Xpistw; to be devoted BY Christ, to that temporal destruction to which he has adjudged the disobedient Jews, if by doing so I might redeem them. This, and this alone, seems to be the meaning of the apostle's wish.

Verse 4. Who are Israelites] Descendants of Jacob, a man so highly favoured of God, and from whom he received his name Israel, a prince of God, Gen. xxxii. 28. from which name his descendants were called Israelites, and separated unto God for his glory and praise. Their very name of Israelites implied their very high dignity; they were a royal nation; princes of the most high God.

The adoption] The Israelites were all taken into the family of God, and were called his sons and first-born, Exod. iv. 22. Deut. xiv. 1. Jer. xxxi. 9. Hos. xi. 1. And this adoption took place when God made the covenant with them at Horeb.

The glory] The manifestation of God among them; principally by the cloud and pillar, and the Shekinah, or divine presence, appearing between the cherubim over the mercy-seat. These were peculiar to the Jews; no other nation was ever thus favoured.

The covenants] The covenants made with Abraham, both that which relates to the spiritual seed, and that which was peculiar to his natural descendants, Gal. iii. 16, 17. which covenants were afterward renewed by Moses, Deut. xxix. 1. Some suppose that the singular is here put for the plural, and that by covenants we are to understand the decalogue which is termed ברית berith, or covenant, Deut. iv. 13. But it is more likely that the apostle alludes to the great covenant made with Abraham, and to its various renewals and extensions at different times afterward; as well as to its twofold design, the grant of the land of Canaan, and the rest that remains for the people of God.

The giving of the law] The revelation of God, by God himself; containing a system of moral and political precepts. This was also peculiar to the Jews; for to no other nation had he ever given a revelation of his will.

The service] Λατρεία. The particular ordinances, rites, and ceremonies of their religious worship; and especially the sacrificial system, so expressive of the sinfulness of sin, and the holiness of God.

The promises] The land of Canaan, and the blessing of the Messiah and his kingdom; which promises had been made and often repeated to the patriarchs and to the prophets.

Verse 5. Whose are the fathers] Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, the twelve patriarchs, Moses, Joshua, Samuel, David, &c. &c. without controversy, the greatest and most eminent men that ever flourished under heaven. From these, in an uninterrupted and unpolled line, the Jewish people had descended; and it was no small glory to be able to reckon, in their genealogy, persons of such incomparable merit and excellency.

And of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came] These ancestors were the more renowned, as being the progenitors of the human nature of the MESSIAH. Christ, the Messiah, zara sarasa, according to the flesh, sprang from them. But this Messiah was more than man, he is God over all: the very Being who gave them being, though he appeared to receive a being from them.

Here the apostle most distinctly points out the twofold nature of our Lord, his eternal Godhead, and his humanity; and all the transpositions of particles, and alterations of points in the universe, will not explain away this doctrine. As this verse contains such an eminent proof of the Deity of Christ, no wonder that the opposers of his Divinity should strive, with their utmost skill and cunning, to destroy its force. And it must be truly painful to a mind that has nothing in view but truth, to see the mean and hypercritical methods used to elude the force of this text. Few have met it in that honest and manly way in which Dr. Taylor, who was a conscientious Arian, has considered the subject. "Christ," says he, "is God over all, as he is by the Father appointed Lord, King, and Governor of all. The Father hath committed all judgment to the Son, John v. 22. has given all things into his hands, Matt. xxviii. 18. He is Lord of all, Acts x. 36. God has given him a name above every name, Phil. ii. 9. Above every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come; and has put all things (himself excepted, 1 Cor. xv. 27.) under his feet, and given him to be Head over all things, Eph. i. 21, 22. This is our Lord's supreme Godhead. And that he is ωκεανος, blessed for ever, or the object of everlasting blessings, is evident from Rev. v. 12, 13, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power—and blessing and honour be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever. Thus it appears, the words may be justly applied to our blessed Lord.⁷

Notes, p. 329. Yes, and when we take other scriptures into the account, where his essential Godhead is particularly expressed, such as Colos. i. 16, 17, For, by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers; all things were created by him, and for him; and he is before all things, and by him do all things consist; we shall find that he is not God by investiture or office, but properly and essentially such; for, it is impossible to convey in human language, to human apprehension, a more complete and finished display of what is essential to Godhead, indivisible from it, and incommunicable to any created nature, than what is contained in the above verses. And while these words are allowed to make a part of divine revelation, the essential Godhead of Jesus Christ will continue to be a doctrine of that revelation.

I pass by the groundless and endless conjectures about reversing some of the particles, and placing points in different positions, as they have been all invented to get rid of the doctrine of Christ's divinity, which is so obviously acknowledged by the simple text: it is enough to state that there is no omission of these important words in any MS. or Version yet discovered.

Verse 6. Not as though the word of God hath taken none effect] A Jew might have objected, as in chap. iii. 3. "Is not God bound by his faithfulness to continue the Jews as his peculiar church and people, notwithstanding the infidelity of the major part of them? If they are brought to a level with the Gentiles, will it not follow that God hath failed in the performance of his promise to Abraham, Gen. xvii. 7, 8, I will establish my covenant between me and thee, for an everlasting covenant; to be a God unto thee, and thy seed after thee." To which it may be answered, this awful dispensation of God towards the Jews is not inconsistent with the veracity of the divine promise; for even the whole body of natural born Jews are not the whole of the Israelites comprehended in the promise. Abraham is the father of many nations; and his seed is not only that which is of the law, but that also which is of the faith of Abraham, chap. iv. 16, 17. The Gentiles were included in the Abrahamic covenant as well as the Jews; and, therefore, have no exclusive right to the blessings of God's kingdom.

Verse 7. Neither because they are the seed of Abraham, &c.] Nor can they conclude, because they are the natural descendants of Abraham, that therefore they are all of them, without exception, the children, in whom the promise is to be fulfilled.

But, in Isaac shall thy seed be called.] The promise is not confined to immediate natural descent, but may be accomplished in any part of Abraham's posterity. For Abraham had several sons besides Isaac, Gen. xxv. 1, 2, particularly Ishmael, who was circumcised before Isaac was born; and in whom Abraham was desirous that the promise should be fulfilled, Gen. xvii. 18. and in him God might have fulfilled the promise had he so pleased; and yet he said to Abraham, Gen. xxi. 12. not in Ishmael, but in Isaac shall thy seed be called.

Verse 8. That is, they which are the children of the flesh] Whence it appears that not the children who descend from Abraham's loins, nor those who were circumcised as he was, nor even those whom he might expect and desire, are therefore the church and people of God; but those who are made children by the good pleasure and promise of God, as Isaac was, are alone to be accounted for the seed with whom the covenant was established.

Verse 9. For this is the word of promise, &c.] That is, this is evidently implied in the promise recorded Gen. xviii. 10, At this time I will come, saith God, and exert my divine power, and Sarah, though fourscore and ten years old, shall have a son; which shows that it is the sovereign will and act of God alone which singles out and constitutes the peculiar seed that was to inherit the promise made to Abraham.

It should be considered that the apostle in this and the following quotations, does not give us the whole of the text, which he intends should be taken into his argument, but only a hint or reference to the passages to which they belong: directing us to recollect or peruse the whole passage, and there view and judge of the argument.

That he is so to be understood, appears from the conclusion he draws, ver. 16. So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy. In his arguments, ver. 7 and 8, &c. he says not one word of Abraham's willing Ishmael to be the seed in whom the promise might be fulfilled; nor of Isaac's willing Esau; nor of Moses' willing and interceding that the Israelites might be spared: nor of Esau's running for venison; but by introducing these particulars into his conclusion, he gives us to understand that his quotations are to be taken in connexion with the whole story of which they are a part: and without this the apostle's meaning cannot be apprehended.

The same may be said of his conclusion, ver. 18. whom he will he hardeneth; hardeneth is not in his argument, but it is in the conclusion. Therefore hardening is understood in the argument, and he evidently refers to the case of Pharaoh. The generality of Jews were well acquainted with the Scripture, and a hint was sufficient to revive the memory of a whole passage.—Taylor, p. 330.

Verse 10. And not only this] A Jew might object, "Ishmael was rejected, not by the sovereign will of God, but because he was the son of the handmaid or bond-woman, and therefore unworthy to be the peculiar seed. But observe, this was not the only limitation of the seed of Abraham with regard to inheriting the promise; for, when Rebecca was with child by that one person of Abraham's issue, to whom the promise was made, namely, our father Isaac; she went to inquire of the Lord, Gen. xxv. 22, 23, And the Lord said unto her, Two nations are in thy womb; and two manner of people shall be separated from thy bowels: and one people shall be stronger than the other people; and the elder shall serve the younger. That is, the posterity of the younger, shall be a nation much more prosperous and happy than the posterity of the elder.

Verse 11. For the children being not yet born] As the word children is not in the text, the word nations would be more proper; for it is of nations that the apostle speaks, as the following verses show, as well as the history to which he refers.

Neither having done any good] To merit the distinction of being made the peculiar people of God.—Nor evil, to deserve to be left out of this covenant, and the distinguishing national blessings which it conferred; that the purpose of God according to election might stand, that such distinctions might appear to depend on nothing but God's free choice, not of works, or any desert in the peoples or nations thus chosen; but of the mere purpose of him who calleth any people he pleases, to make them the depositories of his especial blessings, and thus to distinguish them from all others.

Verse 12. The elder shall serve the younger.] These words, with those of Malachi, Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated, are cited by the apostle to prove, according to their typical signification, that the purpose of God, according to election, does, and will stand, not of works, but of him that calleth; that is, that the purpose of God, which is the ground of that election which he makes among men, unto the honour of being Abraham's seed, might appear to remain unchangeable in him; and to be even the same which he had declared unto Abraham. That these words are used in a national, and not in a personal sense, is evident from this, that, taken in the latter sense, they are not true, for Jacob never did exercise any power over Esau; nor was Esau ever subject to him. Jacob, on the contrary, was rather subject to Esau, and was sorely afraid of him; and, first by his messengers, and afterward personally, acknowledged his brother to be his lord, and himself to be his servant, see Gen. xxxii. 4. xxxiii. 8, 13. And hence it appears, that neither Esau, nor Jacob, nor even their posterities, are brought here by the apostle as instances of any personal reprobation for eternity. For it is very certain that very many, if not far the greatest part of Jacob's posterity, were wicked, and rejected by God; and it is not less certain, that some of Esau's posterity were partakers of the faith of their father Abraham.

From these premises, the true sense of the words immediately following, Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated, Malachi i. 2, 3, fully appears: that is, that what he had already cited from Moses concerning the two nations, styled by the names of their respective heads, Jacob and Esau; was but the same in substance with what was spoken many years after by the prophet Malachi. The unthankful Jews had, in Malachi's time, either in words, or in their hearts, expostulated with God, and demanded of him wherein he had loved them? "I have loved you, saith the Lord; yet ye say, Wherein hast thou loved us?" Mal. i. 2, 3, 4. To this, the Lord answers, "Was not Esau Jacob's brother? Yet I loved Jacob, and hated Esau, and laid his mountains and his heritage waste for the dragons of the wilderness. Whereas Edom saith, We are impoverished, but we will return and build the desolate places: thus saith the Lord of hosts, They shall build, but I will throw down, and they shall call them The border of wickedness, and The people against whom the Lord hath indignation for ever. And your eyes shall see, and ye shall say, The Lord will be magnified from the border of Israel.^a

1. It uncontestedly appears from these passages, that the prophet does not speak at all of the person of Jacob or Esau, but of their respective posterities. For it was not Esau in person that said, We are impoverished; neither were his mountains nor heritage laid waste. Now, if the prophet speaks neither of the person of the one, nor of the person of the other, but of their posterity only, then it is evident that the apostle speaks of them in the same way.

2. If neither the prophet nor the apostle speaks of the persons of Jacob or Esau, but of their posterity, then it is evident that neither the love of God to Jacob, nor the hatred of God to Esau, were such, according to which the eternal states of men either in happiness or misery, are to be determined; nor is there here any scriptural or rational ground for the decree of unconditional personal election and reprobation which comparatively modern times have endeavoured to build on these scriptures. For, 1. It is here proved, that Esau is not mentioned under any personal consideration, but only as the head of his posterity. 2. The testimony of Scripture amply proves that all Esau's posterity were not, even in this sense, reprobated; nor all Jacob's posterity elected. 3. Neither does that service, or subjugation to Jacob, which the Divine Oracle imposed on Esau, import any such reprobation as some contend for; as the servant may be elected, while the master himself is in a state of reprobation. 4. Were it even granted that servitude did import such a reprobation, yet it is certain that Esau, in person, never did serve Jacob. 5. Nor does the hatred of God against Esau, import any such reprobation of the person of Esau, because it is demonstrable, that it related not to Esau personally, but to his posterity. 6. The scope of the apostle's reasoning is to show that God is the Sovereign of his own ways, has a right to dispense his blessings as he chooses; and to give salvation to mankind, not in the ways of their devising, but in that way that is most suitable to his infinite wisdom and goodness.

Therefore—1. He chose the Jewish people from all others, and revealed himself to them. Thus they were the elect, and all the nations of mankind reprobate. 2. When the fulness of the time came, he revealed himself also to the Gentiles, who gladly received the Gospel; and the Jews rejecting it, were cast off. Thus the elect became reprobate; and the reprobate, elect. 3. He published to mankind, that the pardon of sin could and should be obtained ONLY by faith in his Son Jesus; and not by any obedience to any law. And the Jews, the descendants of Jacob, who rejected this way of salvation, became precisely like the Edomites, the descendants of Esau; they builded, but God pulled down; their mountains and heritage are now laid waste for the dragons of the wilderness; and they properly may now be called, The border of wickedness; a people against whom the Lord hath indignation for ever: they have rejected the Lord that bought them; and so have brought upon themselves swift destruction. 7. That no personal, absolute, eternal reprobation of Esau can have been intended, we learn from this; that he was most amply reconciled to his brother, who had so deeply wronged and offended him, by depriving him of his birthright and his blessing; and his having forgiven his brother his trespasses, was no mean proof that God had forgiven him. See our Lord's words, Matt. vi. 14. Therefore, there can be assigned no competent ground of his damnation, much less of his personal reprobation from all eternity. 8. And were such a personal reprobation intended, is it not shocking to suppose, that the God of endless mercy, in whose sight his pious parents had found favour, should inform them, even before their child was born, that he had absolutely consigned him, by an irrevocable decree, to eternal damnation? A message of such horrid import, coming immediately from the mouth of God, to a tender, weak, and delicate woman, whose hour of travail with two children was just at hand, could not have failed to produce abortion, and destroy her life. But the parents perfectly understood their God, and saw no decree of reprobation in his message; two manner of nations are in thy womb—and the elder shall serve the younger. 9. There is no reason worthy the most wise and gracious God, why he should make known to the world such a thing concerning Esau, who was yet unborn, that he had reprobated him from all eternity. Such a revelation could be of no spiritual advantage, or of edification to mankind, but rather of a malignant influence, as directly occasioning men to judge hardly of their Maker, and to conceive of him as no faithful Creator; as having no care, no love, no bowels of compassion towards the workmanship of his own hands. See Goodwin's Exposition: and see my Notes on Gen. xxvii. Verse 14. What shall we say then? To what conclusions shall we come on the facts before us? Shall we suggest that God's bestowing peculiar privileges in this unequal manner, on those who otherwise are in equal circumstances, is inconsistent with justice, and equity? By no means. Whatever God does is right, and he may dispense his blessings to whom, and on what terms he pleases.

Verse 15. For he saith to Moses, I will have mercy, &c.] The words of God to Moses, Exod. xxxiii. 19. show, that God has a right to dispense his blessings as he pleases; for, after he had declared that he would spare the Jews of old, and continue them in the relation of his peculiar people, when they had deserved to have been cut off for their idolatry; he said, I will make all my goodness pass before thee; and I will proclaim the name of the Lord before thee; and I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy; and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. As if he had said, I will make such a display of my perfections as shall convince you that my nature is kind and beneficent: but know that I am a debtor to none of my creatures. My benefits and blessings are merely from my own good will: nor can any people, much less a rebellious people, challenge them as their due in justice or equity. And, therefore, I now spare the Jews; not because either you, who intercede for them, or they themselves, have any claim upon my favour; but, of my own free and sovereign grace, I choose to show them mercy and compassion. I will give my salvation in my own way, and on my own terms. He that believeth on my Son Jesus, shall be saved: and he that believeth not, shall be damned. This is God's ultimate design; this purpose he will never change; and this he has fully declared in the everlasting Gospel.

Verse 16. So then, it is not of him that willeth, &c.] I conclude, therefore, from these several instances, that the making or continuing any body of men, the peculiar people of God, is righteously determined; not by the judgment, hopes, or wishes of men; but by the will and wisdom of God alone. For Abraham judged that the blessing ought, and he willed, desired, that it might be given to Ishmael; and Isaac also willed, designed it for his first-born, Esau: and Esau wishing and hoping that it might be his, readily went, ran a hunting for venison, that he might have it regularly conveyed to him: but they were all disappointed: Abraham and Isaac, who willed, and Esau who ran; for God had originally intended that the blessing of being a great nation, and distinguished people, should, of his mere good pleasure, be given to Isaac and Jacob, and be confirmed in their posterity; and to them it was given. And when, by their apostacy, they had forfeited this privilege, it was not Moses' willing, nor any prior obligation God was under, but his own sovereign mercy, which continued it to them.

Verse 17. For the Scripture saith unto Pharaoh] Instead of showing the Israelites mercy, He might justly have suffered them to have gone on in sin, till He should have signalized His wisdom and justice in their destruction; as appears from what God in his word declares concerning his dealings with Pharaoh and the Egyptians, Exod. ix. 15, 16. For now, saith the Lord, I had stretched forth my hand, (in the plague of boils and blains,) and I had smitten thee and thy people with the pestilence; and thou hadst, (by this plague) been cut off from the earth, (as thy cattle were by the murrain,) but in very deed, for this cause have I raised thee up. I have restored thee to health, by removing the boils and blains, and by respiting thy deserved destruction to a longer day, that I may, in thy instance, give such a demonstration of my power, in thy final overthrow, that all mankind may learn that I am God, the righteous Judge of all the earth, the Avenger of wickedness. See this translation of the original vindicated in my notes on Exod. ix. 15, 16. And about the hardening of Pharaoh, see the notes on those places where the words occur in the same book.

Verse 18. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will] This is the apostle's conclusion from the facts already laid down: that God, according to his own will and wisdom, in perfect righteousness bestows mercy; that is to say, his blessings upon one part of mankind, (the Jews of old, and the Gentiles of the present time;) while he suffers another part, (the Egyptians of old, and the Jews of the present day,) to go on in the abuse of his goodness and forbearance, hardening themselves in sin, till he brings upon them, a most just and exemplary punishment.

Verse 19. Why doth he yet find fault] The apostle here introduces the Jew making an objection similar to that in chap. iii. 7. If the truth of God hath more abounded through my sin unto his glory, that is, if God's faithfulness is glorified by my wickedness, why yet am I also judged as a sinner? Why am I condemned for that which brings so much glory to him? The question here is, if God's glory be so highly promoted and manifested by our obstinacy, and he suffers us to proceed in our hardness and infi- delity, why does he find fault with us? or punish us for that which is according to his good pleasure.

Verse 20. Nay but, O man, who art thou? As if he had said—weak, ignorant man, darest thou retort on the infinitely good and righteous God?
Reflect on thyself; and tell me, after thou hast abused the grace of God, and transgressed his laws, wilt thou cavil at his dispensations? God hath made, created, formed, the Jewish nation:
and shall the thing formed, when it hath corrupted itself, pretend to correct the wise and gracious Author of its being; and say, Why hast thou made me thus? Why hast thou constituted me in this manner? Thou hast done me wrong in giving me my being under such and such conditions.

Old John Goodwin's note on this passage is at least curious: "I scarce, (says he,) know any passage of the Scripture more frequently abused than this. When men, in the great questions of predestination and reprobation, bring forth any text of Scripture, which they conceive makes for their notion; though the sense which they put upon it be ever so uncouth and dissonant from the true meaning of the Holy Ghost; yet if any man contradict, they frequently fall upon him with Nay but, O man, who art thou?
As if St. Paul had left them his heirs and successors in the infallibility of his spirit! But, when men shall call a solid answer to their groundless conceits, about the meaning of the Scriptures, a replying against God; it savours more of the Spirit who was seen falling like lightning from heaven, than of His who saw him in this his fall."

Verse 21. Hath not the potter power over the clay? The apostle continues his answer to the Jew—Hath not God shown, by the parable of the potter, Jerem. xviii. 1, &c. that he may justly dispose of nations, and of the Jews in particular; according as he, in his infinite wisdom, may judge most right and fitting; even as the potter has a right, out of the same lump of clay, to make one vessel to a more honourable, and another to a less honourable use; as his own judgment and skill may direct; for no potter will take pains to make a vessel merely that he may show that he has power to dash it to pieces.
For the word came to Jeremiah from the Lord, saying, Arise, go down to the potter's house, and there I will cause thee to hear my words. Then I went down to the potter's house, and behold he wrought a work upon the wheels. And the vessel that he made of clay, was marred in the hands of the potter: so he made it again another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to make it. It was not fit for the more honourable place in the one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour?

22 *What if God, willing to show his wrath, and to make his long-suffering the vessels of wrath,

'fitted' to destruction:*

Prov. 16. 4. Jer. 18. 6. Wisd. 15. 7.—42 Tim. 2. 20.

mansion; and, therefore, he made it for a less honourable place; but as necessary for the master's use there, as it could have been in a more honourable situation. Then the word of the Lord came to me, saying, O house of Israel, cannot I do with you as this potter? Behold, as the clay is in the potter's hand, so are ye in my hand, O house of Israel. At what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to pluck up, and to pull down, and to destroy it; if that nation against whom I have pronounced, turns from their evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them. And at what instant I shall speak concerning a nation—to build and to plant it, if it do evil in my sight, that it obey not my voice, then I will repent of the good wherewith I said I would benefit them.
The reference to this parable shows, most positively, that the apostle is speaking of men not individually, but nationally; and it is strange that men should have given his words any other application, with this scripture before their eyes.

Verse 22. What if God, willing to show his wrath? The apostle refers here to the case of Pharaoh, and the Egyptians; and to which he applies Jeremiah's parable of the potter: and, from them, to the then state of the Jews. Pharaoh and the Egyptians were vessels of wrath, persons deeply guilty before God; and, by their obstinate refusal of his grace, and abuse of his goodness, they had fitted themselves for that destruction which the wrath, the vindictive justice of God, inflicted; after he had endured their obstinate rebellion, with much long-suffering:
which is a most absolute proof, that the hardening of their hearts, and their ultimate punishment, were the consequences of their obstinate refusal of his grace, and abuse of his goodness; as the history in Exodus sufficiently shows. As the Jews of the apostle's time had sinned, after the similitude of the Egyptians, hardening their hearts and abusing his goodness, after every display of his long-suffering kindness, being now fitted for destruction, they were ripe for punishment; and that power, which God was making known for their salvation, having been so long and so much abused and provoked, was now about to show itself in their destruction as a nation. But, even in this case, there is not a word of their final damnation; much less that either they, or any others, were, by a sovereign decree, reprobated from all eternity; and that their very sins, the proximate cause of their punishment, were the necessary effect of that decree, which had, from all eternity, doomed them to endless torments. As such a doctrine

Which he had afore prepared unto glory.] The Jews were fitted for destruction long before; but the fittest time to destroy them was after he had prepared the believing Gentiles unto glory. For, the rod of the Messiah's strength was to be sent out of Zion, Psal. cx. 2. The Jewish nation was to supply the first preachers of the Gospel; and from Jerusalem their sound was to go forth into all the earth. Therefore, the Jewish state, notwithstanding its corruptions, was to be preserved till the Messiah came; and even till the Gospel preached by the apostles had taken deep root in the Gentile world. Another thing which rendered the time, when the Jewish polity was overthrown, the most proper, was this, because then, the immediate occasion of it was the extensiveness of the divine grace. They would not have the Gentiles admitted into the church of God; but contradicted and blasphemed, and rejected the Lord that bought them: thus then, the extensiveness of the divine grace occasioned their infidelity, ver. 33. chap. x. 3. xii. 11, 12, 15, 23, 30. Thus the Jews were diminished, by that abundance of grace which has enriched the Gentiles. And so the grace of God was illustrated; or, so God made known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy—the apostles and primitive believers among the Jews, and the Gentile world, which received the Gospel by the preaching of the apostles and their successors.

Verse 24. Even us, whom he hath called] All the Jews and Gentiles who have been invited by the preaching of the Gospel to receive justification by faith in our Lord Jesus Christ; and have come to the Gospel feast on this invitation.

Verse 25. As he saith also in Osee] It is a cause of not a little confusion, that a uniformity in the orthography of the proper names of the Old and New Testaments has not been preserved. What stranger to our sacred books would suppose that the Osee above, meant the prophet Hosea? from whom, chap. ii. ver. 23.

this quotation is taken; I will have mercy on her that had not obtained mercy; and I will say to them which were not my people, Thou art my people. The apostle shows that this calling of the Gentiles was no fortuitous thing, but a firm purpose in the Divine mind, which he had largely revealed to the prophets; and by opposing the calling of the Gentiles, the Jews, in effect, renounced their prophets, and fought against God.

Verse 26. And it shall come to pass, &c.] These quotations are taken out of Hosea, chap. i. 10. where (immediately after God had rejected the ten tribes, or kingdom of Israel, chap. i. 9. then saith God, call his name Lo-ammi; for ye are not my people, and I will not be your God;) he adds, yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea which cannot be measured nor numbered: and it shall come to pass, that in the place in which it was said unto them, Ye are not my people; there, it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God. As if he had said, The decrease of numbers in the church, by God's utterly taking away the ten tribes, ver. 6. shall be well supplied by what shall afterward come to pass by calling the Gentiles into it. They, the rejected Jews, which had been the people of God, should become a Lo-ammi, not my people. On the contrary, they, the Gentiles, who had been a Lo-ammi, not my people, should become the children of the living God. Again, chap. ii. 23. I will sow her (the Jewish church) unto me in the earth, (alluding probably to the dispersion of the Jews over all the Roman empire, which proved a fruitful cause of preparing the Gentiles for the reception of the Gospel,) and, or moreover, I will have mercy upon her, the body of the believing Gentiles, that had not obtained mercy. See Taylor.

Verse 27. Esaias also crieth] The apostle pursues his argument, which had for its object the proof that God, for their infidelity, had rejected the great body of the Jews; and that but a few of them would embrace the Gospel, and be saved from that besom of destruction which was now coming to sweep them and their state away. Dr. Taylor paraphrases this and the following verses thus: And, that but a small remnant of the Jews shall now be taken into the church, is agreeable to former dispensations: for the prophet Isaiah expressly declares concerning the Israelites, chap. x. 22, 23. Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, (for the promise to Abraham has been amply fulfilled,) only a remnant shall be saved; the consumption decreed shall overflow in righteousness. For the Lord God of Hosts shall make a consumption, even determined in the midst of all the land.

Verse 28. For he will finish the work, and cut it short, &c.] These appear to be forensic terms, and refer to the conclusion of a judicial proceeding;—the Lord has tried and found them guilty; and will immediately execute upon them the punishment due to their transgressions.

Verse 29. And as Esaias said before] What God designs to do with the Jews at present, because of their obstinacy and rebellion, is similar to what he has done before, to which the same prophet refers, chap. i. 9. Except the Lord of Hosts had left us a very small remnant, we should have been as Sodom, and we should have been like unto Gomorrah: i. e. had not God, who commands and overrules all the powers in heaven and earth, in mercy preserved a very small remnant, to keep up the name and being of the nation, it had been quite cut off and extinct, as Sodom and Gomorrah were. Thus we learn, that it is no new thing with God to abandon the greatest part of the Jewish nation when corrupt; and to confine his favour and blessing to a righteous believing few.

Instead of remnant, very small, both the Septuagint and the apostle have σπυρα, a seed, intimating that there were left just enow of the righteous, to be a seed for a future harvest of true believers. So, the godly were not destroyed from the land; some remained, and the harvest was in the days of the apostles.

Verse 30. What shall we say then?] What is the final conclusion to be drawn from all these prophecies, facts, and reasonings? This, that the Gentiles, which followed not after righteousness, &c. This, with the succeeding verses, together with what belongs to the same subject, in the beginning of the following chapter, I have explained at large in the notes on chap. i. 17. to which I must refer the reader; and shall content myself, in this place, with Dr. Taylor's general paraphrase. We may suppose the apostle to express himself to the following effect: Thus I have vindicated the rejection of the Jews, and the calling of the Gentiles, with regard to the divine veracity and justice. Now let us turn our thoughts to the true reason and state of the affair, considered in itself. And in the first place: What just notion ought we to have of the calling of the Gentiles, and the rejection of the Jews? I answer, the true notion of the calling or inviting of the Gentiles is this; whereas they had no apprehension of being reinstated in the privileges of God's peculiar kingdom, and consequently used no endeavours to obtain that blessing; yet, notwithstanding, they have attained to justification, to the remission of sins, and the privileges of God's people: not on account of their prior worthiness and obedience, but purely by the grace and mercy of God, received by faith on their part. And so by embracing the scheme of life, published by the Gospel, they are adopted into the family and church of God. Thus the Gentiles are called or invited.

Verse 31. But Israel, which followed after] But the Jews who have hitherto been the people of God, though they have been industrious in observing a rule by which they supposed they could secure the blessings of God's peculiar kingdom; yet have not come up to the true and only rule, by which those blessings can be secured.

Verse 32. Wherefore?] And where lies their mistake? Being ignorant of God's righteousness—of his method of saving sinners by faith in Christ; they went about to establish their own righteousness, their own method of obtaining everlasting salvation. They attend not to the Abrahamic covenant, which stands on the extensive principles of grace and faith; but they turn all their regards to the law of Moses. They imagine that their obedience to that law, gives them a right to the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom. But finding that the Gospel sets our especial interest in God, and the privileges of his church, on a different footing, they are offended, and refuse to come into it.

Verse 33. As it is written, Behold, I lay in Sion] Christ, the Messiah, is become a stone of stumbling to them; and thus what is written in the prophecy of Isaiah, is verified in their case, Isa. viii. 14. xxviii. 16. Behold, I lay in Sion, i. e. I shall bring in my Messiah; but he shall be a widely different person from him whom the Jews expect; for whereas they expect the Messiah to be a mighty secular prince, and to set up a secular kingdom, he shall appear a man of sorrows and acquainted with griefs; and redeem mankind, not by his sword, or secular power, but by his humiliation, passion, and death. Therefore they will be offended at him and reject him; and think it would be reproachful to trust in such a person for salvation.

And whosoever believeth on him! But so far shall any be from confusion or disappointment, who believes in Christ; that, on the contrary, every genuine believer shall find salvation: the remission of sins here, and eternal glory hereafter. See the notes on chap. i. 16. and 17. and Dr. Taylor's paraphrase and notes.

1. On the subject of vicarious punishment, or rather the case of one becoming an anathema, or sacrifice for the public good, in illustration of chap. ix. 3. I shall make no apology for the following extracts, taken from an author whose learning is vast, and whose piety is unblemished.

“When mankind lost sight of a beneficent Creator, the God of purity, and consecrated altars to the sun, the moon, the stars, to demons, and to hero gods, under the names of Moloch, Ashtaroth, and Baalim; these objects of their worship led them to the most horrid acts of cruelty, and to every species of obscenity; even their sons and their daughters they burnt in the fire to their gods, more especially in seasons of distress. Such was the conduct of the king of Moab; for when he was besieged in his capital, and expected he should fall into the hands of his enemies, he took his eldest son, who should have reigned in his stead, and offered him for a burnt offering on the wall.

With these facts thus related from the Scriptures, all accounts, ancient and modern, exactly correspond. Homer, who it must be recollected, wrote more than nine hundred years before the Christian era, although he describes chiefly the common sacrifice of quadrupeds, yet gives one account of human victims. But, in succeeding generations, when it was conceived that one great and most malignant spirit was the proper object of their fear, or that subordinate provincial gods, equally malignant, nesciaque humanis precibus mansuere corda, disposed of all things in our world; men bound their own species to the altar, and in circumstances of national distress presented such as they valued most, either their children or themselves. Herodotus informs us, that when the army of Xerxes came to the Strymon, the Magi offered a sacrifice of white horses to that river. On his arrival at the Scamander, the king ascended the citadel of Priam; and having surveyed it, he ordered a thousand oxen to be sacrificed to the Trojan Minerva. But on other occasions he chose human victims; for we are informed that when, having passed the Strymon, he reached the nine ways, he buried alive nine young men, and as many virgins, natives of the country. In this he followed the example of his wife, for she commanded fourteen Persian children, of illustrious birth, to be offered in that manner to the deity who reigns beneath the earth. Thus, in the infancy of Rome, we see Curtius, for the salvation of his country, devoting himself to the infernal gods, when, as it appears, an earthquake had occasioned a deep and extensive chasm in the forum; and the augurs had declared, that the portentous opening would never close till what contributed most to the strength and power of the Romans should be cast into it, but that by such a sacrifice they would obtain immortality for their republic. When all men were at a loss how to understand this oracle, M. Curtius, armed as for battle, presented himself in the forum, and explained it thus:—“What is more valuable to Rome than her courage and her arms?” So saying, he urged forward his impetuous steed, and buried himself in the abyss. His grateful countrymen admired his fortitude, and attributed the increasing splendour of their state to the sacrifice he made. Animated by this example, Decius, in the war between Rome and Latium, having solemnly offered himself as an expiatory sacrifice, rushed single into the thickest ranks of the astonished Latians, that by his death he might appease the anger of the gods, transfer their indignation to the enemy, and secure the victory to Rome. Conspicuas ab utroque acie aliquanto, augustior humano visu, sicut Cælo missus piaculum omnis deorum iræ, qui pestem ab suis aversam in hostes ferret.

Here we see distinctly marked the notion of vicarious suffering, and the opinion, that the punishment of guilt may be transferred from the guilty to the innocent. The gods call for sacrifice; the victim bleeds; atonement is made; and the wrath of the infernal powers falls in its full force upon the enemy. Thus while Themistocles at Salamine was offering sacrifice, three captives, the sons of Sandance, and nephews to Xerxes, all distinguished for their beauty, elegantly dressed and decked, as became their birth, with ornaments of gold, being brought on board his galley; the augur Euphrantides observing at that very instant a bright flame ascending from the altar, whilst one was sneezing on the right, which he regarded as a propitious omen, seized the hand of Themistocles, and commanded that they should all be sacrificed to Bacchus, (αἰνήθη Διονυσῆ—cruel and relentless Bacchus! Homer has the same expression,) predicting on this condition safety and conquest to the Greeks. Immediately the multitude with united voices called on the god, and led the captive princes to the altar, and compelled Themistocles to sacrifice them.

So when Æneas was to perform the last kind office for his friend Pallas, he sacrificed, (besides numerous oxen, sheep, and swine,) eight captives to the infernal gods. In this he followed the example of Achilles, who had caused twelve Trojans, of high birth, to bleed by the sacerdotal knife, over the ashes of his friend Patroclus.

A hundred feet in length, a hundred wide,
The glowing structure spreads on every side;
High on the top the manly corpse they lay,
And well-fed sheep, and sable oxen slay;

Achilles covered with their fat the dead,
And the piled victims round the body spread;
Then jars of honey, and of fragrant oil,
Suspend around, low bending o'er the pile.
Four sprightly coursers, with a deadly groan Pour forth their lives, and on the pyre are thrown.

Of nine large dogs, domestic at his board,
Fell two, selected to attend their lord;
The last of all, and horrible to tell,
Sad sacrifice! twelve Trojan captives fell.
On these the rage of fire victorious preys, Involves and joins them in one common blaze.
Smeared with the bloody rites, he stands on high,
And calls the spirit with a cheerful cry,
All hail, Patroclus! let thy vengeful ghost Hear, and exult on Pluto's dreary coast.

POPE'S Iliad, L. xxiii. ver. 203.

How much was it to be lamented, that even civilized nations should forget the intention for which sacrifices were originally instituted! The bad effects, however, would not have been either so extensive or so great, had they not wholly lost the knowledge of Jehovah; and taken, as the object of their fear, that evil and apostate spirit, whose name, with the utmost propriety, is called Apollyon, or the destroyer; and whose worship has been universally diffused, at different periods, among all the nations of the earth.

The practice of shedding human blood, before the altars of their gods, was not peculiar to the Trojans and the Greeks; the Romans followed their example. In the first ages of their republic, they sacrificed children to the goddess Mania; in later periods, numerous gladiators bled at the tombs of the Patricians, to appease the manes of the deceased. And it is particularly noticed of Augustus, that after the taking of Perusia, he sacrificed, on the ides of March, three hundred senators and knights to the divinity of Julius Cæsar.

The Carthaginians, as Diodorus Siculus informs us, bound themselves, by a solemn vow, to Chronus, that they would sacrifice to him children, selected from the offspring of their nobles; but in process of time, they substituted for these the children of their slaves, which practice they continued, till, being defeated by Agathocles, tyrant of Sicily; and, attributing their disgrace to the anger of the god, they offered two hundred children, taken from the most distinguished families in Carthage; beside which, three hundred citizens presented themselves, that, by their voluntary death, they might render the deity propitious to their country. The mode of sacrificing these children was horrid in the extreme; for they were cast into the arms of a brazen statue, and from thence dropped into a furnace, as was practised amongst the first inhabitants of Latium. It was probably in this manner, the Ammonites offered up their children to Moloch. The Pelasgi, at one time sacrificed a tenth part of all their children, in obedience to an oracle.

The Egyptians, in Heliopolis, sacrificed three men every day to Juno. The Spartans and Arcadians scourged to death young women; the latter to appease the wrath of Bacchus; the former, to gratify Diana. The Sabian idolaters in Persia offered human victims to Mithras, the Cretans, to Jupiter, the Lacedemonians and Lusitanians, to Mars; the Lesbians, to Bacchus; the Phocians, to Diana; the Thessalians, to Chiron.

The Gauls, equally cruel in their worship, sacrificed men, originally, to Eso, and Teutate; but latterly to Mercury, Apollo, Mars, Jupiter, and Minerva. Cæsar informs us, that whenever they thought themselves in danger, whether from sickness, or after any considerable defeat in war, being persuaded that, unless life be given for life, the anger of the gods can never be appeased; they constructed wicker images of enormous bulk, which they filled with men, who were first suffocated with smoke, and then consumed by fire.—For this purpose they preferred criminals; but when a sufficient number of these could not be found, they supplied the deficiency from the community at large.

The Germans are said to have differed from the Gauls, in having no Druids, and in being little addicted to the service of the altar. Their only gods were the Sun, Vulcan, and the Moon; yet, among the objects of their worship, was Tuisco, their progenitor, and Woden, the hero of the north. It is true that neither Cæsar nor Tacitus say any thing of their shedding blood in sacrifice; yet the probability is, that, like the Saxons, and other northern nations, they not only offered blood, but took their choicest victims from the human race.

In Sweden, the altars of Woden smoked incessantly with blood; this flowed most abundantly at the solemn festivals celebrated every ninth year at Upsal. Then the king, attended by the senate, and by all the great officers about his court, entered the temple, which glittered on all sides with gold, and conducted to the altar nine slaves, or in time of war, nine captives. These met the caresses of the multitude, as being about to avert from them the displeasure of the gods, and then submitted to their fate; but in times of distress, more noble victims bled; and it stands upon record, that when Aune their king was ill, he offered up to Woden his nine sons to obtain the prolongation of his life.

The Danes had precisely the same abominable customs. Every ninth year, in the month of January, they sacrificed ninety-nine men, with as many horses, dogs, and cocks: and Hacon, king of Norway, offered his own son, to obtain from Woden the victory over Harold; with whom he was at war.

In Russia, the Slavi worshipped a multitude of gods, and erected to them innumerable altars.—Of these deities Peroun, that is, the Thunderer, was the supreme; and before his image many of their prisoners bled. Their god of physic, who also presided over the sacred fires, shared with him; and the great rivers, considered as gods, had their portion of human victims, whom they covered with their inexorable waves. But Suetovid, the god of war, was the god in whom they most delighted: to him they presented annually, as a burnt-offering, three hundred prisoners, each on his horse; and, when the whole was consumed by fire, the priests and people sat down to eat and drink, till they were drunk. It is worthy of remark, that the residence of Suetovid was supposed to be in the sun.

To this luminary, the Peruvians, before they were restrained by their Incas, sacrificed their children.

Among the sacred books of the Hindoos, the Ramayuna demands particular attention, because of its antiquity, the extent of country through which it is revered, and the view which it exhibits of the religion, doctrine, mythology, customs, and manners of their remote progenitors.

In this we have a golden age of short duration, succeeded by a state of universal wickedness and violence, which continued till the Deity, incarnate, slew the oppressors of the human race, and thus restored the reign of piety and virtue.

This poem contains a description of the Ushwamedha, or most solemn sacrifice of the white horse, instituted by Swuymbhoo, that is, by the Self-existent. At the celebration of this festival, the monarch, as the representative of the whole nation, acknowledged his transgressions; and when the offerings were consumed by the sacrificial fire, he was considered as perfectly absolved from his offences. Then follows a particular account of a human sacrifice, in which the victim, distinguished for filial piety, for resignation to his father's will, and for purity of heart, was bound by the king himself, and delivered to the priest; but, at the very instant when his blood was to have been shed, this illustrious youth was, by miracle, delivered; and the monarch, as the reward of his intended sacrifice, received virtue, prosperity and fame.

It is well known that the Brahmins have, in all ages, had their human victims, and that even in our days, thousands have voluntarily perished under the wheels of their god Jaghernaut.

Townsend's Character of Moses, p. 76.

Though in the preceding Notes I have endeavoured to make every point as clear and plain as possible; yet it may be necessary, in order to see the scope of the apostle's design more distinctly, to take a general survey of the whole. No man has written with more judgment on this epistle than Dr. Taylor; and from his notes I borrow the principal part of the following observations.

The principal thing that requires to be settled in this chapter is, what kind of election and reprobation the apostle is arguing about: whether election, by the absolute decree and purpose of God, to eternal life; and reprobation, by a like absolute decree, to eternal misery; or only election to the present privileges and external advantages of the kingdom of God in this world: and reprobation, or rejection, as it signifies the not being favoured with those privileges and advantages. I think it demonstrably clear, that it is the latter election and rejection the apostle is discoursing on, and not the former, as the following considerations appear to me to demonstrate.

I. The subject of the apostle's argument is manifestly such privileges as are enumerated, verses 4, 5. who are Israelites, to whom pertains the adoption, &c. From these privileges, he supposes the Jews had fallen, or would fall; or, that for a long time they would be deprived of the benefit of them. For it is with regard to the loss of those privileges that he was so much concerned for his brethren, his kinsmen according to the flesh, ver. 2, 3. And it is with reference to their being stripped of these privileges, that he vindicates the word and righteousness of God, ver. 24. Not as though the word of God had taken no effect, or failed, &c. proving that God, according to his purpose of election, was free to confer them upon any branch of Abraham's family. Consequently, those privileges were the singular blessings which, by the purpose of God, according to election, not of works, but of him that calleth, were conferred upon Jacob's posterity. But those privileges were only such as the whole body of the Israelites enjoyed in this world, while they were the church and people of God: and such privileges as they might afterward lose; or of which they might be deprived. Therefore, the election of Jacob's posterity to those privileges was not an absolute election to eternal life.

II. Agreeably to the purpose of God according to election, it was said unto Rebecca, the elder shall serve the younger, meaning the posterity of the elder and the younger; for Gen. xxv. 23. The Lord said unto her, Two nations are in thy womb, and two manner of people shall be separated from thy bowels, and the one people shall be stronger than the other people; and the elder shall serve the younger. These are the words which signify the purpose of God according to election. Therefore, the election refers to Jacob's posterity, or the whole nation of Israel. But all the nation of Israel were not absolutely elected to eternal life. Therefore, the purpose of God according to election, referred to temporal and not to eternal blessings; and was a privilege of which they might be deprived.

III. Agreeably to the purpose of God according to election, it was said to Rebecca, the elder shall serve the younger: but to serve, in Scripture, never meant to be eternally damned in the world to come. Consequently, the opposite blessings bestowed upon the posterity of the younger, could not be eternal salvation; but certain privileges in this life. Therefore, the purpose according to election, refers to those privileges; and the servitude does not imply everlasting perdition.

IV. The election the apostle speaks of, is not of works, ver. 11. but of the mere will of God, who calls and invites; and refers to no qualifications in the persons thus elected and called: but in no part of the Sacred Writings is final salvation said to be given to any who are not qualified by holiness to receive and enjoy it. Therefore, election to eternal glory cannot be what the apostle speaks of in this epistle.

V. The election, of which the apostle speaks, took place, first in Abraham and his seed, before his seed was born; and then (excluding Ishmael and all his posterity,) in Isaac and his seed before they were born. And then excluding Esau and all his posterity, in Jacob and his seed before they were born. But the Scripture no where represents eternal life as bestowed upon any family or race of men in this manner. Therefore, this election mentioned by the apostle, cannot be an election unto eternal life.

VI. Vessels of mercy, ver. 23. are manifestly opposed to vessels of wrath, ver. 22. The vessels of mercy are the whole body of the Jews and Gentiles, who were called or invited into the kingdom of God, under the Gospel, ver. 24. consequently the vessels of wrath, are the whole body of the unbelieving Jews. So in ver. 30, 31. the whole body of believing Gentiles, who, according to God's purpose of election, had attained justification, are opposed to the whole body of the Israelites, who came short of it. But men shall not be received into eternal life, or subjected to eternal damnation, at the last day, in collective bodies; but according as particular persons, in those bodies, have acted well or ill. Therefore, this election is not of these particular bodies unto eternal life, &c.

VII. Whoever carefully peruses the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters, will find, that those who have not believed, chap. xi. 31. are the present rejected Jews; or that Israel to whom blindness hath happened in part, ver. 25. the same who fell, and on whom God hath shown severity; ver. 22. the same with the natural branches whom God spared not; ver. 21. who were broken off from the olive-tree; verses 20, 19, and 17. who were cast away; ver. 15. who were diminished and fallen; ver. 12. who had stumbled, ver. 11. who were a disobedient and gainsaying people; chap. x. 21. who being ignorant of God's righteousness, went about to establish their own; ver. 3. because they sought righteousness not by faith, but as it were by the works of the law; chap. ix. 32. and therefore, had not attained to the law of righteousness; ver. 31. the same people spoken of in all these places, are the vessels of wrath fitted for destruction; ver. 22. and the same for whom Paul had great heaviness and continual sorrow of heart; ver. 2, 3. in short, they are the unbelieving nation, or people of Israel; and it is with regard to the reprobation or rejection of this people that he is arguing, and vindicating the truth, justice, and wisdom of God, in this ninth chapter.

Now, if we turn back and review those three chapters, we shall find that the apostle, chap. xi. 1. heartily desired and prayed that those same reprobated and rejected people of Israel might be saved; he affirms that they had not stumbled so as to fall finally and irrecoverably; chap. xi. 11. that they should have again a fulness; ver. 12. that they should be received again into the church; ver. 15. that a holiness still belonged to them; ver. 16. that if they did not still abide in unbelief, they should be grafted into their own olive-tree again; ver. 23, 24. that blindness had happened unto them only for a time, till the fulness of the Gentiles be come in; ver. 25. and then he proves, from Scripture, that all Israel, all those nations at present under blindness, shall be saved; ver. 26, 27. that as touching the (original) election they were still beloved for the fathers' sake, the patriarchs' sake; ver. 28. that in their case, the gifts and calling of God were without repentance; ver. 29. that through our (the believing Gentiles') mercy, they shall at length obtain mercy, ver. 31. All these several things are spoken of that Israel, or the body of the people concerning whose rejection the apostle argues in the ninth chapter. And, therefore, the rejection which he there argues about, cannot be absolute reprobation to eternal damnation; but to their being, as a nation, stripped of those honours and privileges of God's peculiar church and kingdom in this world, to which, at a certain future period, they shall again be restored.

VIII. Once more: whoever carefully peruses those three chapters will find, that the people who in times past believed not God, but have now obtained mercy through the unbelief of the Jews, chap. xi. 30. are the whole body of the believing Gentiles: the same who were cut out of the olive-tree which is wild by nature; and were grafted, contrary to nature, into the good olive-tree, ver. 24. 17. the same to whom God hath shown goodness, ver. 22. the world that was reconciled, ver. 15. the Gentiles who were enriched by the diminishing of the Jews, ver. 12. to whom salvation came through their fall, ver. 11. the Gentiles who had attained to righteousness, (justification,) chap. ix. 30. who had not been God's people, nor beloved; but now were his people, beloved, and children of the living God, ver. 25, 26. even us whom he hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles, ver. 24, who are the vessels of mercy, on whom God has made known the riches of his glory, ver. 23. the vessels made unto honour, ver. 21. He speaks of the same body of men in all these places: namely, of the believing Gentiles, principally, but not excluding the small remnant of the believing Jews, who were incorporated with them. And it is this body of men, whose calling and election he is proving, in whose case the purpose of God according to election stands good, chap. ix. 11. And, who are the children, of the promise that are counted for the seed, ver. 8. these are the election, or the elect.

Now, concerning this called or elect body of people, or any particular person belonging to this body, the apostle writes thus, chap. xi. 20—22. well, because of unbelief, they (the Jews) were broken off, (reprobated, rejected,) and thou standest (in the church among God's called and elect,) by faith: be not high-minded, but fear. For if God spared not the natural branches (the Jews) take heed lest he also spare not thee, (the Gentiles.) Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them (the Jews) which fell, severity; but towards thee, (believing Gentiles) goodness; if thou continue in his goodness; otherwise thou also shalt be cut off, rejected, reprobated. This proves, that the calling and election, for which the apostle is arguing in the ninth chapter is not absolute election, unto eternal life, but to the present privileges of the church; the honours and advantages of God's peculiar people; which election, through unbelief and misimprovement, may be rendered void, and come to nothing. Notes, p. 330, &c.

From thus carefully considering the apostle's discourse, and taking in his scope and design, and weighing the different expressions he uses, in connexion with the Scripture facts and Scripture phrases employed in describing those facts, we must be fully convinced, that the doctrines of eternal, absolute, unconditional election and reprobation, have no place here; and that nothing but a pre-established creed, and a total inattention to the apostle's scope and design, could ever have induced men to bend these scriptures to the above purpose; and thus to endeavour to establish, as articles of faith, doctrines, which, far from producing glory to God in the highest, and peace and good will among men, have filled the church of God with contention, set every man's sword against his brother, and thus done the work of Apollyon in the name of Christ. If men will maintain these, and such like, for Scriptural doctrines, (doctrines repugnant to the Divine nature,) it is but reasonable to request that it be done in the spirit of the Gospel.

CHAPTER X.

The apostle expresses his earnest desire for the salvation of the Jews, 1. Having a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge, they sought salvation by works, and not by faith in Christ, 2—4. The righteousness which is of the law, described, 5. That which is by faith described also, 6—10. He that believes and calls on the name of the Lord shall be saved, 11—13. What is necessary to salvation—believing, hearing, preaching, a divine mission, the Gospel, and obedience to its precepts, 14—16. Faith comes by hearing, 17. The universal spread of the Gospel predicted by the prophets, 18—20. The ingratitude and disobedience of the Israelites, 21.

NOTES ON CHAP. X.

Verse 1. My heart's desire, &c.] Though the apostle knew that the Jews were now in a state of rejection, yet he knew also, that they were in this state through their own obstinacy; and that God was still waiting to be gracious; and consequently, that they might still repent and turn to him. Of his concern for their salvation, he had already given ample proof, when he was willing to become a sacrifice for their welfare, see chap. ix. 3.

Verse 2. They have a zeal of God] They believe their law to have come immediately from God himself; and are jealous of its glory and excellence: they conscientiously observe its rites and ceremonies; but they do not consider the object and end of those rites. They sin more through ignorance than malice; and this pleads in their excuse. By this fine apology for them, the apostle prepares them for the harsher truths which he was about to deliver.

Verse 3. For—being ignorant of God's righteousness] Not knowing God's method of saving sinners, which is the only proper and efficient method: and going about to establish their own righteousness; seeking to procure their salvation by means of their own contriving: they have not submitted; they have not bowed to the determinations of the Most High, relative to his mode of saving mankind, viz. through faith in Jesus Christ, as the only available sacrifice for sin; the end to which the law pointed.

Verse 4. For, Christ is the end of the law] Where the law ends, Christ begins. The law ends with representative sacrifices; Christ begins with the real offering. The law is our schoolmaster to lead us to Christ; it cannot save, but it leaves us at His door, where alone salvation is to be found. Christ, as an atoning sacrifice for sin, was the grand Object of the whole sacrificial code of Moses; his passion and death were the fulfilment of its great object and design. Separate this sacrificial death of Christ from the law, and the law has no meaning; for it is impossible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sins: wherefore the Messiah is represented as saying, Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire; burnt-offering and sin-offering thou hast not required; then said I, Lo, I come to do thy will; a body hast thou prepared me, Psal. xl. 6, 7. Heb. x. 4—10. which proves, that God never designed that the sacrifices of the law should be considered the atonement for sin; but a type or representative of that atonement; and that THE atonement was the sacrifice offered by Christ. Thus he was the END of the law, in respect to its sacrifices. And as sacrifices were offered merely to procure pardon of sin, righteousness, or justification; Christ is the end of the law for this justification to every one that believeth on him, as dying for their offences, and rising again for their justification, having made peace through the blood of his cross. Therefore, every Jew who rejected Christ, rejected

doeth those things shall live by them.

6 But the righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise, b Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? (that is, to bring Christ down from above :)

7 Or, who shall descend into the again from the dead.)

salvation, and that very salvation which the law witnessed and required; and which could not be had but through Christ alone.

Verse 5. For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law] The place to which the apostle refers, seems to be Levit. xviii. 5. Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments; which if a man do, he shall live in them.
These words seem to be spoken in answer to an objection which might be made by a Jew,— “Did not Moses give us a law, the observance of which would secure our salvation?” Such a law Moses undoubtedly gave, and that law promises life to those who perform its precepts; but, who can plead for life on this ground, who rejects that Christ who is the end of the law?
No man ever did, nor ever can fulfil that law, so as to merit salvation by the performance of it; for, as all have sinned and come short of the glory of God; they are all under the curse of the law, which says, Cursed is every one who continueth not in all the things that are written in the book of the law to do them, Deut. xxvii.
26. Gal. iii. 10. therefore by the deeds of this law none can be justified; because all are in a state of condemnation for transgressions already committed against it. If, therefore, there was not such a provision as is made by the death of Christ, no soul could be saved.

Verse 6. But the righteousness which is of faith] As it is most evident, that there can be no justification by works, as all are sinful, and all in a guilty state; if God will grant salvation at all, it must be by faith: but faith must have an object and a reason, for its exercise—the object is Jesus Christ—the reason is the infinite merit of his passion and death.

Who shall ascend into heaven, &c.] As Christ is the end of the law for justification, to every one that believes; no observance of the law can procure this Christ. Who, by the performance of the law can bring Christ down from heaven?
or when brought down, and crucified and buried, as a sacrifice for sin, who can bring him up again from the dead? And both his death and resurrection are essentially necessary for the salvation of a lost world. Or, the sense of the apostle may be this: they who will not believe in Christ crucified, must in effect be seeking another Messiah to come down from heaven with a different revelation; or they who will not credit the doctrine that we preach concern-word of faith, which we preach:

9 That d if thou shalt confess with raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved.

10 For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth

ing his resurrection, seem in effect to say, Christ yet remains to be raised from the dead, and reign over the Jews as a mighty secular sovereign; subjecting the Gentile world to the sway of his righteous sceptre.

Verse 8. But what saith it? The word is nigh thee] There is no occasion to seek high or low for the saving power; the word of reconciliation is nigh. The way of salvation is now both plain and easy. The law is magnified and made honourable by the death of Christ; and the doctrine of faith in his death and resurrection is fully proclaimed, and amply proved to be effectual to the purpose for which it was revealed.
By the preaching of the Gospel, the doctrine of salvation is nigh thee, and the saving influence is at hand; it is in thy mouth, easy to be understood, easy to be professed; and in thy heart, if thou art upright before God, sincerely desiring to be saved on his own terms, not striving to establish thy own method of justification by the law, which must for ever be ineffectual, but submitting to the method of justification which God has devised.

Verse 9. That if thou shalt confess, &c.] Acknowledge the Lord Jesus Christ as the only Saviour. Believe in thy heart that he who died for thy offences, has been raised for thy justification; and depend solely on him for that justification, and thou shalt be saved.

Verse 10. For with the heart man believeth, &c.] And be sincere in this: for with the heart, duly affected with a sense of guilt, and of the sufficiency of the sacrifice which Christ has offered; man believeth unto righteousness, believeth to receive justification; for this is the proper meaning of the term here, and in many other parts of the epistle; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. He who believes aright in Christ Jesus, will receive such a full conviction of the truth, and such an evidence of his redemption, that his mouth will boldly confess his obligation to his Redeemer, and the blessed persuasion he has of the remission of all his sins, through the blood of the cross. One grand object of the apostle is to show the simplicity of the Gospel scheme of salvation; and, at the same time, its great efficacy. It is simple, and very unlike the law, which was full of rites, ordinances, ceremonies, &c. each of which required to be perfectly fulfilled: and yet, after all, even those who had confession is made unto salvation.

11 For the scripture saith, ^a Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed.

12 For ^b there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek: for ^c the same Lord over all ^d is rich unto all that call upon him.

^a Isai. 28. 16. & 49. 23. Jer. 17. 7. ch. 9. 33. — ^b ch. 3. 22. Acts 15. 9. Gal. 3. 28. — ^c Acts 10. 36.

the utmost zeal for God, and, as conscientiously as possible, observed all the precepts of the law, had not attained to justification, nor peace of conscience. Whereas both Jews and Gentiles who had believed on the Lord Jesus, according to the simple declarations of the Gospel, were freely justified from all things from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses; and they had the witness in themselves, that they were passed from death to life.

Verse 11. For the scripture saith] And whosoever the Jews may despise this Gospel, because it comes not unto them with pomp and ceremony: it puts those who receive it into possession of every heavenly blessing: and this is according to the positive declarations of the prophets; for it is written, Isaiah xxviii. 16. xlix. 23, Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed.—He shall neither be disappointed of his hope, nor ashamed of his confidence; because he has that faith which is the evidence of things not seen, the substance of things hoped for. Hebr. xi. 1. See note on chap. i. 16.

Verse 12. For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek] All are equally welcome to this salvation. Here the Jew has no exclusive privilege: and from this, the Greek is not rejected. One simple way of being saved, is proposed to all, viz. faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, because he is the same Lord who has made all and governs all; and is rich in mercy to all that call upon him.

Verse 13. For whosoever shall call, &c.] Nor shall any one who hears this doctrine of salvation, and credits it as he is commanded, be permitted to pray or supplicate the throne of grace in vain: for the prophet Joel hath declared, chap. ii. 32. whosoever shall call upon, invoke, the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Saviour of sinners, shall be saved: shall have his guilt pardoned, his heart purified: and if he abide in the faith, rooted and grounded in him, showing forth the virtues of him who has called him out of darkness into his marvellous light; he shall be saved with all the power of an eternal life.

“Believing in Christ, or God, ver. 11. and calling upon God, ver. 12, 13, 14. are in effect the same thing: as calling upon God, necessarily connects and supposes faith in him; and he who duly believes in Christ, has such a sense of his dependance upon divine grace, that he looks unto God, and trusts in his power and goodness alone for happiness: which is the true religion of the Gospel.” Dr. Taylor.

13 ^a For whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved.

14 How then shall they call on him, in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in him, of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher?

Ch. 3. 29. 1 Tim. 2. 5. — ^d Eph. 1. 7. & 2. 4, 7. — ^c Joel 2. 32. Acts 2. 21. — ^f Acts 9. 14. — ^g Tit. 1. 3.

It is evident that St. Paul understood the text of Joel as relating to our blessed Lord; and, therefore, his word Κυριος must answer to the prophet's word יהוה Yehovah; which is no mean proof of the Godhead of Jesus Christ. If the text be translated, Whosoever shall invoke in the name of the Lord, which translation יהוה יקרא בשם יהוה yk'ra ba-s'hem Yehovah, will certainly bear; yet still the term Yehovah, the incommunicable name, is given to Christ; because invoking in the name, signifies soliciting one in the name, or on the account of another. He who is invoked is God; He, in whose name he is invoked, is JESUS CHRIST, who is here called Yehovah. He who asks mercy from God, in the name and for the sake of JESUS CHRIST, shall get his soul saved.

Verse 14. How then shall they call on him] As the apostle had laid so much stress on believing in order to salvation; and as this doctrine, without further explanation, might be misunderstood; it was necessary to show how this faith was produced; and, therefore, he lays the whole doctrine down in a beautifully graduated order:

1. There can be no salvation without the Gospel: a dispensation of mercy and grace from God alone, here called, ver. 15. The Gospel of peace; glad tidings of good things.

2. This must be preached, proclaimed in the world for the obedience of faith.

3. None can effectually preach this, unless he have a divine mission; for how shall they preach unless they be sent, ver. 15. The matter must come from God; and the person who proclaims it, must have both authority andunction from on high.

4. This divinely commissioned person must be heard: it is the duty of all to whom this message of salvation is sent, to hear it with the deepest reverence and attention.

5. What is heard, must be credited: for they who do not believe the Gospel, as the record which God has given of his Son, cannot be saved, verse 14.

6. Those who believe must invoke God, by Christ, which they cannot do, unless they believe in him; and in this way alone, they are to expect salvation. Professing to believe in Christ, without earnest importunate prayer for salvation, can save no man. All these things the apostle lays down as essentially necessary: and they all follow from this grand proposition, Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved. But, says the apostle, How shall

15 And how shall they preach, except they be sent? as it is written, How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the Gospel of peace, and bring glad tidings of good things!

16 But they have not all obeyed the Gospel. For, Esaias saith, Lord, Isai. 52. 7. Neh. 1. 15.—b ch. 3. 3. Hebr. 4. 2.—Isai. 53. 1. 1 John 12. 38.—d Gr. the hearing of us.—e Or. preaching.

they CALL upon him in whom they have not believed? And how shall they BELIEVE in him of whom they have not heard? And how shall they HEAR without a preacher? And how shall they PREACH except they be sent? And with what message, which can bring salvation, can they be sent, but with the GOSPEL OF PEACE, the GLAD TIDINGS OF GOOD THINGS. When, therefore, there is first, A proper MESSAGE; 2dly, A proper MESSENGER; 3dly, The message PREACHED, proclaimed, or properly delivered by him; 4thly, The proclamation properly HEARD and attentively considered by the people; 5thly, The message which they have heard, conscientiously BELIEVED; 6thly, The name of the Lord Jesus, by whom alone this salvation is provided, most fervently INVOKED; then, 7thly, Salvation or redemption from sin and misery, and the enjoyment of peace and happiness, will be the result of such calling, believing, hearing, preaching, sending, and message sent:—and thus, the doctrine of salvation by grace through faith is guarded from abuse.

Verse 15. How beautiful are the feet of them that preach] Dr. Taylor remarks on this quotation, which is taken from Isai. lii. 7. that "feet are variously used in Scripture; and sometimes have respect to things internal and spiritual. For, as the life of man and the practice of piety, is compared to walking, Psa. i. 1. so his feet may signify the principles on which he acts, and the dispositions of his mind. Eccles. v. 1. Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of God. Agreeably to this, the feet of the messengers in Isaiah, and of the apostles in this verse, may signify the validity of their mission, the authority upon which they acted; and any character or qualifications with which they were invested."

Verse 16. But they have not all obeyed the Gospel] This seems to be the objection of a Jew: as if he had said, A divine mission would be attended with success; whereas there are numbers who pay no attention to the glad tidings you preach. To this the apostle answers, that the Spirit of God by Isaiah, chap. liii. 1. foretold it would be so, even in the case of the Jews themselves, when he said, Lord, who hath believed our report? For, although God brings the message of salvation to men, he does not oblige them to embrace it. It is proposed to their understanding and conscience; but it does not become the means of salvation unless it be affectionately credited.

who hath believed our report?

17 So then, faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God.

18 But I say, Have they not heard? Yes, verily, their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world.

Verse 17. So then, faith cometh by hearing] Preaching the Gospel is the ordinary means of salvation; faith in Christ is the result of hearing the word, the doctrine of God preached. Preaching, God sends; if heard attentively, faith will be produced: and if they believe the report, the arm of the Lord will be revealed in their salvation.

Verse 18. But I say, Have they not heard?] But to return to the objection; you say, they have not all BELIEVED: I ask, have they not all HEARD? Have not the means of salvation been placed within the reach of every Jew in Palestine; and within the reach of all those who sojourn in the different Gentile countries where we have preached the Gospel; as well to the Jews as to the Gentiles themselves? Yes, for we may say of the preaching of the Gospel, what the Psalmist has said (Psalm xix. 2, 3.) of the heavenly bodies; Their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world. As the celestial luminaries have given testimony of the eternal power and Godhead of the Deity to the habitable world; the Gospel of Christ has borne testimony to his eternal goodness and mercy, to all the land of Palestine; and to the whole Roman empire. There is not a part of the Promised Land in which these glad tidings have not been preached; and there is scarcely a place in the Roman empire in which the doctrine of Christ crucified has not been heard: if, therefore, the Jews and Gentiles have not believed, the fault is entirely their own; as God has amply furnished them with the means of faith and salvation.

In Psalm xix. 4. the Psalmist has קצוֹם קצוֹם, their line, which the Septuagint, and the apostle, who quotes from them, renders, ἡχος ἡχος, sound; and hence, some have thought that the word in the Psalm was originally קולוֹם kolam, their voice. But that קוֹל kav, is used for word or speech, is sufficiently evident from Isaiah xxviii. 10. line upon line, precept upon precept, &c. where קוֹל is analogous to word or direction. It is very remarkable that these words of David, quoted by St. Paul, are mentioned in Sohar Genes. fol. 9. where it is said קצוֹם אֵינוֹן קוֹל אֵינוֹן אֲבֵדֵי מַשְׁחִיחָא עֵינֵי מִלִּין—“These words are the servants of the Messiah, and measure out both the things above and the things beneath.” To this notion of them the apostle may refer in his use of them in this place; and to a Jew the application would be legitimate.

19 But I say, Did not Israel know? First, Moses saith, ^a I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people, and by a ^b foolish nation I will anger you.

20 But Esaias is very bold, and saith,

Verse 19. But I say, Did not Israel know? You object to this preaching among the Gentiles;—but is not this according to the positive declaration of God? He, foreseeing your unbelief and rebellion, said by Moses, Deut. xxxii. 21. I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people, and by a foolish nation I will anger you. As you have provoked me to jealousy, with worshipping those that are no gods; I will provoke you to jealousy by those which are no people. This most evidently refers to the calling or inviting of the Gentiles to partake of the benefits of the Gospel: and plainly predicts the envy and rage which would be excited in the Jews, in consequence of those offers of mercy made to the Gentiles.

Verse 20. But Esaias, (the Greek orthography for Isaiah, is very bold) Speaks out in the fullest manner and plainest language, chap. lxx. 1. notwithstanding the danger to which such a declaration exposed him, among a crooked, and perverse, and dangerous people: I was found of them that sought me not; I put my salvation in the way of those (the Gentiles) who were not seeking for it, and knew nothing of it: thus, the Gentiles which followed not after righteousness, have attained to the law of righteousness, chap. ix. 30. and they have found that redemption which the Jews have rejected.

Verse 21. But Israel he saith In the very next verse, (Isa. chap. lxx. 2.) All day long I have stretched forth my hands, manifesting the utmost readiness and willingness to gather them all together under my protecting care; but I stretched forth my hands in vain, for they are a disobedient and gainsaying people. They not only disobey my command, but they gainsay and contradict my prophets. Thus the apostle proves, in answer to the objections made, ver. 16. that the infidelity of the Jews was the effect of their own obstinacy. And the opposition which they are now making to the Gospel, was foretold and deplored 700 years before: and that their opposition, far from being a proof of the insufficiency of the Gospel, proved that this was the grand means which God had provided for their salvation; and having rejected this, they could expect no other. And this gives the apostle opportunity to speak largely concerning their rejection in the following chapter.

I. In the preceding chapter are several quotations from the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms; and as the apostle seems to take them with considerable latitude of meaning, it has been thought that he only uses their words, as being well calculated to express his sense: without paying any attention to their original im- port. This principle is too lax, to be introduced in such solemn circumstances. Dr. Taylor has made some judicious and useful distinctions here. After observing that, if we allow this principle, no argument can be built on any of the apostle's quotations; and that it must have been an indifferent thing with him, whether he did or did not understand the Scripture; as, on this supposition, they would serve him as well without, as with the true meaning: he adds, the apostle was a strict and close quoter of the Scriptures: but he did not always quote them in the same manner, or for the same purpose.

1. Sometimes his intention goes no further than using the same strong expressions, as being equally applicable to the point in hand. So, verses 6, 7, and 8. of this chapter, he uses the words of Moses, not to prove any thing; nor, as if he thought Moses spoke of the same subject; but only as intimating, that the strong and lively expressions which Moses used concerning the doctrine he taught, were equally applicable to the faith of the Gospel. So in the same manner, verse 18. he quotes Psalm. xix. 4. though it is likely, (see the note in that place,) that those expressions were used by the ancient Jews in application to the Messiah, as the apostle applies them.

2. Sometimes the design of the quotation is only to show that the cases are parallel: or, that what happened in his times corresponded with what happened in former days. So chap. ii. 24.—viii. 36.—ix. 27, 28, 29.—xi. 2, 3, 4, 5, 8, 9, 10.—xv. 21.

3. Sometimes the quotation is only intended to explain a doctrinal point, as chap. i. 17.—iv. 6, 7, 8—18—21.—ix. 20, 21.—x. 15.—xv. 3.

4. Sometimes the quotation is designed to prove a doctrinal point. Chap. iii. 4, 10—19.—iv. 3—17.—v. 12, 13, 14.—ix. 7, 9, 12, 13, 15, 17.—x. 5, 11, 13.—xii. 19, 20.—xiii. 9.—xiv. 11.

5. Sometimes it is the intention of the quotation to prove that something was predicted, or properly foretold in the prophetic writings, as chap. ix. 25, 26, 23.—x. 16, 19, 20, 21.—xi. 26, 27.—xv. 9—13.

These things duly considered, it will appear, that the apostle has every where shown a just regard to the true sense of the Scriptures he quotes, in the view in which he quotes them.

These rules may help to vindicate the quotations in all the apostolic writings. And it is evident that we cannot form a true judgment upon any quotation, unless we take in the intention of the writer, or the view in which he quotes.

II. The apostle here makes a just and proper distinction between the righteousness or justcation that is of the law, and that which is by faith in Christ. And, in his view of the former, shows it to be absolutely impossible; for if no man is to live thereby, to have spiritual and eternal life, but he who does these things; then, salvation on that ground must be impossible—for, 1. The law makes no provision for the pardon of sin.—2. It affords no helps for the performance of duty.—3. It makes no allowances for imperfections in duty, or for imperfections in our nature.—4. Its commandments, necessarily, suppose a righteous soul, and a vigorous body; and it does not lower its claims to the fallen state of man.—5. It requires perfect obedience, not only in all things, but in all places and circumstances. The man who comes up to this standard, has ever been in it, and has never swerved from it, shall, by the law, live for ever. But no man since the fall, ever did so, or ever can do so. Therefore, salvation by the works of the law, is absolutely impossible. But, 1. The righteousness, or justification, which is by faith, receives Christ as an atoning sacrifice, by which all past sin is pardoned. 2. Receives continual supplies of grace from Christ by the eternal Spirit, through which the man is enabled to love God with all his heart, soul, mind, and strength, and his neighbour as himself. 3. This grace is afforded in sufficient degrees, suited to all places, times, and circumstances, so that no trial can happen too great to be borne, as the grace of Christ is ever at hand to support and to save to the uttermost. The law is the letter that killeth; the Gospel is the spirit that giveth life. Reader, let thy whole soul say, with the apostle, Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift.

CHAPTER XI.

God has not universally nor finally rejected Israel; nor are they all at present rejecters of the Gospel, for there is a remnant of true believers now, as there was in the days of the prophet Elijah, 1—5. These have embraced the Gospel, and are saved by grace, and not by the works of the law, 6. The body of the Israelites having rejected this, are blinded according to the prophetic declaration of David, 7—10. But they have not stumbled, so as to be finally rejected; but through their fall, salvation is come to the Gentiles, 11—14. There is hope of their restoration, and that the nation shall yet become a holy people, 15, 16. The converted Gentiles must not exult over the fallen Jews; the latter having fallen by unbelief, the former stand by faith, 17—20. The Jews, the natural branches, were broken off from the true olive; and the Gentiles having been grafted in in their place, must walk uprightly, else they also shall be cut off, 21, 22. The Jews, if they abide not in unbelief, shall be again grafted in; and when the fullness of the Gentiles is come in, the great Deliverer shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob, according to the covenant of God, 23—27. For the sake of their forefathers, God loves them, and will again call them, and communicate His gifts to them, 28, 29. The Gospel shall be again sent to them, as it has now been sent to the Gentiles, 30—32. This procedure is according to the immensity of the wisdom, knowledge, and unsearchable judgments of God, who is the Creator, Preserver, and Governor of all things, and to whom all adoration is due, 33—36.

NOTES ON CHAP. XI.

This chapter is of the prophetic kind. It was by the Spirit of prophecy, that the apostle foresaw the rejection of the Jews, which he supposes in the two preceding chapters; for when he wrote the epistle, they were not in fact rejected; seeing their polity and church were then standing. But the event has proved that he was a true prophet; for we know that in about ten or eleven years after the writing of this letter, the temple was destroyed, the Jewish polity overthrown, and the Jews expelled out of the Promised Land, which they have never been able to recover to the present day.

This 1. confirms the arguments which the apostle had advanced to establish the calling of the Gentiles. For the Jews are, in fact, rejected; consequently, our calling is, in fact, not invalidated by any thing they suggested, relative to the perpetuity of the Mosaic dispensation. But that dispensation being wholly subverted, our title to the privileges of God's church and people stands clear and strong: the Jewish constitution only, could furnish objections against our claim, and the event has silenced every objection from that quarter.

2. The actual rejection of the Jews proves Paul to be a true apostle of Jesus Christ, and that he spoke by the Spirit of God; otherwise, he could not have argued so fully upon a case which was yet to come, and of which there was no appearance in the state of things when he wrote this Epistle. And this very circumstance should induce us to pay great attention to this knew. Wot ye not what the scripture saith ^a of Elias? how he maketh intercession to God against chapter, in which he discourses concerning the extent and duration of the rejection of his countrymen, to prevent their being insulted and despised by the Gentile Christians. (1.) As to the extent of this rejection, it is not absolutely universal; some of the Jews have embraced the Gospel, and are incorporated into the Christian church, with the believing Gentiles. Upon the case of these believing Jews, he comments, ver. 1—7. (2.) As to the duration of it, it is not final and perpetual, for all Israel, or the nation of the Jews, which is now blinded, shall one day be saved, or brought again into the kingdom or covenant of God. Upon the state of these blinded Jews, he comments, ver. 7. to the end of the chapter. His design in discoursing upon this subject, was not only to make the thing itself known; but partly to engage the attention of the unbelieving Jew; to conciliate his favour, and if possible to induce him to come into the Gospel scheme, and partly to dispose the Gentile Christians not to treat the Jews with contempt; (considering that they derived all their present blessings from the putrarchs, the ancestors of the Jewish nation, and were ingrafted into the good olive-tree, whence the Jews had been broken,) and to admonish them to take warning by the fall of the Jews, to make a good improvement of their religious privileges, lest, through unbelief, any of them should relapse into heathenism, or perish finally at the last day.

The thread of his discourse leads him into a general survey and comparison of the several dispensations of God towards the Gentiles and Jews; and he concludes this survey with adoration of the depths of the divine knowledge and wisdom exercised in the various constitutions erected in the world, ver. 30—36. See Taylor's notes, p. 340.

Verse 1. I say then, Hath God cast away his people? [Has he utterly and finally rejected them? for this is necessarily the apostle's meaning, and is the import of the Greek word ἀρσεν, which signifies to thrust or drive away; from αρσ, from, and σεν, to thrust or drive;—has he thrust them off, and driven them eternally from him? God forbid, by no means. This rejection is neither universal, nor final. For, I also am an Israelite, I am a regular descendant from Abraham, through Israel or Jacob, and by his son Benjamin. And I stand in the church of God; and in the peculiar covenant; for the rejection is only of the obstinate and disobedient; for those who believe on Christ, as I have done, are continued in the church.

Verse 2. God hath not cast away his people, which he foreknew] God has not finally and irrecoverably rejected a people, whom he has loved (or approved,) so long, ἡ μακροχρονία, for this is evidently the meaning of the word in this place, as we have already seen, chap. viii. 29. and is a very general meaning of the original verb πρω γαδά, in Hebrew, and προμαρτυρομαι, in Greek: as I have had often occasion to notice in different parts of this work, and what none will deny, who consults the original. See Schleusner, Parkhurst, &c.

Wot ye not what the scripture saith] Our fathers, do ye not know what the Scripture saith. The reference is to 1 Kings xix. 10, 14. And the apostle's answer to the objecting Jew, is to the following effect: God hath not universally thrust away his people, for whom, in the promise to Abraham, he intended, and to whom he decreed to grant his special favour and blessing; but the case is now, much as it was in the days of Elijah; that prophet, in his address to God, made his complaint against Israel thus:

Verse 3. Lord, they have killed thy prophets] They will not permit any person to speak unto them in thy name; and they murder those who are faithful to the commission which they have received from thee.

Digged down thine altars] They are profligate and profane beyond example, and retain not the slightest form of religion.

I am left alone] There is no prophet besides myself left, and they seek to destroy me.

Verse 4. But what saith the answer of God] The answer which God made, assured him that there were seven thousand, that is, several or many thousands, for so we must understand the word seven, a certain, for an uncertain number. These had continued faithful to God; but because of Jezebel's persecution, they were obliged to conceal their attachment to the true religion; and God, in his providence, preserved them from her sanguinary rage.

Who have not bowed the knee] Baal was the god of Jezebel; or, in other words, his worship was then the worship of the state; but there were several thousands of pious Israelites who had not acknowledged this idol; and did not partake in the idolatrous worship.

Verse 5. Even so then, at this present time] As in the present day the irreligion of the Jews is very great; yet there is a remnant, a consti-

6 And ^aif by grace, then is it no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace: otherwise work is no more work.

7 What then? ^bIsrael hath not obtained that which he seeketh for; but the election hath obtained it, and the rest were ^cblinded.

derable number, who have accepted of the grace of the Gospel.

According to the election of grace] And these are saved just as God has saved all believers from the beginning; they are chosen by his grace; not on account of any worth or excellence in themselves, but through his goodness are they chosen to have a place in his church, and continue to be his people, entitled to all the privileges of the new covenant. The election of grace simply signifies God's gracious design in sending the Christian system into the world, and saving under it all those who believe in Christ Jesus, and none else. Thus, the believers in Christ are chosen to inherit the blessings of the Gospel; while those who seek justification by the works of the law are rejected.

Verse 6. And if by grace] And let this very remnant of pious Jews, who have believed in Christ Jesus, know that they are brought in precisely in the same way as God has brought in the Gentiles; the one having no more worthiness to plead than the other; both being brought in, and continued in by God's free grace, and not by any observance of the Mosaic law.

And this is done according to the election of grace, or the rule of choosing any persons to be the people of God upon the footing of grace; which takes in all that believe in his Son Jesus Christ: some of the Jewish people did so believe; therefore those believing Jews are a remnant according to the election of grace. They are saved in that way, in which alone God will save mankind.

And if by grace—Then let these very persons remember that their election and interest in the covenant of God has no connexion with their old Jewish works; for were it of works, grace would lose its proper nature, and cease to be what it is, a free, undeserved gift.

But if it be of works] On the other hand, could it be made appear that they are invested in these privileges of the kingdom of Christ, only by the observance of the law of Moses, then GRACE would be quite set aside; and if it were not, work, or the merit of obedience, would lose its proper nature, which excludes favour and free gift. But it is not, and cannot be of works; for those very Jews who now believe, and are happy in the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, are so according to the election of grace, which does not mean a particular act of God's sovereignty, which has singled out some of the Jews who deserve to have been cast off, as well as the rest; but it is that general scheme of grace, according to which God purposed to take into his church and kingdom, any, among either Jews or Gentiles, who should believe on Christ. And the remnant here mentioned were not selected from their countrymen, by such a sovereign act of God's grace as might have taken in the whole, if it had so pleased; but they were admitted into, and received the privileges of the Messiah's kingdom; because they believed on the Lord Jesus, and received him as their only Saviour, and thus came into that scheme of election which God had appointed. And we may observe further, that out of this election, they, as well as the others, would have been excluded, had they, like the rest, remained in unbelief; and into this election of grace all the Jews to a man, notwithstanding they were all sinners, would have been taken, had they believed in Christ Jesus. This is the true notion of the election of grace. See Taylor.

Verse 7. What then?] What is the real state of the case before us? Israel, the body of the Jewish people, have not obtained that which they so earnestly desire, i. e. to be continued, as they have been hitherto, the peculiar people of God; but the election hath obtained it; as many of them as have believed in Jesus Christ, and accepted salvation through him; this is the grand scheme of the election by grace; God chooses to make those his peculiar people who believe in his Son, and none other shall enjoy the blessings of his kingdom. Those who would not receive him are blinded; they have shut their eyes against the light, and are in the very circumstances of those mentioned by the prophet Isaiah, chap. xxix. 10.

Verse 8. God hath given them the spirit of slumber] As they had wilfully closed their eyes against the light; so God has, in judgment, given them up to the spirit of slumber. The very word and revelation of God, which should have awakened their consciences, and opened their eyes and ears, have had a very different effect; and because they did not receive the truth in the love thereof, that which would otherwise have been the savour of life unto life, has become the savour of death unto death; and this continues to the present day.

Verse 9. And David saith, Let their table, &c.] And from their present disposition, it is reasonable to conclude, that the same evil will 10 Let their eyes be darkened, that they may not see, and bow down their back alway.

11 I say, then, Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but

fall upon them as fell upon the disobedient in former times, as predicted by David, Psa. lxxix. 22, 23. that their very blessings should become curses to them; and their temporal mercies be their only recompense; and yet, even these earthly blessings, by not being enjoyed in the Lord, should be a stumblingblock, over which they should fall; and instead of being a blessing, should be the means of their punishment. They would have a worldly Messiah, and therefore they rejected him whose kingdom was not of this world.

Verse 10. Let their eyes be darkened] All these words are declarative, and not imprecatory. God declares what will be the case of such obstinate unbelievers: their table, their common providential blessings, will become a mare, a trap, a stumblingblock, and the means of their punishment. Their eyes will be more and more darkened, as they persist in their unbelief, and their back shall be bowed down always; far from becoming a great and powerful nation, they shall continue ever in a state of abject slavery and oppression, till they acknowledge Jesus as the promised Messiah; and submit to receive redemption in his blood.

Verse 11. Have they stumbled that they should fall] Have the Jews, now for their disobedience and unbelief rejected, so sinned against God as to be for ever put out of the reach of his mercy? By no means. Are they, as a nation, utterly irrecoverable? This is the sense of the place, and here the prophecy of the restoration of the Jewish nation commences.

But rather, through their fall, salvation is come] The church of God cannot fail: if the Jews have broken the everlasting covenant, Isai. xxiv. 5. the Gentiles shall be taken into it; and this very circumstance shall be ultimately the means of exciting them to seek and claim a share in the blessings of the new covenant; and this is what the apostle terms provoking them to jealousy, i. e. exciting them to emulation, for so the word should be understood. We should observe here, that the fall of the Jews was not, in itself, the cause or reason of the calling of the Gentiles: for whether the Jews had stood or fallen, whether they had embraced or rejected the Gospel; it was the original purpose of God to take the Gentiles into the church; for this was absolutely implied in the covenant made with Abraham: and it was in virtue of that covenant that the Gentiles were now called; and not because of the unbelief of the Jews. And hence we see that their fall was not the necessary means of the salvation of the Gentiles, for certainly the unbelief of the Jews could never produce faith in the Gentiles. The simple state of the case is; rather, through their fall, salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy.

12 Now, if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing the Jews, in the most obstinate and unprincipled manner, rejected Jesus Christ and the salvation offered them in his name: then the apostles turned to the Gentiles, and they heard and believed. The Jews themselves perceived that the Gentiles were to be put in possession of similar privileges to those which they, as the peculiar people of God, had enjoyed: this they could not bear, and put forth all their strength in opposition and persecution. The calling of the Gentiles, which existed in the original purpose of God, became in a certain way accelerated by the unbelief of the Jews, through which they forfeited all their privileges, and fell from that state of glory and dignity in which they had been long placed as the peculiar people of God. See Taylor.

Verse 12. Now, if the fall of them] The English reader may imagine that because fall is used in both these verses, the original word is the same. But their fall, and the fall of them, is απαρτιμα, the same word which we render offence, chap. v. 15, 17, 18. and might be rendered lapse. Whereas that they should fall (ver. 11.) is ἡν πεσῶσι. Now, πίπτει, to fall, is used in a sense so very emphatical as to signify being slain. So Homer, ll. viii. ver. 475.

Ἡμάτι τῶν, ὅτ' αὖ οἱ μὲν ἐπὶ πρυμνοῖσι μαχόμενοι, Ἰστῆσι ἐν ἀνοτάτῳ, παρὶ Πατρόκλου πεισόντος· ὧς γὰρ βισφάτοι ἐστὶ.

And for Patroclus slain, the crowded hosts In narrow space, shall at the ships contend. Such the Divine decree.

And again, ll. xi. ver. 84.

Ὅρα μὲν πῶς ἐν καὶ αἴθετο ἱερὸν ἡμᾶς, Τόρα μάλ' ἀμφοτέρων βέλ' ἤπτοτο, πίπτει δὲ λαός·

While morning lasted, and the light of day Increased, so long the weapons on both sides Flew in thick volleys; and the people fell.

COWPER

It is well known that to fall in battle means to be killed. It is in such a sense as this, that St. Paul used the word fall, when he says, Have they stumbled that they should fall? he means a fall quite destructive and ruinous; whereas by their fall, and the fall of them, he means no more than such a lapse as was recoverable; as in the case of Adam's offence. See Dr. Taylor.

The riches of the world] If in consequence of their unbelief, the riches of God's grace and goodness be poured out on the whole Gentile world; how much more shall that dispensation of grace and mercy enrich and aggrandize the Gentiles, which shall bring the whole body of the Jews to the faith of the Gospel. Here the apostle supposes, or rather predicts, that such 14 If by any means I may provoke to emulation them which are my flesh, and might save some of them.

15 For, if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?

a dispensation shall take place; and that therefore the Jews have not so stumbled as to be finally irrecoverable.

Verse 13. This, and the following verse should be read in a parenthesis. St. Paul, as the apostle of the Gentiles, wished to show them the high pitch of glory and blessedness to which they had been called, that they might have a due sense of God's mercy in calling them to such a state of salvation; and, that they might be jealous over themselves, lest they should fall as the Jews had done before them: and he dwells particularly on the greatness of those privileges which the Gentiles had now received, that he might stir up the minds of his countrymen to emulation: and might be the means of saving some of them, as he states in the following verse.

I magnify mine office] This is a very improper translation of τὴν διακονίαν μου μεγαλύνω, which is, literally, I honour this my ministry. Dr. Taylor has justly observed, that magnify, except when applied to the Most High, carries with it, in our language, the idea of stretching beyond the bounds of truth. Whereas the apostle simply means that he does justice to his ministry, by stating the glorious things which he was commissioned to preach among the Gentiles: blessings which the Jews, by their obstinacy, had forfeited.

Verse 14. Might save some of them.] And yet all these were among the reprobate, or rejected; however, the apostle supposed that none of them was irrecoverably shut out from the divine favour; and that some of them, by his preaching, might be disposed to receive salvation by Christ Jesus.

Verse 15. But life from the dead] If the rejection of the Jews became the occasion of our receiving the Gospel, so that we can even glory in our tribulations, though they themselves became chief instruments of our sufferings; yet so far must we feel from exulting over them, that we should esteem their full conversion to God as great and choice a favour as we would the restoration of a most intimate friend to life, who had been at the gates of death.

The restoration of the Jews to a state of favour with God, to which the apostle refers, and which is too plainly intimated by the spirit of prophecy, to admit of a doubt, will be a most striking event. Their being preserved, as a distinct people, is certainly a strong, collateral proof, that they shall once more be brought into the church of God: and their conversion to Christianity will be an incontestable proof of the truth of Divine Revelation; and doubtless will become the means of converting multitudes of deists, who will see the prophecies of God which had been delivered so long before, so strikingly fulfilled in this great event. We need not wonder if a whole nation should then be born as in a day.

Verse 15. For, if the first-fruit be holy] As the consecrating the first-fruits to God, was the means of drawing down his blessing upon the rest: so the conversion of Abraham to the true faith, and the several Jews who have now embraced Christianity, are pledges that God will, in process of time, admit the whole Jewish nation into his favour again, so that they shall constitute a part of the visible church of Christ.

If the root be holy, so are the branches.] The word holy, in this verse, is to be taken in that sense which it has so frequently in the Old and New Testaments, viz. consecrated, set apart to sacred uses. It must not be forgotten that the first converts to Christ were from among the Jews; these formed the root of the Christian church: these were holy, ἅγιοι, consecrated to God, and those who among the Gentiles were converted by their means, were also ἅγιοι consecrated: but the chief reference is to the ancestors of the Jewish people, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and as these were devoted to God, and received into his covenant; all their posterity, the branches which proceeded from this root, became entitled to the same privileges: and as the root still remains, and the branches also, the descendants from that root still remain: they still have a certain title to the blessings of the covenant; though, because of their obstinate unbelief, these blessings are suspended, as they cannot, even on the ground of the old covenant, enjoy these blessings but through faith: for it was when Abraham believed God, that it was accounted to him for righteousness; and thus he became an heir of the righteousness which is by faith.

Verse 17. And, if some of the branches, &c.] If the present nation of the Jews, because of their unbelief, are cut off from the blessings of the church of God, and the high honour and dignity of being his peculiar people; and thus being a wild olive—ye Gentiles, being without the knowledge of the true God, and consequently bringing forth no fruits of righteousness; wert grafted in among them, are now inserted in the original stock, having been made partakers of the faith of Abraham, and consequently of his blessings; and enjoy, as the people did who sprang from him, the fatness of the olive-tree, the promises made to the patriarchs, and the spiritual privileges of the Jewish church.

Verse 18. Boast not against the branches.
While you are ready to acknowledge that you were included in the covenant made with Abraham, and are now partakers of the same blessings with him; do not exult over, much less insult the branches, his present descendants, whose place you now fill up, according to the election of grace: for, remember ye are not the root, nor do ye bear the root, but the root bears you.
You have not been the means of deriving any blessing on the Jewish people; but through that very people which you may be tempted to despise, all the blessings and excellencies which you enjoy, have been communicated to you.

Verse 19. Thou wilt say then, &c. You may think that you have reason to exult over them; because it is a fact that God has been displeased with them, and therefore has broken them off; has cast them out of the church, and taken you into it in their place:—

Verse 20. Well; because of unbelief, &c.
This statement is all true; but then, consider why is it that they were cast out? Was it not because of their unbelief? And you stand by faith: you were made partakers of these blessings by faith; be not high-minded; let this humble, not exalt you in your own estimation; for if the blessings were received by faith, consequently not by works: and if not by works, you have no merit: and, what you have received, is through the mere mercy of God. They once stood by faith; they gave place to unbelief, and fell: you stand now by faith, but it is as possible for you to be unfaithful, as it was for them; and, consequently, you may fall under the Divine displeasure, as they have done; be not high-minded, but fear; watch over yourselves with godly jealousy.

Verse 21. For if God spared not the natural branches If He, in his infinite justice and holiness, could not tolerate sin in the people whom he foreknew, whom he had so long loved, cherished, miraculously preserved, and blessed; take cause him to act towards you as he has acted towards them, if you sin after the similitude of their transgression: and to this, self-sufficiency and self-confidence, will soon lead you. Remember, therefore, the rock whence you were hewn; and the hole of the pit whence ye were dugged. Depend incessantly on God's free grace, that ye may abide in his favour.

Verse 22. Behold, therefore, the goodness
The exclamation, Behold the goodness of God!
is frequent among the Jewish writers, when they wish to call the attention of men to particular displays of God's mercy; especially towards those who are singularly unworthy. See several instances in Schoetgen.

And severity of God] As χρηστότης, goodness, signifies the essential quality of the Divine nature, the fountain of all good to men and angels;
so ἀποστομία, severity, as it is here translated, signifies that particular exercise of his goodness and holiness which leads him to sever from his mystical body whatsoever would injure, corrupt, or destroy it. The apostle in these verses uses a metaphor taken from ingrafting, ἐκκατάρτισις, whence the verb ἐκκατάρτισα, from ἐκ, in, and κατάρτις, to puncture, because ingrafting was frequently done by making a puncture in the bark of a tree, and then inserting a bud taken from another. This was the practice in the Roman agriculture, as we learn from Virgil, Georg. ii.
ver. 73—

*Nam quæ se medio tradunt de cortice gemmæ, Et tenues rumpunt tunicas; angustus in ipso
Fit nodo sinus: huc alienâ ex arbore germen Includunt; udoque docent inolescere libro.*

For where the tender rinds of trees disclose Their shooting gems, a swelling knot there grows;

Just in that space, a narrow slit we make,
Then other buds from bearing trees we take;
Inserted thus, the wounded rind we close;
In whose moist womb the admitted infant grows.

DRYDEN.

In all countries the principle is the same, though the mode is various.

The apostle having adopted this metaphor as the best he could find, to express that act of God's justice and mercy by which the Jews were rejected, and the Gentiles elected in their stead; and, in order to show that though the Jewish tree was cut down, or its branches lopped off, yet it was not rooted up, he informs the Gentile believers, that as it is customary to insert a good cion in a bad or useless stock, they who were bad, contrary to the custom in such cases, were grafted in a good stock, and their growth and fruitfulness proclaimed the excellence and vegetative life of the stock in which they were inserted. This was the goodness of the heavenly Gardener to them; but it was severity, ἀποτομία, an act of excision to the Jews.

The reader will observe that this term belongs to ingrafting: often, in this operation, a part of a branch is cut off; in that part which remains in connexion with the tree, a little slit is made, and then a small twig or branch, taken from another tree, is, at its lower end, shaved thin, wedge-like, and then inserted in the cleft, after which the whole is tied together, clayed round, &c. and the bark unites to bark; and the stock and the cion become thus one tree, the juices of the old stock circulating through the tubes of the newly inserted twig; and thus both live, though the branch inserted bears a very different fruit from that which the parent stock bore. I have often performed this operation, and in this very way, with success. And I cannot conceive that the apostle could have chosen a more apt, or a more elegant metaphor. The Jewish tree does not bring forth proper fruit; but it will answer well to ingraft a proper fruit-bearing tree on. The Gentiles are a wild olive, which is a tree that bears no fruit; but it may be made to bear if grafted on the Jewish stock. Some of the branches were cut off, that the branches of this wild olive might be inserted: the act by which this insertion is made, is termed χρισμός, goodness, benignity; the act by which the branches of the original stock are broken off, is termed ἀποτομία, excision, from ἀπο, from, and τμήνω, I cut, still keeping the metaphor, taken from ingrafting, in view. Now, let the apostle's mode of reasoning be observed: the tree is cut down, or its branches are lopped off; but the tree is not rooted up. The Jews have stumbled, but not so as to fall irrecoverably; for, if they abide not still in unbelief, they shall be grafted in, ver. 23. The Gentiles, who are grafted in on these cut-off branches, like the cion inserted in another stock, partake of the root, which absorbs from the earth the nutritious juices, and the fatness of the Jewish tree, the blessings and privileges which that people have long enjoyed, in consequence of the Abrahamic covenant, ver. 17. the root, the Jewish covenant, bears them; not they the root, ver. 18. As, therefore, the continuance of the Gentiles, as the church and people of God, depends upon their interest in the Abrahamic covenant, the blessings of which they derive through the medium of the Jews; they should be grateful to God, and tolerant to those through whom they have received such blessings. And as in the case of grafting, the prosperity of the ingrafted cion depends on the existence of the parent stock; so the continuance of the Gentiles in this state of favour, (following the metaphor,) in a certain way, depends on the continuance of the Jewish people: and they are preserved, as so many cions, which are in process of time, to be ingrafted on the Gentiles; and thus the Gentiles shall become the means of salvation to the Jews; as the Jews have been the means of salvation to the Gentiles. Following, therefore, the metaphor a little further, which seems to have been so well chosen in all its parts; the continued existence of the Jews, as a distinct people, together with the acknowledgment of the Gentiles, that they have derived their salvation and state of blessedness through them; of which Jesus Christ, born of the stock of David, is the Author; and the Jewish Scriptures, which the Gentiles receive as inspired by God, are the evidences; then, the restoration of the Jews to the favour of God, is a necessary consequence: and, indeed, seems to be the principal end in reference to which the apostle reasons. The Gentiles, however, are to take care that the restoration of the Jews be not at their expense; as their calling and election were at the expense of the Jews; the latter being cut off, that the former might be grafted in, ver. 19. Of this there is no kind of necessity, for the original stock, the Abrahamic covenant, is sufficient to receive them all; and so Jews and Gentiles become one eternal flock, under one Bishop and Shepherd of all their souls.

Verse 23. If they abide not in unbelief] So, we find that their rejection took place in consequence of their wilful obstinacy: and, that they may return into the fold, the door of which still stands open.

For God is able to graft them in again.] Fallen as they are, and degraded, God can, in the course of his providence and mercy, restore them to all their forfeited privileges; and this will take place if they abide not in unbelief; which intimates, that God has furnished them with all the power and means necessary for faith; and that they may believe on the Lord Jesus whenever they will. The vail now continues on their heart, but it is not a vail which God has spread there, but a vail occasioned by their own voluntary and obstinate unbelief: and when they shall turn to the Lord (Jesus) the vail shall be taken away. See what the apostle has said, 2 Cor. iii. 6—18.

Verse 24. The olive-tree, which is wild by nature] Which is κατὰ φύσιν, naturally wild and barren; for, that the wild olive bore no fruit, is sufficiently evident from the testimony of the authors who have written on the subject: hence

A. M. cir. 4062. A. D. cir. 58. An. Olymp. cir. CCIX. 2. A. U. C. cir. 811. contrary to nature into a good olive-tree; how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive-tree?

25 For, I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own a Ch. 12. 16.—b ver. 7. 2 Cor. 3. 14.—c Or, hardness.

the proverb Ακαρποτερος αγκριπτον; more unfruitful than the wild olive. Λακεδαιμονιοι γαρ αγκρια ωλαια, αγκριπτον καλωσι· for the Lacedemonians term the wild olive αγκριπτον. See SUIDAS. And hence HESYCHIUS interprets Αγκριαλοι, the wild olive, (the word used here by St. Paul,) by ακαρπος, unfruitful: and the reason given in DIOGEN. Proverb. Cent. ii. n. 63, is οφειλον γαρ εστιν ο αγκριπτος ακαρπος· for the wild olive is an unfruitful tree. On this account the apostle very properly says, Thou wert cut, ω της κατα φωνην αγκριαλου, out of that olive which is uncultivated, because it is barren: the κατα φωνην does not refer here to its being naturally barren; but to its being commonly, or customarily permitted to remain so. And, that this is the import of the phrase here, is evident from the next clause of the verse.

And wert grafted contrary to nature] Παρὰ φωνην, contrary to all custom; for a cion taken from a barren or useless tree, is scarcely ever known to be grafted into a good stock: but here the Gentiles, a fruitless and sinful race, are grafted on the ancient patriarchal stock. Now, if it was possible to effect such a change in the state and disposition of the Gentiles, who were αβησιν ω τω κοσμου, Eph. ii. 12. without God, ATHEISTS in the world: how much more possible is it, speaking after the manner of men, to bring about a similar change in the Jews, who acknowledge the one only, and true God; and receive the law and the prophets as a revelation from him. This seems to be the drift of the apostle's argument.

Verse 25. I would not—that ye should be ignorant of this mystery] Mystery, μυστηριον, signifies any thing that is hidden, or covered, or not fully made manifest. The Greek word seems to have been borrowed from the Hebrew שָׁמַר satar, from the root שָׁר satar, to hide, conceal, &c. though some derive it from μυσθαι, to be initiated into sacred rites, from μυσν, to shut up. In the New Testament, it signifies, generally, any thing; or doctrine that has not, in former times, been fully known to men: or, something that has not been heard of; or which is so deep, profound, and difficult of comprehension, that it cannot be apprehended without special direction and instruction; here, it signifies the doctrine of the future restoration of the Jews, not fully known in itself, and not at all known as to the time in which it will take place. In chap. xvi. 25. it means the Christian religion, not known till the advent of Christ. The apostle wished the Romans not to be ignorant of this mystery, viz. that such a thing was intended: and, in order to give them as much instruction as possible on conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in.

26 (And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob.

this subject, he gives them some characteristic, or sign of the times when it was to take place.

Lest ye should be wise in your own conceits] It seems from this, and from other expressions in this epistle, that the converted Gentiles had not behaved towards the Jews with that decorum and propriety which the relation they bore to them required. In this chapter the apostle strongly guards them against giving way to such a disposition.

Blindness in part is happened to Israel] Partial blindness, or blindness to a part of them; for they were not all unbelievers: several thousands of them had been converted to the Christian faith; though the body of the nation, and especially its rulers, civil and spiritual, continued opposed to Christ and his doctrine.

Until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in.] And this blindness will continue till the church of the Gentiles be fully completed; till the Gospel be preached through all the nations of the earth, and multitudes of heathens every where embrace the faith. The words πληρωμα των εθνων, may be borrowed from the מלכות מלכות melo hagoyim, a multitude of nations, which the Septuagint translate by πληθος εθνων. By the πληρωμα, or fulness, a great multitude may be intended; which should be so dilated on every hand as to fill various regions. In this sense the words were understood by Solomon ben Melec, ארצות הברית יסופלו ארצות הברית The nations of the Gentiles shall be filled with them: the apostle, therefore, seems to give this sense of the mystery, that the Jews will continue in a state of blindness, till such a time as a multitude of nations or Gentiles, shall be converted to the Christian faith: and the Jews, hearing of this, shall be excited, by a spirit of emulation, to examine and acknowledge the validity of the proofs of Christianity, and embrace the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ.

We should not restrict the meaning of these words too much, by imagining—1. That the fulness must necessarily mean all the nations of the universe; and all the individuals of those nations: probably no more than a general spread of Christianity over many nations which are now under the influence of Pagan or Mohammedan superstition, may be what is intended.

2. We must not suppose that the coming in here mentioned, necessarily means what most religious persons understand by conversion, a thorough change of the whole heart and the whole life; the acknowledgment of the Divine mission of our Lord, and a cordial embracing of the Christian religion, will sufficiently fulfil the apostle's words. If we wait for the conversion of the Jews till such a time as every Gentile and Mohammedan soul shall be, in this especial sense, converted to God, then—we shall wait for ever.

Verse 26. And so all Israel shall be saved] Shall be brought into the way of salvation, by acknowledging the Messiah; for the word certainly does not mean eternal glory: for, no man can conceive that a time will ever come, in which every Jew, then living, shall be taken to the kingdom of glory. The term saved, as applied to the Israelites in different parts of the Scripture, signifies no more than their being gathered out of the nations of the world; separated to God, and possessed of the high privilege of being his peculiar people. And we know that this is the meaning of the term, by finding it applied to the body of the Israelites when this alone was the sum of their state. See the Preface, page vi. &c.

As it is written] The apostle supports what he advances on this head, by a quotation from Scripture, which in the main, is taken from Isa. lix. 20. The Deliverer shall come out of Zion, and turn away ungodliness from Jacob. Now this cannot be understood of the manifestation of Christ among the Jews; or of the multitudes which were converted before, at, and for some time after, the day of Pentecost; for those times were all past when the apostle wrote this epistle, which was probably about the 57th or 58th year of our Lord: and, as no remarkable conversion of that people has since taken place, therefore, the fulfilment of this prophecy is yet to take place. In what manner Christ is to come out of Zion; and in what way, or by what means he is to turn away transgression from Jacob, we cannot tell; and to attempt to conjecture, when the time, occasion, means, &c. are all in mystery, would be more than reprehensible.

Verse 27. For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins.] The reader, on referring to Isa. chap. lix. 20, 21. will find that the words of the original are here greatly abridged. They are the following:

And the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the Lord. As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the Lord, My Spirit that is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and for ever.

For the manner in which St. Paul makes his quotations from Scripture, see the observations at the end of the preceding chapter. The whole of these two verses should be read in a parenthesis, as I have marked them in the text; for it is evident that the 25th verse should be immediately connected with the 28th.

It may not be amiss to subjoin here a collection of those texts in the Old Testament that seem to point out a restoration of the Jewish commonwealth, to a higher degree of excellence than it has yet attained.—Isa. ii. 2—5. xix. 24, 25. xxv. 6, &c. xxx. 18, 19, 26. lx. throughout: lxxv. 17. to the end: JEREM. xxxi. 10, 11, 12. xlvi. 27, 28. MICAH iv. 3—7. vii. 18, 19, 20. ZEPH. iii. 19, 20.

Verse 28. As concerning the Gospel] The unbelieving Jews, with regard to the Gospel, which they have rejected, are at present enemies to God, and aliens from his kingdom, under his Son Jesus Christ, on account of that extensive grace which has overturned their peculiarly, by admitting the Gentiles into his church and family: but with regard to the original purpose of election, whereby they were chosen and separated from all the people of the earth, to be the peculiar people of God, they are beloved for the fathers' sakes; he has still favour in store for them, on account of their forefathers, the patriarchs.

Verse 29. For the gifts and calling of God, &c.] The gifts which God has bestowed upon them; and the calling, the invitation with which he has favoured them, he will never revoke. In reference to this point, there is no change of mind in him; and, therefore, the possibility and certainly of their restoration to their original privileges of being the people of God, of enjoying every spiritual blessing with the fulness of the Gentiles, may be both reasonably and safely inferred.

Repentance, when applied to God, signifies simply change of purpose relative to some declaration made subject to certain conditions. See this fully explained and illustrated by himself. Jer. xviii. 7, 8, 9.

Verse 30. For as ye in times past] The apostle pursues his argument in favour of the restoration of the Jews. As ye Gentiles, in times past, for many ages back;

Have not believed] Were in a state of alienation from God; yet, not so as to be totally and for ever excluded:

Have now obtained mercy] For ye are now taken into the kingdom of the Messiah; through their unbelief, by that method which, in destroying the Jewish peculiarly, and fulfilling the Abrahamic covenant, has occasioned the unbelief and obstinate opposition of the Jews.

Verse 31. Even so have these also] In like manner the Jews are, through their infidelity, shut out of the kingdom of God:—

That through your mercy] But this exclusion will not be everlasting, but this will serve to open a new scene, when through further displays of mercy to you Gentiles, they also may obtain mercy; shall be received into the kingdom of God again; and this shall take place whenever they shall consent to acknowledge the Lord Jesus, and see it their privilege to be the fellow-heirs with the Gentiles of the grace of life.

As sure, therefore, as the Jews were once in the kingdom, and the Gentiles were not; as sure as the Gentiles are now in the kingdom, and the Jews are not: so surely will the Jews be brought back into that kingdom.

Verse 32. For God hath concluded them all in unbelief] Συμπελασιν γαρ ε̅ς̅ Θεου; God hath shut, or locked them all up under unbelief. This refers to the guilty state of both Jews and Gentiles. They had all broken God's law; the Jews, the written law; the Gentiles, the law written in their hearts; see chap. i. 19, 20. and ii. 14, 15. They are represented here as having been accused of their transgressions; tried at God's bar; found guilty on being tried; condemned to the death they had merited: remanded to prison, till the sovereign will, relative to their execution, should be announced; shut or locked up under the jailor Unbelief; and there, both continued in the same state, awaiting the execution of their sentence; but God, in his own compassion, moved by no merit in either party, caused a general pardon, by the Gospel, to be proclaimed to all. The Jews have refused to receive this pardon on the terms which God has proposed it; and therefore continue locked up under unbelief. The Gentiles have welcomed the offers of grace, and are delivered out of their prison. But as the offers of mercy continue to be made to all indiscriminately, the time will come, when the Jews, seeing the vast accession of the Gentile world to the kingdom of the Messiah, and the glorious privileges which they in consequence enjoy, shall also lay bold on the hope set before them, and thus become, with the Gentiles, one flock under one Shepherd and Bishop of all their souls. The same figure is used Gal. iii. 22, 23. But the Scripture hath concluded, συμπελασιν, locked up all under sin, that the promise by faith of Christ Jesus, might be given to them that believe. But before faith came, we were kept, εφρουρουμεθα, we were guarded as in a strong hold, under the law; shut up, συγκληισμομαι, locked up together into the faith which should afterward be revealed. This is a fine and well chosen metaphor in both places, and forcibly expresses the guilty, helpless, wretched state of both Jews and Gentiles.

Verse 33. O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God!] This is a very proper conclusion of the whole preceding discourse. Wisdom may here refer to the designs of God; knowledge to the means which he employs to accomplish these designs. The designs are the offspring of infinite wisdom, and therefore they are all right: the means are the most proper, as being the choice of an infinite knowledge that cannot err; we may safely credit the goodness of the design, founded in infinite wisdom: we may rely on the due accomplishment of the end, because the means are chosen and applied by infinite knowledge and skill.

Verse 34. For who hath known the mind of the Lord?] Who can pretend to penetrate the counsels of God; or fathom the reasons of his conduct? His designs and his counsels are, like himself, infinite; and, consequently, inscrutable. It is strange that, with such a scripture as this before their eyes, men should sit down, and coolly, and positively write about counsels and decrees of God, formed from all eternity, of which they speak with as much confidence and decision, as if they had formed a part of the council of the Most High; and had been with him in the beginning of his ways! A certain writer, after having entered into all these counsels, and drawn out his black-lined scheme of absolute and eternal reprobation, with all its causes and effects; and then his light-lined scheme of absolute and eternal election, with all its causes and effects; all deduced in the most regular and graduated order, link by link, concludes with ver. 33. O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and the knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! But this writer forgot that he had searched out God's judgments in the one case, and found out his ways in the other; and that he had given, as a proof of the success of his researches, a complete exhibition of the whole scheme! This conduct is worthy of more than mere reprehension; and yet he who differs from such opinions, gives, in the apprehension of some, this proof of his being included in some of the links of the black list! We may rest with the conviction, that God is as merciful and good in all his ways, as He is wise and just. But, as we cannot comprehend him, neither can we his operations; it is our place, who are the objects of his infinite mercy and kindness, to adore in silence, and to obey with alacrity and delight.

Verse 35. Or, who hath first given to him] Who can pretend to have any demands upon God? To whom is he indebted? Have either Jews or Gentiles any right to his blessings? May not he bestow his favours as he pleases, and to whom he pleases? Does he do any injustice to the Jews in choosing the Gentiles? And was it because he was under obligation to the Gentiles, that he has chosen them in the place of the Jews? Let him who has any claim on God prefer it, and he shall be compensated.

But how can the CREATOR be indebted to the creature? How can the CAUSE be dependent on the effect? How can the AUTHOR of providence, and the FATHER of every good and perfect gift, be under obligation to them for whom he provides, and who are wholly dependent on his bounty?

Verse 36. For of him, &c.] This is so far from being the case, for εξ αυτου, or him, as the original Designer and Author; and δι αυτου, by him, as the prime and efficient Cause; and εις αυτου, to him, as the ultimate End for the manifestation of his eternal glory and goodness, are all things in universal nature, through the whole compass of time and eternity.

The Emperor Marcus Antoninus, (see avor, lib. iv.) has a saying very much like this of St. Paul, which it is very probable he borrowed from this Epistle to the Romans. Speaking of nature, whom he addresses as God, he says, ἡ φυσικὴ, ἐκ σου πάντα, ἐν σοὶ πάντα, εἰς σε πάντα; O, nature! or thee are all things; in thee are all things; to thee are all things. Several of the Gentile philosophers had expressions of the same import, as may be seen in Welstein's quotations.

To whom be glory] And let him have the praise of all his works, from the hearts and mouths of all his intelligent creatures, for ever, throughout all the generations of men. Amen, so be it; let this be established for ever!

I. The apostle considers the designs of God inscrutable: and his mode of governing the world incomprehensible. His designs, schemes, and ends, are all infinite; and consequently unfathomable. It is impossible to account for the dispensations either of his justice or mercy. He does things under both these characters which far surpass the comprehension of men. But though his dispensations are a great deep, yet they are never self-contradictory: though they far surpass our reason, yet they never contradict reason; nor are they ever opposite to those ideas which God has implanted in man of goodness, justice, mercy, and truth. But it is worthy of remark, that we can more easily account for the dispensations of his justice, than we can for the dispensations of his mercy.—We can every where see ten thousand reasons why he should display his justice; but scarcely can we find one reason why he should display his mercy. And yet, these displays of mercy, for which we can scarcely find a reason, are infinitely greater and more numerous than his displays of justice; for which the reasons are, in a vast variety of cases, as obvious as they are multiplied. The sacrifice of Christ is certainly an infinite reason why God should extend, as he does, his mercy to all men; but Jesus Christ is the gift of God's love; who can account for the love that gave him to redeem a fallen world! The Jews have fallen under the displeasure of Divine justice; why they should be objects of this displeasure is at once seen, in their ingratitude, disobedience, unbelief, and rebellion. But a most especial providence has watched over them, and preserved them in all their dispersions for 1700 years. Who can account for this? Again, these very persons have a most positive promise of a future deliverance, both great and glorious.

Why should this be? The Gentile world was long left without a divine revelation, while the Jews enjoyed one:—Who can account for this? The Jews are now cast out of favour, in a certain sense, and the reasons of it are sufficiently obvious; and the Gentiles, without any apparent reason, are taken into favour. In all these things his judgments are unsearchable, and his ways past finding out.

II. Once more let it be remarked, that although God is every where promising, and bestowing the greatest and most ennobling privileges, together with an eternal and ineffable glory, for which we can give no reason but his own endless goodness, through the death of his Son; yet in no case does he remove those privileges, nor exclude from this glory, but where the reasons are most obvious to the meanest capacity.

III. This epistle has been thought, by some, to afford proofs that God, by an eternal decree, had predestinated to eternal perdition millions of millions of human souls, before they had any existence, except in his own purpose, and for no other reason but his sovereign pleasure! But such a decree can be no more found in this book, than such a disposition in the mind of Him who is the perfection, as he is the model of wisdom, goodness, justice, mercy and truth. May God save the reader from profaning his name, by suppositions, at once so monstrous, impious, and absurd!

CHAPTER XII.

Such displays of God's mercy as Jews and Gentiles have received, should induce them to consecrate themselves to Him; and not to be conformed to the world, 1, 2. Christians are exhorted to think meanly of themselves, 8. And each to behave himself properly in the office which he has received from God, 4-8. Various important moral duties recommended, 9-18. We must not avenge ourselves, but overcome evil with good, 19-21.

NOTES ON CHAP. XII.

The apostle having now finished the doctrinal part of this epistle, proceeds to the practical: and here it may be necessary to take a view of his arguments in the preceding chapters.

The election, calling, and justification, of the believing Gentiles, and their being admitted into the kingdom and covenant of God, and having an interest in all the privileges and honours of his children. (1.) That they have a clear and substantial title to all these he has proved in chap. i. ii. and iii. (2.) That this right is set on the same footing with Abraham's title to the blessings of the covenant, he proves chap. iv. (3.) That it gives us a title to privileges and blessings as great as any the Jews could glory in, by virtue of that covenant, chap. v. 1-12. (4.) He goes still higher, and shows that our being interested in the gift and grace of God in Christ Jesus, is perfectly agreeable to the grace which he has bestowed upon all mankind, in delivering them from that death of the body brought on them by Adam's transgression, chap. v. 12-21. (5.) He fully explains, both with regard to the Gentiles and Jews, the nature of the Gospel constitution, in relation to its obligations to holiness; and the advantages it gives for encouragement, obedience, and support, under the severest trials and persecutions, chap. vi. vii. viii. (6.) As the pretences of the Jews, that "God was bound, by express promise, to continue them as his only people for ever; and that this was directly inconsistent with the election and calling of the Gentiles, on the condition of faith alone:" he demonstrates that the rejection of the Jews is consistent with the truth of God's word, and with his righteousness: he shows the true cause and reason of their rejection; and concludes with an admirable discourse upon the extent and duration of it; which he closes with adoration of the Divine wisdom, in his various dispensations, chap. ix. x. xi. Thus, having cleared this important subject with surprising judgment, and the nicest art and skill in writing; he now proceeds, after his usual manner, in his epistles and the apostolic method of preaching, to inculcate various Christian duties: and to exhort to that temper of mind, and conduct of life, which are suitable to the profession of the Gospel, and the enjoyment of its privileges. Dr. Taylor.

Verse 1. I beseech you, therefore, brethren] This address is probably intended both for the Jews and the Gentiles; though some suppose that the Jews are addressed in the first verse; the Gentiles, in the second.

By the mercies of God] Δια τῶν οἰκτιρῶν τοῦ Θεοῦ by the tender mercies, or compassions of God, such as a tender father shows to his refractory children; to whom, on their humiliation, he is easily persuaded to forgive their offences. The word οἰκτιρισμός comes from οἰκτός, compassion; and that from ἔκω, to yield; because he that has compassionate feelings, is easily prevailed on to do a kindness, or remit an injury.

Ye present your bodies] A metaphor taken from bringing sacrifices to the altar of God. The person offering picked out the choicest of his flock, brought it to the altar, and presented it there as an atonement for his sin. They are exhorted to give themselves up in the spirit of sacrifice; to be as wholly the Lord's property as the whole burnt-offering was; no part being devoted to any other use.

A living sacrifice] In opposition to those dead sacrifices which they were in the habit of offering, while in their Jewish state: and that they should have the lusts of the flesh mortified, that they might live to God.

Holy] Without spot or blemish; referring still to the sacrifice required by the law.

Acceptable unto God] Ευαριστος, the sacrifice being perfect in its kind; and the intention of the offerer being such, that both can be acceptable and well pleasing to God, who searches the heart. All these phrases are sacrificial, and show that there must be a complete surrender of the person; the body, the whole man, mind, and flesh, to be given to God: and that he is to consider himself no more his own, but the entire property of his Maker.

Your reasonable service] Nothing can be more consistent with reason, than that the work of God should glorify its Author. We are not our own; we are the property of the Lord, by the right of creation and redemption: and it would be as unreasonable as it would be wicked, not to live to his glory, in strict obedience to his will. The reasonable service, λογικὴ λατρεία, of the apostle may refer to the difference between the Jewish and Christian worship. The former religious service consisted chiefly in its sacrifices, which were δὲ ἀλογον, of irrational tional creatures; i. e. the lambs, rams, kids, bulls, goats, &c. which were offered under the law. The Christian service of worship is λογικη, rational, because performed according to the true intent and meaning of the law; the heart and soul being engaged in the service. He alone lives the life of a fool and a madman, who lives the life of a sinner against God: for, in sinning against his Maker, he wrongs his own soul, loves death, and rewards evil unto himself.

Verse 2. And be not conformed to this world] By this world, αἰωνι τωτα, may be understood that present state of things both among the Jews and Gentiles; the customs and fashions of the people who then lived; the Gentiles particularly, who had neither the power nor the form of godliness; though some think that the Jewish economy, frequently termed הנהגת עולם הזה hazzeh, this world, this peculiar state of things, is alone intended. And the apostle warns them against reviving usages that Christ had abolished: this exhortation still continues in full force. The world that now is, this present state of things, is as much opposed to the spirit of genuine Christianity, as the world that then was. Pride, luxury, vanity, extravagance in dress, and riotous living, prevail now, as they did then; and are as unworthy of a Christian's pursuit, as they are injurious to his soul, and hateful in the sight of God.

Be ye transformed] Μεταμορφωθητε, be ye metamorphosed, transformed, appear as new persons, and with new habits; as God has given you a new form of worship, so that ye serve in the newness of the Spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter. The word implies a radical, thorough, and universal change, both outward and inward. SENECA, Epist. vi. shows us the force of this word, when used in a moral sense. Sentio, says he, non emendari me tantum, sed transformari; "I perceive myself not to be amended merely, but to be transformed:." i. e. entirely renewed.

By the renewing of your mind] Let the inward change produce the outward. Where the spirit, the temper and disposition of the mind, Eph. iv. 23. is not renewed; an outward change is but of little worth, and but of short standing.

That ye may prove] Εἰς το δοκιμαζειν, that ye may have practical proof and experimental knowledge of the will of God; of his purpose and determination, which is good in itself; infinitely so. Acceptable, ωσπερ, well pleasing to, and well received by every mind that is renewed and transformed.

And perfect] Τωτων, finished and complete:

when the mind is renewed, and the whole life changed, then the will of God is perfectly fulfilled; for this is its grand design in reference to every human being.

These words are supposed by Schoetgen to refer entirely to the Jewish law. The Christians were to renounce this world, the Jewish state of things; to be transformed, by having their minds enlightened in the pure and simple Christian worship, that they might prove the grand characteristic difference between the two covenants: the latter being good, in opposition to the statutes which were not good, Ezek. xx. 25. acceptable, in opposition to those sacrifices and offerings which God would not accept, as it is written Psa. xl. 6—8. and perfect, in opposition to that system which was imperfect, and which made nothing perfect; and was only the shadow of good things to come. There are both ingenuity and probability in this view of the subject.

Verse 3. Through the grace given unto me] By the grace given, St. Paul most certainly means his apostolical office, by which he had the authority not only to preach the Gospel; but also to rule the church of Christ. This is the meaning of the word, ἡ χάρις, in Eph. iii. 8. Unto me who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given; is conceded this office or employment, immediately by God himself; That I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ.

Not to think—more highly] Μη υπερβαρειν, not to act proudly; to arrogate nothing to himself on account of any grace he had received, or of any office committed to him.

But to think soberly] Αλλα σφροτιν με το σφροτιν: the reader will perceive here a sort of paronomasia, or play upon words; σφροτιν, from σφρον, the mind, signifies to think, mind, relish, to be of opinion, &c. and σφροτιν, from σφρον, sound, and σφρον, the mind, signifies to be of a sound mind; to think discreetly, modestly, humbly. Let no man think himself more or greater than God has made him; and let him know that whatever he is, or has of good or excellence, he has it from God; and that the glory belongs to the Giver, and not to him who has received the gift.

Measure of faith] Μετρον πιστευεω: It is very likely, as Dr. Moore has conjectured, that the πισις, faith, here used, means the Christian religion; and the measure, the degree of knowledge and experience which each had received in it, and the power this gave him of being useful in the church of God. See ver. 6.

Verse 4. For as we have many members] As the human body consists of many parts, each having its respective office, and all contributing to the perfection and support of the whole; each being indispensably necessary in the place which it occupies, and each equally useful, though performing a different function.

Verse 5. So we, being many] We who are members of the church of Christ, which is considered the body of which he is the Head, have various offices assigned to us, according to the measure of grace, faith, and religious knowledge which we possess : and, although each has a different office, and qualifications suitable to that office, yet all belong to the same body; and each has as much need of the help of another as that other has of his : therefore, let there be neither pride on the one hand, nor envy on the other. The same metaphor, in nearly the same words, is used in Synopsis Sohar, page 13. "As man is divided into various members and joints, united among themselves, and raised by gradations above each other, and collectively compose one body : so all created things are members orderly disposed ; and altogether constitute one body. In like manner, the law, distributed into various articulations, constitutes but one body." See Schoetgen.

Verse 6. Having then gifts, differing, &c.] As the goodness of God, with this view of our mutual subserviency and usefulness, has endowed us with different gifts and qualifications ; let each apply himself to the diligent improvement of his particular office and talent : and modestly keep within the bounds of it, not exalting himself, or despising others.

Whether prophecy] That prophecy, in the New Testament, often means the gift of exhorting, preaching, or expounding the Scriptures, is evident from many places in the Gospels, Acts, and St. Paul's Epistles, see 1 Cor. xi. 4, 5. and especially 1 Cor. xiv. 3. He that prophesieth, speaketh unto men, to edification, and exhortation, and to comfort. This was the proper office of a preacher ; and it is to the exercise of this office that the apostle refers in the whole of the chapter, from which the above quotations are made. See also Luke i. 76. vii. 23. Acts xiv. 32. 1 Cor. xiv. 29. I think the apostle uses the term in the same sense here— Let every man who has the gift of preaching and interpreting the Scriptures, do it in proportion to the grace and light he has received from God ; and in no case arrogate to himself knowledge which he has not received : let him not esteem himself more highly on account of this gift, or affect to be wise above what is written ; or indulge himself in fanciful interpretations of the word of God.

Dr. Taylor observes, that the measure of ording to the grace that is given to us, whether ^d prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith ;

faith, ver. 3. and the proportion of faith, ver. 6. seem not to relate to the degree of any gift considered in itself, but rather in the relation and proportion which it bore to the gifts of others. For it is plain, that he is here exhorting every man to keep soberly within his own sphere. It is natural to suppose that the new converts might be puffed up with the several gifts that were bestowed upon them : and every one might be forward to magnify his own, to the disparagement of others. Therefore the apostle advises them to keep each within his proper sphere ; to know and observe the just measures and proportion of the gift intrusted to him, not to gratify his pride, but to edify the church.

The Αναλογία της πίστης, which we here translate the proportion of faith, and which some render the analogy of faith, has been understood to mean, the general and consistent plan or scheme of doctrines, delivered in the Scriptures ; where every thing bears its true relation and proportion to another. Thus the death of Christ is commensurate, in its merits, to the evils produced by the fall of Adam. The doctrine of justification by faith, bears the strictest analogy, or proportion, to the grace of Christ, and the helpless, guilty, condemned state of man. Whereas, the doctrine of justification by works, is out of all analogy to the demerit of sin, the perfection of the law, the holiness of God, and the miserable, helpless state of man. This may be a good general view of the subject ; but when we come to inquire what those mean by the analogy of faith, who are most frequent in the use of the term, we shall find that it means neither more nor less than their own creed ; and, though they tell you that their doctrines are to be examined by the Scriptures, yet they give you roundly to know, that you are to understand these Scriptures in precisely the same way as they have interpreted them. " To the law and to the testimony," says Dr. Campbell, " is the common cry ; only every one, the better to secure the decision on the side he has espoused, would have you previously resolve to put no sense whatever on the law and the testimony but what his favourite doctor will admit. Thus they run on in a shuffling, circular sort of argument ; which, though they studiously avoid exposing, is, when dragged into the open light, neither more nor less than this : ' You are to try our doctrine by the Scriptures only ; but then you are to be very careful that you explain the Scripture solely by our doctrine.' A wonderful plan of trial, which begins with giving judgment, and ends with examining the proof, wherein the whole skill and ingenuity of the judges are to be exerted in wresting the evi-

Verse 7. Or ministry] Διακονία simply means the office of a deacon; and what this office was, see in the note on Acts vi. 4. where the subject is largely discussed.

Or he that teacheth] The teacher, Διδασκαλος, was a person whose office it was to instruct others, whether by catechising, or simply explaining the grand truths of Christianity.

Verse 8. Or he that exhorteth] Ὁ παρακαλῶν, the person who admonished, and reprehended the unruly or disorderly; and who supported the weak, and comforted the penitents, and those who were under heaviness through manifold temptations.

He that giveth] He who distributeth the alms of the church, with simplicity; being influenced by no partiality, but dividing to each according to the necessity of his case.

He that ruleth] Ὁ προϊστάμενος, he that presides over a particular business; but as the verb πρόϊσταμαι, also signifies to defend or patronise, it is probably used here to signify receiving and providing for strangers; and especially the persecuted, who were obliged to leave their own homes, and were destitute, afflicted, and tormented. It might also imply the persons whose business it was to receive and entertain the apostolic teachers who travelled from place to place, establishing and confirming the churches. In this sense the word προστατις is applied to Phebe, chap. xvi. 2. She hath been a succourer of many, and of myself also. The apostle directs that this office should be executed with diligence; that such destitute persons should have their necessities as promptly and as amply supplied as possible.

He that sheweth mercy] Let the person who is called to perform any act of compassion, or mercy to the wretched, do it, not grudgingly, nor of necessity, but from a spirit of pure benevolence and sympathy. The poor are often both wicked and worthless; and if those who are called to minister to them as stewards, overseers, &c. do not take care, they will get their hearts hardened with the frequent proofs they will have of deception, lying, idleness, &c. And on this account it is that so many of those who have been called to minister to the poor in parishes, work-houses, and religious societies, when they come to relinquish their employment, find that many of their moral feelings have been considerably blunted; and perhaps the only re-

Verse 9. Let love be without dissimulation] Ἡ ἀγάπη ἀνυποκριτος. Have no hypocritical love; let not your love wear a mask; make no empty professions. Love God and your neighbour; and by obedience to the one, and acts of benevolence to the other, show that your love is sincere.

Abhor that which is evil] Ἀποσυγγεντες το πονηρον. Hate sin as you would hate that hell to which it leads. Στυγω, signifies to hate, or detest with horror; the preposition απο, greatly strengthens the meaning. Στυξ, Styx, was a feigned river in hell, by which the gods were wont to swear; and if any of them falsified this oath, he was deprived of his nectar and ambrosia for a hundred years: hence the river was reputed to be hateful; and συγω signified to be as hateful as hell. Two MSS. read μισουντες, which signifies hating, in the lowest sense of the term. The word in the text is abundantly more expressive; and our translation is both nervous and appropriate.

Cleave to that which is good.] Καλλωμενοι το αγαθον, be CEMENTED, or GLUED to that which is good: so the word literally signifies. Have an unalterable attachment to whatever leads to God, and contributes to the welfare of your fellow-creatures.

Verse 10. Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love.] It is difficult to give a simple translation of the original: τη φιλαδελφια με αλληλους φιλοστοργειν. The word φιλαδελφια, signifies that affectionate regard which every Christian should feel for another, as being members of the same mystical body. Hence it is emphatically termed the love of the brethren. When William Penn, of deservedly famous memory, made a treaty with the Indians in North America, and purchased from them a large woody tract, which, after its own nature and his name, he called Pennsylvania, he built a city on it, and peopled it with Christians of his own denomination; and called the city from the word in the text, φιλαδελφια, PHILADELPHIA; an appellation which it then bore with strict propriety; and still it bears the name.

The word φιλοστοργος, which we here translate kindly affectioned, from φιλος and στοργη, signifies that tender and indescribable affection, which a mother bears to her child: and which almost all creatures manifest towards their young: and the word φιλος, or φιλω, joined to it, signifies a delight in it. Feel the tenderest affection towards each other; and delight to feel it. "Love a brother Christian with the affection of a natural brother."

In honour preferring one another] The meaning appears to be this: consider all your brethren as more worthy than yourself; and let neither grief nor envy affect your mind at seeing another honoured and yourself neglected. This is a hard lesson, and very few persons learn it thoroughly. If we wish to see our brethren honoured; still it is with the secret condition in our own minds, that we be honoured more than they. We have no objection to the elevation of others, providing we may be at the head. But who can bear even to be what he calls neglected? I once heard the following conversation between two persons, which the reader will pardon my relating in this place, as it appears to be rather in point. "I know not," said one, "that I neglect to do anything in my power to promote the interest of true religion in this place; and yet I seem to be held in very little repute, scarcely any person even noticing me." To which the other replied: "My good friend, set yourself down for nothing, and if any person takes you for something, it will be all clear gain." I thought, this is a queer saying; but how full of meaning and common sense! Whether the object of this good counsel was profited by it, I cannot tell; but I looked on it, and received instruction.

Verse 11. Not slothful in business] That God, who forbade working on the seventh day, has, by the same authority, enjoined it on the other six days. He who neglects to labour during the week, is as culpable as he is who works on the Sabbath. An idle, slothful person, can never be a Christian.

Fervent in spirit] Το πνευματι ζωντι: do nothing at any time, but what is to the glory of God, and do every thing as unto him; and in every thing let your hearts be engaged. Be always in earnest, and let your heart ever accompany your hand.

Serving the Lord] Ever considering that his eye is upon you, and that you are accountable to him for all that you do; and that you should do every thing so as to please him. In order to this, there must be simplicity in the INTENTION; and purity in the AFFECTIONS.

Instead of το κυριω δουλωσντι, serving the Lord, several MSS. as DFG. and many editions, have το καιρο δουλωσντι, serving the time, embracing the opportunity. This reading Griesbach has received into the text; and most critics contend for its authenticity. Except the Codex Claromontanus, the Codex Augiensis, and the Codex Boernerianus, the first a MS. of the 7th or 8th century; the others of the 9th or 10th, marked in Griesbach by the letters DFG. all the other MSS. of this epistle have κυριω, the Lord; a reading in which all the Versions concur. καιρο, the time, is not found in the two original editions; that of Complutum, in 1514, which is the first edition of the Greek Testament ever printed; and that of Erasmus, in 1516, which is the first edition published; the former having been suppressed for several years, after it was finished at the press. As in the ancient MSS. the word καιρο is written contractedly κη some appear to have read it καιρο, instead of κυριω; but I confess I do not see sufficient reason, after all that the critics have said, to depart from the common reading.

Verse 12. Rejoicing in hope] Of that glory of God, that to each faithful follower of Christ shall shortly be revealed.

Patient in tribulation] Remembering that what you suffer as Christians, you suffer for Christ's sake: and it is to his honour, and the honour of your Christian profession, that you suffer it with an even mind.

Continuing instant in prayer.] Προσηκουσντι, making the most fervent and intense application to the throne of grace, for the light and power of the Holy Spirit; without which you can neither abhor evil, do good, love the brethren, entertain a comfortable hope, nor bear up patiently under the tribulations and ills of life.

Verse 13. Distributing to the necessity of saints] Relieve your poor brethren, according to the power which God has given you. Do good unto all men, but especially to them which are of the household of faith. Instead of χρησναι, necessities, some ancient MSS. have μνησναι, memorials; distributing to the memorials of the saints, which some interpret as referring to saints that were absent; as if he had said, do not forget those in other churches who have a claim on your bounty. But I really cannot see any good sense, which this various reading can make in the text; I therefore follow the common reading.

Given to hospitality.] Την φιλοξενιαν διασνντι, pursuing hospitality, or the duty of entertaining strangers. A very necessary virtue in ancient times, when houses of public accommodation were exceedingly scarce. This exhortation might have for its object the apostles, who were all itinerants; and, in many cases, the Christians flying before the face of persecution. This virtue is highly becoming in all Christians, and especially in all Christian ministers, who have the means of relieving a brother in distress, or of succouring the poor wherever he may find them. But providing for strangers in distress is the proper meaning of the term; and to be forward to do this, is the spirit of the duty.

Verse 14. Bless them which persecute you] Ευχαριστει. Give good words, or pray for them that give you bad words, καταραζετε, who make dire imprecations against you. Bless them, pray for them, and on no account curse them, whatever the provocation may be. Have the loving, forgiving mind that was in your Lord.

Verse 15, Rejoice with them that do rejoice] Take a lively interest in the prosperity of others. Let it be a matter of rejoicing to you when you hear of the health, prosperity, or happiness of any brother.

Weep with them that weep] Labour after a compassionate or sympathizing mind. Let your heart feel for the distressed; enter into their sorrows, and bear a part of their burdens. It is a fact, attested by universal experience, that by sympathy a man may receive into his own affectionate feelings, a measure of the distress of his friend; and that his friend does find himself relieved in the same proportion as the other has entered into his griefs. "But how do you account for this?" I do not account for it at all; it depends upon certain laws of nature, the principles of which have not been, as yet, duly developed.

Verse 16. Be of the same mind] Live in a state of continual harmony and concord, and pray for the same good for all, which you desire for yourselves.

Mind not high things] Be not ambitious; affect nothing above your station; do not court the rich, nor the powerful; do not pass by the poor man, to pay your court to the great man; do not affect titles or worldly distinctions; much less sacrifice your conscience for them. The attachment to high things and high men, is the vice of little shallow minds. However it argues one important fact, that such persons are conscious that they are of no worth and of no consequence in themselves; and they seek to render themselves observable, and to gain a little credit by their endeavours to associate themselves with men of rank and fortune; and if possible to get into honourable employments; and if this cannot be attained, they affect honourable titles.

But condescend to men of low estate] Be a companion of the humble, and pass through life with as little noise and show as possible. Let the poor godly man be your chief companion: and learn from his humility and piety, to be humble and godly. The term συναρταζουσιν, which we translate condescend, from συν, together, and αρταζω, to lead; signifies to be led, carried, or dragged away to prison with another, and points out the state in which the primitive Christians were, despised and rejected of men; and often led forth to prison and death. False or man-pleasing professors would endeavour to escape all this disgrace and danger by getting into the favour of the great, the worldly, and the irreligious. There have not been wanting, in all ages of the church, persons, who, losing the savour of divine things from their own souls, by drinking into a worldly spirit, have endeavoured to shun the reproach of the cross, by renouncing the company of the godly, speaking evil of the way of life, and, perhaps, sitting down in the chair of the scorner with apostates like themselves. And yet, strange to tell, these men will keep up a form of godliness! for a decent outside is often necessary to enable them to secure the ends of their ambition.

Be not wise in your own conceits] Be not puffed up with an opinion of your own consequence; for this will prove that the consequence itself is imaginary. Be not wise, say yourselves, by yourselves. Do not suppose that wisdom and discernment dwell alone with you. Believe that you stand in need both of help and instruction from others.

Verse 17. Recompense, &c.] Do not take notice of every little injury you may sustain. Do not be litigious. Beware of too nice a sense of your own honour; intolerable pride is at the bottom of this. The motto of the Royal Arms of Scotland is in direct opposition to this divine direction, Nemo me impune lacesset; of which, "I render evil for evil to every man," is a pretty literal translation. This is both anti-christian and abominable, whether in a state or an individual.

Provide things honest] Be prudent; be cautious; neither eat, drink, nor wear, but as you pay for every thing. "Live not on trust, for that is the way to pay double;" and by this means the poor are still kept poor. He who takes credit, even for food or raiment, when he has no probable means of defraying the debt, is a dishonest man. It is no sin to die through lack of the necessaries of life, when the providence of God has denied the means of support; but it is a sin to take up goods without the probability of being able to pay for them. Poor man! suffer poverty a little: perhaps God is only trying thee for a time: and who can tell if he will not turn again thy captivity. Labour hard to live honestly: if God still appear to withhold his providential blessing, do not despair; leave it all to him; do not make a sinful choice; he cannot err. He will bless thy poverty while he curses the ungodly man's blessings.

Verse 18. If it be possible] To live in a state of peace with one's neighbours, friends, and even family, is often very difficult. But the man who loves God must labour after this; for it is indispensably necessary even for his own sake. A man cannot have broils and misunderstandings with others, without having his own peace very materially disturbed. He must, to be happy, be at peace with all men, whether they will be at peace with him or not. The apostle knew that it would be difficult to get into and maintain such a state of peace, and this, his own words amply prove; and if it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably. Though it be but barely possible, labour after it.

Verse 19. Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves] Ye are the children of God, and he loves you, and because he loves you he will permit nothing to be done to you that he will not turn to your advantage. Never take the execution of the law into your own hands; rather suffer injuries. The Son of man is come, not to destroy men's lives, but to save; be of the same spirit. When He was reviled, he reviled not again. It is the part of a noble mind to bear up under unmerited disgrace; little minds are litigious and quarrelsome.

Give place unto wrath] Δοτε τονος τη οργη, leave room for the civil magistrate to do his duty; he holds the sword for this purpose; and if he be unfaithful to the trust reposed in him by the state, leave the matter to God, who is the righteous Judge; for by avenging yourselves, you take your cause both out of the hands of the civil magistrate, and out of the hands of God. I believe this to be the meaning of give place to wrath, οργη, punishment; the penalty which the laws, properly executed, will inflict. This is well expressed by the author of the book of Ecclesiasticus, chap. xix. ver. 17. Admonish thy neighbour before thou threaten him, and not being angry, give place to the law of the most High.

Vengeance is mine] This fixes the meaning of the apostle, and at once shows that the exhortation, rather give place to wrath or punishment, means, leave the matter to the judgment of God; it is his law that, in this case, is broken; and to him the infliction of deserved punishment belongs. Some think it means, "Yield a little to a man when in a violent passion, for the sake of peace; until he grow cooler."

I will repay] In my own time, and in my own way. But he gives the sinner space to repent, and this long-suffering leads to salvation. Dr. Taylor, after Dr. Benson, conjectures that the apostle, in these directions, had his eye upon the indignities which the Jews, and probably the Christians too, (for they were often confounded by the heathens,) suffered by the edict of Claudius, mentioned Acts xviii. 2. which "commanded all Jews to depart from Rome." Upon this occasion Aquila and Priscilla removed to Corinth, where Paul found them, and dwelt with them a considerable time. No doubt they gave him a full account of the state of the Christian church at Rome, and of every thing relating to the late persecution under Claudius. That emperor's edict probably died with him, if it were not repealed before, and then the Jews and Christians, (if the Christians were also expelled,) returned again to Rome; for Aquila and Priscilla were there when Paul wrote this epistle, chap. xvi. 3. which was in the fourth year of Nero, successor to Claudius.

Verse 20. If thine enemy hunger, feed him] Do not withhold from any man the offices of mercy, and kindness; you have been God's enemy, and yet God fed, clothed, and preserved you alive; do to your enemy as God has done to you; if your enemy be hungry, feed him; if he be thirsty, give him drink; so has God dealt with you. And has not a sense of his goodness and long-suffering towards you, been a means of melting down your heart into penitential compunction, gratitude, and love towards him? How know you that a similar conduct towards your enemy, may not have the same gracious influence on him towards you? Your kindness may be the means of begetting in him a sense of his guilt; and from being your fell enemy, he may become your real friend. This I believe to be the sense of this passage, which many have encumbered with difficulties of their own creating. The whole is a quotation from Prov. xxv. 21, 22, in the precise words of the Septuagint; and it is very likely that the latter clause of this verse, thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head, is a metaphor taken from smelting metals. The ore is put into the furnace, and fire put both under and over, that the metal may be liquified, and, leaving the scoriae and dross, may fall down pure to the bottom of the furnace. This is beautifully expressed by one of our own poets, in reference to this explanation of this passage.

"So artists melt the sullen ore of lead,
By heaping coals of fire upon its head.
In the kind warmth the metal learns to glow,
And pure from dross, the silver runs below."

* Gen. 45. 4, 5.

It is most evident from the whole connexion of the place, and the apostle's use of it, that the heaping of the coals of fire on the head of the enemy, is intended to produce not an evil, but the most beneficial effect; and the following verse is an additional proof of this.

Verse 21. Be not overcome of evil [Do not, by giving place to evil, become precisely the same character which thou condemnest in another. Overcome evil with good; however frequently he may grieve or injure thee, always repay him with kindness; thy good will, in the end, may overcome this evil.

1. Thomas Aquinas has properly said, vincitur à malo qui vult peccare in alium, quia ille peccavit in ipsum. "He is overcome of evil, who sins against another; because he sins against himself." A moral enemy is more easily overcome by kindness than by hostility. Against the latter he arms himself; and all the evil passions of his heart concentrate themselves in opposition to him who is striving to retaliate, by violence, the injurious acts which he has received from him. But where the injured man is labouring to do him good for his evil; to repay his curses with blessings and prayers; his evil passions have no longer any motive, any incentive; his mind relaxes, the turbulence of his passions is calmed, reason and conscience are permitted to speak; he is disarmed, or, in other words, he finds that he has no use for his weapons; he beholds in the injured man a magnanimous friend, whose mind is superior to all the insults and injuries which he has received; and who is determined never to permit the heavenly principle that influences his soul to bow itself before the miserable, mean, and wretched spirit of revenge. This amiable man views in his enemy a spirit which he beholds with horror, and he cannot consent to receive into his own bosom a disposition which he sees to be so destructive to another; and he knows that as soon as he begins to avenge himself, he places himself on a par with the unprincipled man, whose conduct he has so much reason to blame, and whose spirit he has so much cause to abominate. He who avenges himself, receives into his own heart all the evil and disgraceful passions by which his enemy is rendered both wretched and contemptible. There is the voice of eternal reason in "avenge not yourselves:—overcome evil with good;" as well as the high authority and command of the living God.

2. The reader will, no doubt, have observed with pleasure, the skill and address, as well as the divine wisdom, with which the apostle has handled the important subjects which he has brought forth to view in the preceding chapters. Nothing can be more regular or judicious than his plan of proceeding. He first shows the miserable, wretched, fallen, degraded state of man; next, the merciful provision which God has made for his salvation; and, lastly, the use which man should make of the mercies of his God. He shows us, in a most pointed manner, the connexion that subsists between the doctrines of the Gospel, and practical piety. From the beginning of the first to the end of the eleventh chapter, he states and defends the grand truths of Christianity; and from the beginning of the twelfth to the end of the epistle, he shows the practical use of these doctrines. This is a point which is rarely considered by professors: multitudes run to the Epistle to the Romans for texts to prop up their peculiar system of doctrine; but how few go to this sacred book for rules relative to a holy life! They abound in quotations from the doctrinal parts, but seldom make that use of them which the apostle makes in this chapter; "I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service; and be not conformed to this world," &c. Now we learn from the use which the apostle makes of his doctrines, that whatsoever teaching comes from God, leads to a holy and useful life. And if we hold any doctrine that does not excite us to labour after the strictest conformity to the will of God in all our tempers, spirit, and actions; we may rest assured that either that doctrine is not of God, or we make an improper use of it. He that knows God best, loves and resembles him most.

NOTES ON CHAP. XIII.

To see with what propriety the apostle introduces the important subjects which he handles in this chapter, it is necessary to make a few remarks on the circumstances in which the church of God then was.

It is generally allowed that this epistle was written about the year of our Lord 58, according to the vulgar reckoning, four or five years after the edict of the emperor Claudius, by which all the Jews were banished from Rome. And as, in those early times, the Christians were generally confounded with the Jews, it is likely that both were included in this decree.

For what reason this edict was issued, does not satisfactorily appear. Suetonius tells us that it was because the Jews were making continual disturbances under their leader Chrestus. (See the note on Acts xviii. 2.) That the Jews were, in general, an uneasy and seditious people, is clear enough from every part of their own history. They had the most rooted aversion from the heathen government; and it was a maxim with them that the world was given to the Israelites; that they should have supreme rule every where, and that the Gentiles should be their vassals. With such political notions, grounded on their native restlessness, it is no wonder, if, in several instances, they gave cause of suspicion to the Roman government, who would be glad of an opportunity to expel from the city, persons whom they considered dangerous to its peace and security; nor is it unreasonable, on this account, to suppose, with Dr. Taylor, that the Christians, under a notion of being the peculiar people of God, and the subjects of his kingdom alone, might be in danger of being infected with those unruly and rebellious sentiments; therefore the apostle shows them that they were, notwithstanding their honours and privileges as Christians, bound by the strongest obligations of conscience to be subject to the civil government. The judicious commentator adds, "I cannot forbear observing the admirable skill and dexterity with which the apostle has handled the subject. His views in writing are always comprehensive on every point; and he takes into his thoughts and instructions, all parties that might probably reap any benefit by them. As Christianity was then growing, and the powers of the world began to take notice of it, it was not unlikely that this letter might fall into the hands of the Roman magistrates. And, whenever that happened, it was right not only that they should see that Christianity was no favourer of sedition; but likewise that they should have an opportunity of reading their own duty and obligations. But as they were too proud and insolent to permit themselves to be instructed in a plain, direct way, therefore, the apostle, with a masterly hand, delineates, and strongly inculcates the magistrate's duty. While he is pleading his cause with the subject, and establishing his duty on the more sure and solid ground, he dexterously sides with the magistrate, and vindicates his power against any subject who might have imbibed seditious principles, or might be inclined to give the government any disturbance: and, under this advantage, he reads the magistrate a fine and close lecture, upon the nature and ends of civil government. A way of conveyance so ingenious and unexceptionable, that even Nero himself, had this epistle fallen into his hands, could not fail of seeing his duty clearly stated, without finding any thing servile or flattering on the one hand, or offensive or disgusting on the other.

"The attentive reader will be pleased to see, with what dexterity, truth, and gravity, the apostle, in a small compass, affirms and explains the foundation, nature, ends, and just limits of the magistrate's authority, while he is pleading his cause; and teaching the subject the duty and obedience he owes to the civil government." Dr. Taylor's Notes, page 352.

Verse 1. Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers] This is a very strong saying, and most solemnly introduced; and we must consider the apostle as speaking not from his own private judgment, or teaching a doctrine of present expediency; but declaring the mind of God on a subject of the utmost importance to the peace of the world; a doctrine which does not exclusively belong to any class of people, order of the community, or official situations; but to every soul; and, on the principles which the apostle lays down, to every soul in all possible varieties of situation, and on all occasions. And what is this solemn doctrine? It is this; Let every soul be subject to the higher powers. Let every man be obedient to the civil government under which the providence of God has cast his lot.

For, there is no power but of God] As God is the origin of power, and the Supreme Governor of the universe, he delegates authority to whomsoever he will: and though, in many cases, the governor himself may not be of God, yet civil government is of him; for without this, there could be no society, no security, no private property: all would be confusion and anarchy; and the habitable world would soon be depopulated. In ancient times, God, in an especial manner, on many occasions, appointed the individual who was to govern, and he accordingly governed by a divine right; as in the case of Moses, Joshua, the Hebrew judges, and several of the Israelitish kings. In after times, and to the present day, he does that by a general superintending providence, which he did before by especial designation. In all nations of the earth, there is what may be called a constitution, a plan by which a particular country or state is governed; and this constitution is less or more calculated to promote the interests of the community. The civil governor, whether he be elective or hereditary, agrees to govern according to that constitution. Thus, we may consider, that there is a compact and consent between the governor and the governed, and, in such a case, the potentate may be considered as coming to the supreme authority in the direct way of God's providence; and as civil government is of God, who is the Fountain of law, order, and regularity; the civil governor, who administers the laws of a state according to its constitution, is the minister of God. But it has been asked, if the ruler be an immoral or profligate man, does he not prove himself, thereby, to be unworthy of his high office, and should he not be deposed? I answer—No: if he rule according to the constitution, nothing can justify rebellion against his authority. He may be irregular in his own private life; he may be an immoral man, and disgrace himself by an improper conduct: but if he rule according to the law; if he make no attempt to change the constitution, nor break the compact between him and the people; there is, therefore, no legal ground of opposition to his civil authority: and every act against him is not only rebellion, in the worst sense of the word, but is unlawful, and absolutely sinful.

Nothing can justify the opposition of the subjects to the ruler, but overt attempts, on his part, to change the constitution, or to rule contrary to law. When the ruler acts thus, he dissolves the compact between him and his people; his authority is no longer binding, because illegal; and it is illegal, because he is acting contrary to the laws of that constitution, according to which, on being raised to the supreme power, he promised to govern. This conduct justifies opposition to his government: but I contend, that no personal misconduct in the ruler, no immorality in his own life, while he governs according to laws, can either justify rebellion against him, or contempt of his authority. For his political conduct, he is accountable to the constitution: for his moral conduct, he is accountable to God, his conscience, and the ministers of religion. A king may be a good moral man, and yet a weak, and indeed, a bad and dangerous prince. He may be a bad man, and stained with vice in his private life, and yet be a good prince. SAUL was a good moral man, but a bad prince; because he endeavoured to act contrary to the Israelitish constitution; he changed some essential parts of that constitution, as I have elsewhere shown, (see the Note on Acts xiii. ver. 22.) he was therefore lawfully deposed. James the Ild. was a good moral man, as far as I can learn, but he was a bad and dangerous prince; he endeavoured to alter, and essentially change the British constitution both in church and state; therefore he was lawfully deposed. It would be easy, in running over the list of our own kings, to point out several who were deservedly reputed good kings, who in their private life were very immoral. Bad as they might be in private life, the constitution was, in their hands, ever considered a sacred deposit; and they faithfully preserved it, and transmitted it unimpaired to their successors: and took care, while they held the reins of government, to have it impartially and effectually administered.

It must be allowed, notwithstanding, that, when a prince, howsoever heedful to the laws, is unrighteous in private life, his example is contagious: morality, banished from the throne, is discountenanced by the community; and happiness is diminished in proportion to the increase of vice. On the other hand, when a king governs according to the constitution of his realms, and has his heart and life governed by the laws of his God, he is then a double blessing to his people; while he is ruling carefully according to the laws, his pious example is a great means of extending and confirming the reign of pure morality among his subjects. Vice is discredited from the throne: and the profligate dare not hope for a place of trust and confidence, (however in other respects he may be qualified for it,) because he is a vicious man.

As I have already mentioned some potentates by name, as apt examples of the doctrines I have been laying down, my readers will naturally expect, that, on so fair an opportunity, I should introduce another; one in whom the double blessing meets; one who, through an unusually protracted reign, (during every year of which he has most conscientiously watched over the sacred constitution committed to his care) not only has not impaired this constitution, but has taken care that its wholesome laws should be properly administered; and who, in every respect, has acted as the father of his people: and has added to all this the most exemplary moral conduct, perhaps ever exhibited by a prince, whether in ancient or modern times; not only tacitly discountenancing vice, by his truly religious conduct, but by his frequent proclamations, most solemnly forbidding Sabbath-breaking, profane swearing, and immorality in general:—more might be justly said, but when I have mentioned all these things, (and I mention them with exultation, and with gratitude to God,) I need scarcely add the venerable name of GEORGE the Third, king of Great Britain; as every reader will at once perceive that the description suits no potentate besides. I may just observe, that notwithstanding his long reign has been a reign of unparalleled troubles and commotions in the world, in which his empire has always been involved; yet, never did useful arts, ennobling sciences, and pure religion, gain a more decided and general ascendancy: and much of this, under God, is owing to the manner in which this king has lived; and the encouragement he invariably gave to whatever had a tendency to promote the best interest of his people, discountenancing religious persecution, in all its forms. Indeed, it has been well observed, that, under the ruling providence of God, it was chiefly owing to the private and personal virtues of the sovereign, that the House of Brunswick remained firmly seated on the throne, amidst the storms arising from democratical agitations, and revolutionary convulsions in Europe, during the years 1792—1794. The stability of his throne, amidst these dangers and distresses, may prove a useful lesson to his successors, and show them the strength of a virtuous character; and that morality and religion form the best bulwark against those great evils to which all human governments are exposed. This small tribute of praise to the character and conduct of the British king, and gratitude to God for such a governor, will not be suspected of sinister motive; as the object of it is, by an inscrutable providence, placed in a situation to which neither envy, flattery, nor even just praise, can approach; and where the majesty of the man is placed in the most awful, yet respectable ruins.

But to resume the subject, and conclude the argument: I wish particularly to show the utter unlawfulness of rebellion against a ruler, who, though he may be incorrect in his moral conduct, yet rules according to the laws; and the additional blessing of having a prince, who, while his political conduct is regulated by the principles of the constitution; his heart and life are regulated by the dictates of eternal truth, as contained in that revelation which came from God.

Verse 2. Whosoever resisteth the power] ὁ ἀντιτάσσων; he who sets himself in order against this order of God; τῆ τοῦ Θεοῦ διαταγῆ, and they who resist, ἰσχυροῦσιν, they who obstinately, and for no right reason, oppose the ruler; and strive to unsettle the constitution, and to bring about illegal changes.

Shall receive to themselves damnation.] ἔμψα, condemnation; shall be condemned both by the spirit and letter of that constitution; which, under pretence of defending or improving, they are indirectly labouring to subvert.

Verse 3. For rulers are not a terror to good works] Here the apostle shows the civil magistrate what he should be: he is clothed with great power, but that power is entrusted him, not for the terror and oppression of the upright man, but to overawe and punish the wicked. It is, in a word, for the benefit of the community, and not for the aggrandizement of himself, that God has entrusted the supreme civil power to any man. If he should use this to wrong, rob, spoil, oppress, and persecute his subjects, he is not only a bad man, but also a bad prince. He infringes on the essential principles of law and equity. Should he persecute his obedient, loyal subjects, on any religious account, this is contrary to all law and right; and, his doing so, renders him unworthy of their confidence; and they must consider him not as a blessing, but a plague. Yet, even in this case, though in our country it would be a breach of the constitution, which allows every man to worship God according to his conscience; yet the truly pious will not feel, that even this, would justify rebellion against the prince; they are to suffer patiently, and commend themselves and their cause to him that judgeth righteously. It is an awful thing to rebel, and the cases are extremely rare that can justify rebellion against the constituted authorities. See the doctrine on ver. 1.

Will thou then not be afraid of the power] If thou wouldst not live in fear of the civil magistrate, live according to the laws; and thou mayest expect that he will rule according to the laws; and, consequently, instead of incurring blame, thou wilt have praise. This is said on the supposition that the ruler is himself a good man: such the laws suppose him to be; and the apostle, on the general question of obedience and protection, assumes the point, that the magistrate is such.

Verse 4. For he is the minister of God to thee for good] Here the apostle puts the character of the ruler in the strongest possible light. He is the minister of God: the office is by Divine appointment: the man who is worthy of the office will act in conformity to the will of God: and, as the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and his ears open to their cry, consequently, the ruler will be the minister of God to them for good.

He beareth not the sword in vain] His power is delegated to him for the defence and encouragement of the good, and the punishment of the wicked: and he has authority to punish capitally, when the law so requires; this, the term sword leads us to infer.

For he is a minister of God, a revenger] Θεοῦ διακονῶν ὡς ὑμῶν, for he is God's vindictive minister, to execute wrath; ὡς ὀφθαλμοῦ, to inflict punishment upon the transgressors of the law; and this according to the statutes of that law;

5 Wherefore ^a ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, ^b but also for conscience sake.

7 ^c Render therefore to all their dues;

for God's civil ministers are never allowed to pronounce or inflict punishment according to their own minds or feelings; but according to the express declarations of the law.

Verse 5. Ye must needs be subject] Αναγκη, there is a necessity that ye should be subject, not only for wrath, δια της οργης, on account of the punishment which will be inflicted on evil doers, but also for conscience sake; not only to avoid punishment, but also to preserve a clear conscience. For, as civil government is established in the order of God, for the support, defence, and happiness of society; they who transgress its laws, not only expose themselves to the penalties assigned by the statutes, but also to guilt in their own consciences; because they sin against God. Here are two powerful motives to prevent the infraction of the laws, and to enforce obedience. 1. The dread of punishment: this weighs with the ungodly. 2. The keeping of a good conscience, which weighs powerfully with every person who fears God. These two motives should be frequently urged both among professors and profane.

Verse 6. For this cause pay ye tribute also] Because civil government is an order of God, and the ministers of state must be at considerable expense in providing for the safety and defence of the community; it is necessary that those in whose behalf these expenses are incurred, should defray that expense; and hence nothing can be more reasonable than an impartial and moderate taxation, by which the expenses of the state may be defrayed, and the various officers, whether civil or military, who are employed for the service of the public, be adequately remunerated. All this is just and right; but there is no insinuation in the apostle's words in behalf of an extravagant and oppressive taxation, for the support of unprincipled and unnecessary wars: or the pensioning of corrupt or useless men. The taxes are to be paid for the support of those who are God's ministers, the necessary civil officers, from the king downwards, who are attending continually on this very thing. And let the reader observe, that by God's ministers, are not meant here the ministers of religion, but the civil officers, in all departments of the state.

Verse 7. Render therefore to all their dues.] This is an extensive command. Be rigidly just: withhold neither from the king, nor his ministers, nor his officers of justice and revenue, nor from even the lowest of the community, what the laws of God and your country require you to pay.

Tribute to whom tribute] Φοβος: this word probably means such taxes as were levied on persons and estates.

Custom to whom custom] Τελος: this word probably means such duties as were laid upon goods, merchandize, &c. on imports and exports; what we commonly call customs. Kypke on this place, has quoted some good authorities for the above distinction and signification. Both the words occur in the following quotation from Strabo, Αναγκη γαρ μινουσαι τα τελη, φοβος εκκαλλουον; it is necessary to lessen the customs, if taxes be imposed. Strabo, lib. ii. page 307. See several other examples in Kypke.

Fear to whom fear] It is likely that the word φοβος, which we translate fear, signifies that reverence which produces obedience. Treat all official characters with respect, and be obedient to your superiors.

Honour to whom honour] The word τιμη, may here mean that outward respect which the principle reverence, from which it springs, will generally produce. Never behave rudely to any person; but behave respectfully to men in office: if you cannot even respect the man, for an important office may be filled by an unworthy person, respect the office, and the man on account of his office. If a man habituate himself to disrespect official characters, he will soon find himself disposed to pay little respect or obedience to the laws themselves.

Verse 8. Owe no man any thing, but to love one another] In the preceding verses, the apostle has been showing the duty, reverence, and obedience which all Christians, from the highest to the lowest, owe to the civil magistrate; whether he be emperor, king, pro-consul, or other state-officer; here, he shows them their duty to each other; but this is widely different from that which they owe to the civil government; to the first, they owe subjection, reverence, obedience, and tribute; to the latter they owe nothing but mutual love, and those offices which necessarily spring from it. Therefore, the apostle says, owe no man; as if he had said, ye owe to your fellow-brethren, nothing but mutual love: and this is what the law of God requires; and in this the law is fulfilled. Ye are not bound in obedience to them as to the civil magistrate; for, to him ye must needs be subject, not merely for fear of punishment, but for conscience sake: but to these ye are bound adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, ^aThou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

by love: and by that love especially, which utterly prevents you from doing any thing by which a brother may sustain any kind of injury.

Verse 9. For this, thou shalt not commit adultery] He that loves another, will not deprive him of his wife, of his life, of his property, of his good name; and will not even permit a desire to enter into his heart which would lead him to wish to possess any thing that is the property of another: for the law, the sacred Scripture, has said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

It is remarkable, that ἡ ἀγάπη, thou shalt not bear false witness, is wanting here in ABDEFG. and several other MSS. Griesbach has left it out of the text. It is wanting also in the Syriac, and in several of the primitive Fathers. The generality of the best critics think it a spurious reading.

Verse 10. Love worketh no ill] As he that loves another, will act towards that person, as, on a reverse of circumstances, he would that his neighbour should act towards him; therefore, this love can never work ill towards another; and, on this head, i. e. the duty we owe to our neighbour, love is the fulfilling of the law.

Verse 11. And that, knowing the time] Dr. Taylor has given a judicious paraphrase of this and the following verses. "And all the duties of a virtuous and holy life we should the more carefully and zealously perform, considering the nature and shortness of the present season of life; which will convince us that it is now high time to rouse and shake off sleep; and apply, with vigilance and vigour, to the duties of our Christian life; for, that eternal salvation which is the object of our Christian faith and hope, and the great motive of our religion, is every day nearer to us, than when we first entered into the profession of Christianity."

Some think the passage should be understood thus: We have now many advantages which we did not formerly possess. Salvation is nearer; the whole Christian system is more fully explained, and the knowledge of it more easy to be acquired than formerly; on which account, a greater progress in religious knowledge, and in practical piety, is required of us: and we have, for a long time, been too remiss in these respects. Deliverance from the persecutions, &c. with which they were then afflicted, is supposed by others, to be the meaning of the apostle.

11 And that knowing the time, that now it is high time ^cto awake out of sleep; for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed.

12 The night is far spent, the day is at hand: ^dlet us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and ^elet us put on the armour of light.

Verse 12. The night is far spent] If we understand this in reference to the heathen state of the Romans, it may be paraphrased thus: the night is far spent; heathenish darkness is nearly at an end: the day is at hand; the full manifestation of the Sun of righteousness, in the illumination of the whole Gentile world, approaches rapidly.—The manifestation of the Messiah is regularly termed by the ancient Jews יום היום, day, because previously to this all is night. Bereshith Rabba, sect. 91. fol. 89. Cast off the works of darkness: prepare to meet this rising light, and welcome its approach; by throwing aside superstition, impiety, and vice of every kind: and put on the armour of light: fully receive the heavenly teaching, by which your spirits will be as completely armed against the attacks of evil, as your bodies could be by the best weapons and impenetrable armour. This sense seems most suitable to the following verses, where the vices of the Gentiles are particularly specified; and they are exhorted to abandon them, and to receive the Gospel of Christ. The common method of explanation is this: the night is far spent; our present imperfect life, full of afflictions, temptations, and trials, is almost run out; the day of eternal blessedness is at hand, is about to dawn on us in our glorious resurrection unto eternal life. Therefore, let us cast off, let us live as candidates for this eternal glory. But this sense cannot at all comport with what is said below; as the Gentiles are most evidently intended.

Verse 13. Let us walk honestly as in the day] Let us walk, ὡς ἄνθρωποι, decently, from ω, well, and αἴμα, mien, habit, or dress. Let our deportment be decent, orderly, and grave; such as we shall not be ashamed of in the eyes of the whole world.

Not in rioting and drunkenness] Μη ἠσπάζετε καὶ μεθυσθεῖτε: Καμὸς rioting, according to Henychius, signifies; ἀσχητὰ ἀσπάζεσθαι, ἢ πορνεία, ἢ ἀσχητὰ, ἢ ἀσχητὰ ἀσπάζεσθαι, ἢ ἀσχητὰ ἀσπάζεσθαι; banquets, and such like. Μεθύειν, signifies drunken festivals, such as were celebrated in honour of their gods: when after they had sacrificed (μὴν ἑορταῖς, SUIDAS,) they drank to excess, accompanied with abominable acts of every kind. See Suidas and Henychius, under this word.

it. The original word πορνεία, signifies whoredoms, and prostitution of every kind.

And wantonness] ἀσχημασίαι, all manner of uncleanness, and sodomitical practices.

Not in strife and envying.] Μη ἔσθι καὶ φέω, not in contentions and furious altercations, which must be the consequence of such practices as are mentioned above. Can any man suppose that this address is to the Christians at Rome? That they are charged with practices almost peculiar to the heathens? And practices of the most abandoned and dissolute sort? If those called Christians at Rome were guilty of such acts, there could be no difference, except in profession, between them and the most abominable of the heathens. But it is impossible that such things should be spoken to the followers of Christ; for the very grace that brings repentance enables the penitent to cast aside and abominate all such corrupt and vicious conduct.

The advices to the Christians may be found in the preceding chapter: those at the conclusion of this chapter belong solely to the heathens.

Verse 14. Put ye on the Lord Jesus] This is in reference to what is said ver. 13. Let us put on decent garments: let us make a different profession, unite with other company; and maintain that profession by a suitable conduct. Putting on, or being clothed with Jesus Christ, signifies receiving and believing the Gospel; and, consequently, taking its maxims for the government of life: having the mind that was in Christ. The ancient Jews frequently use the phrase, putting on the Shechinah, or Divine Majesty, to signify the soul's being clothed with immortality, and rendered fit for glory.

To be clothed with a person, is a Greek phrase, signifying to assume the interests of another, to enter into his views, to imitate him, and be wholly on his side. St. Chrysostom particularly mentions this as a common phrase, ὁ δὲνα τὸν δάνα ἀνδρῶν, such a one hath put on such a one; i. e. he closely follows and imitates him. So Dionysius Hal. Antiq. lib. xi. page 689. speaking of Appius, and the rest of the Decemviri, says, ὡςτὶ μοιμαρτοῦτε, ἀλλὰ τοῖς Τάμνιου ἐπισημαίνετε. They were no longer the servants of Tarquin, but they clothed themselves with him: they imitated and acted him in every thing. Eusebius, in his Life of Constantine, says the same of his sons, they put on their father; they seemed to enter into his spirit and views, and to imitate him in all things. The mode of speech itself is taken from the custom of stage-players; they assumed the name and garments of the person whose character they were to act; and endeavoured as closely as possible to imitate him in their spirit, words, and actions. See many pertinent examples in Kyplos.

And make not provision for the flesh] By flesh we are here to understand, not only the body, but all the irregular appetites and passions which led to the abominations already recited. No provision should be made for the encouragement and gratification of such a principle as this.

To fulfil the lusts thereof.] Εὐκ ἐπιθυμίας, in reference to its lusts; such as the ἀμύλαι, πορνείαι, μεθαι, and ἀσχημασίαι, rioting, drunkenness, prostitutions, and uncleanness, mentioned ver. 13. to make provision for which the Gentiles lived and laboured, and bought and sold, and schemed and planned; for it was the whole business of their life to gratify the sinful lusts of the flesh. Their philosophers taught them little else; and the whole circle of their deities, as well as the whole scheme of their religion, served only to excite and inflame such passions, and produce such practices.

I. In these four last verses there is a fine metaphor, and it is continued and well sustained in every expression. 1. The apostle considers the state of the Gentiles under the notion of night: a time of darkness, and a time of evil practices. 2. That this night is nearly at an end, the night is far spent. 3. He considers the Gospel as now visiting the Gentiles, and the light of a glorious day about to shine forth on them. 4. He calls those to awake who were in a stupid, senseless state, concerning all spiritual and moral good; and those who were employed in the vilest practices that could debase and degrade mankind. 5. He orders them to cast off the works of darkness, and put on the armour; ὡπλα, the habiliments of light, of righteousness: to cease to do evil: to learn to do well. Here is an allusion to laying aside the night-clothes; and putting on their day-clothes. 6. He exhorts them to this, that they may walk honestly, ὡρθόμως, decently habited; and not spend their time, waste their substance, destroy their lives, and ruin their souls, in such iniquitous practices as those which he immediately specifies. 7. That they might not mistake his meaning concerning the decent clothing which he exhorts them to walk in, he immediately explains himself by the use of a common form of speech, and says, still following his metaphor, put on the Lord Jesus Christ: receive his doctrine, copy his example, and seek the things which belong to another life; for the Gentiles thought of little else than making provision for the flesh or body, to gratify its animal desires and propensities.

II. These last verses have been rendered famous in the Christian church, for more than 1400 years, as being the instrument of the conversion of St. Augustine. It is well known that this man was, at first, a Manichean, in which doctrine he continued till the 33d year of his age;—he had frequent conferences and controversies on the Christian religion with several friends, who were Christians; and with his mother Monica, who was incessant in her prayers and tears for his conversion. She was greatly comforted by the assurance given her by St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan, where her son Augustin was then professor of rhetoric; that a child of so many prayers and tears could not perish. He frequently heard St. Ambrose preach, and was affected not only by his eloquence, but by the important subjects which he discussed; but still could not abandon his Manicheanism. Walking one day in a garden with his friend Alypius, who it appears had been reading a copy of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, and had left it on a bank near which they then were, (though some say that Augustin was then alone,) he thought he heard a musical voice calling out distinctly TOLLE et LEGE! TOLLE et LEGE! take up and read! take up and read! He looked down, saw the book, took it up, and hastily opening it, the first words that met his eye were these, Μη σαυον και μεθαι, &c. Not in rioting and drunkenness, &c. but put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ. He felt the import and power of the words, and immediately resolved to become a follower of Christ: he, in consequence, instantly embraced Christianity; and afterward boldly professed and wrote largely in its defence; and became one of the most eminent of all the Latin fathers. Such is the substance of the story handed down to us from antiquity, concerning the conversion of St. Augustin. He was made bishop of Hippo, in Africa, in the year 395, and died in that city Aug. 28, 430, at the very time that it was besieged by the Vandals.

III. After what I have said in the Notes, I need add nothing on the great political question of subordination to the civil powers; and of the propriety and expediency of submitting to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake. I need only observe, that it is in things civil this obedience is enjoined: in things religious, God alone is to be obeyed. Should the civil power attempt to usurp the place of the Almighty, and forge a new creed, or prescribe rites and ceremonies not authorized by the word of God; no Christian is bound to obey. Yet, even in this case, as I have already noted, no Christian is authorized to rebel against the civil power; he must bear the persecution; and, if needs be, seal the truth with his blood; and thus become a martyr of the Lord Jesus. This has been the invariable practice of the genuine church of Christ. They committed their cause to Him who judgeth righteously. See further on this subject on Matt. xxii. 20, &c.

CHAPTER XIV.

In things indifferent, Christians should not condemn each other, 1. Particularly with respect to different kinds of food, 2—4. And the observation of certain days, 5, 6. None of us should live unto himself, but unto Christ, who lived and died for us, 7—9. We must not judge each other; for all judgment belongs to God, 10—13. We should not do any thing by which a weak brother may be stumbled or grieved; lest we destroy him for whom Christ died, 14—16. The kingdom of God does not consist in outward things, 17, 18. Christians should endeavour to cultivate peace and brotherly affection, and rather deny themselves of certain privileges, than be the means of stumbling a weak brother, 19—21. The necessity of doing all in the spirit of faith, 22, 23.

NOTES ON CHAP. XIV.

It seems very likely, from this, and the following chapter, that there were considerable misunderstandings between the Jewish and Gentile Christians at Rome, relative to certain customs which were sacredly observed by the one, and disregarded by the other. The principal subject of dispute was, concerning meats and days. The converted Jew, retaining a veneration for the law of Moses, abstained from certain meats, and was observant of certain days: while the converted Gentile, understanding that the Christian religion laid him under no obligations to such ceremonial points, had no regard to either. It appears further, that mutual censures, and uncharitable judgments, prevailed among them; and that brotherly love, and mutual forbearance, did not generally prevail. The apostle, in this part of his epistle, exhorts, that in such things, not essential to religion; and in which both parties, in their different way of thinking, might have an honest meaning, and serious regard to God, difference of sentiments might not hinder Christian fellowship and love: but that they would mutually forbear each other, make candid allowance, and especially not carry their Gospel liberty so far as to prejudice a weak brother, a Jewish Christian, against the Gospel itself, and tempt him to renounce Christianity. His rules and exhortations are still of great use;

and happy would the Christian world be, if they were more generally practised. See Dr. Taylor, who further remarks, that it is probable St. Paul learnt all these particulars from Aquila and Priscilla, who were lately come from Rome. Acts xviii. 2, 3. and with whom the apostle was familiar for a considerable time. This is very likely, as there is no evidence that he had any other intercourse with the church at Rome.

Verse 1. Him that is weak in the faith] By this the apostle most evidently means the converted Jew; who must indeed be weak in the faith, if he considered this distinction of meats and days essential to his salvation.—See on ver. 21.

Receive ye] Associate with him; receive him into your religious fellowship; but when there, let all religious altercations be avoided.

Not to doubtful disputations] Μη τις διαφωνῶν διαλογισμῶν. These words have been variously translated and understood; Dr. Whilby thinks the sense of them to be this, Not discriminating them by their inward thoughts. Do not reject any from your Christian communion, because of their particular sentiments on things which are in themselves indifferent. Do not curiously inquire into their religious scruples, nor condemn them on that account. Entertain a brother of this kind rather with what may profit his soul, than with curious disquisitions on speculative points of doctrine. A good lesson for modern Christians in general.

Verse 2. One believeth that he may eat all things] He believes that whatsoever is wholesome and nourishing, whether herbs or flesh, whether enjoined or forbidden by the Mosaic law, may be safely and conscientiously used by every Christian.

Another, who is weak, eateth herbs] Certain Jews, lately converted to the Christian faith, and having as yet little knowledge of its doctrines, believe the Mosaic law relative to clean and unclean meats, to be still in force; and, therefore, when they are in a Gentile country, for fear of being defiled, avoid flesh entirely, and live on vegetables. And a Jew, when in a heathen country, acts thus, because he cannot tell whether the flesh which is sold in the market, may be of a clean or unclean beast; whether it may not have been offered to an idol; or whether the blood may have been taken properly from it.

Verse 3. Let not him that eateth] The Gentile, who eats flesh, despise him, the Jew, who eateth not flesh, but herbs. And let not him, the Jew, that eateth not indiscriminately, judge, con- demn him, the Gentile, that eateth indiscriminately flesh, or vegetables.

For God hath received him.] Both being sincere, and upright, and acting in the fear of God, are received as heirs of eternal life, without any difference on account of these religious scruples or prejudices.

Verse 4. Who art thou that judgest another man's servant?] Who has ever given thee the right to condemn the servant of another man, in things pertaining to his own master? To his own master he standeth or falleth. He, not thou, is to judge him; thy intermeddling in this business, is both rash and uncharitable.

Yea, he shall be holden up] He is sincere and upright; and God who is able to make him stand, will uphold him; and so teach him that he shall not essentially err. And it is the will of God that such upright though scrupulous persons, should be continued members of his church.

Verse 5. One man esteemeth one day above another] Perhaps the word ἡμέραν, day, is here taken for time, festival, and such like: in which sense it is frequently used. Reference is made here to the Jewish institutions, and especially their festivals; such as the pass-over, pentecost, feast of tabernacles, new moons, jubilee, &c. The converted Jew still thought these of moral obligation; the Gentile Christian, not having been bred up in this way, had no such prejudices. And as those who were the instruments of bringing him to the knowledge of God, gave him no such injunctions, consequently he paid to these no religious regard.

Another] The converted Gentile, esteemeth every day; considers that all time is the Lord's; and that each day should be devoted to the glory of God: and that those festivals are not binding on him.

We add here alike, and make the text say, what I am sure was never intended, viz. that there is no distinction of days, not even of the Sabbath; and that every Christian is at liberty to consider even this day to be holy or not holy, as he happens to be persuaded in his own mind.

That the Sabbath is of lasting obligation may be reasonably concluded from its institution: see the note on Genesis ii. 3. and from its typical reference. All allow that the Sabbath is a type of that rest in glory which remains for the people of God. Now, all types are intended to continue in full force till the antitype, or thing signified, take place; consequently, the Sabbath will continue in force till the consummation of all things. The word alike should not be added; nor is it acknowledged by any MS. or ancient Version.

7 For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself.

Let every man be fully persuaded] With respect to the propriety or non-propriety of keeping the above festivals, let every man act from the plenary conviction of his own mind: there is a sufficient latitude allowed: all may be fully satisfied.

Verse 6. He that regardeth the day] A beautiful apology for mistaken sincerity, and injudicious reformation. Do not condemn the man for what is indifferent in itself; if he keep these festivals, his purpose is to honour God by the religious observance of them. On the other hand, he who finds that he cannot observe them in honour of God, not believing that God has enjoined them; he does not observe them at all. In like manner, he that eateth any creature of God, which is wholesome and proper for food, gives thanks to God, as the author of all good. And he who cannot eat of all indiscriminately, but is regulated by the precepts in the Mosaic law, relative to clean and unclean meats, also gives God thanks. Both are sincere; both upright; both act according to their light; God accepts both: and they should bear with each other.

Verse 7. None of us liveth to himself] The Greek writers use the phrase κατὰ ἑαυτὸν, to signify acting according to one's own judgment, following one's own opinion. Christians must act in all things according to the mind and will of God, and not follow their own wills. The apostle seems to intimate, that in all the above cases, each must endeavour to please God; for he is accountable to him alone for his conduct in these indifferent things. God is our Master, we must live to him; as we live under his notice, and by his bounty, and when we cease to live among men, we are still in his hand. Therefore, what we do, or what we leave undone, should be in reference to that eternity which is ever at hand.

Verse 9. Christ both died and rose] That we are not our own, but are the Lord's both in life and death, is evident from this, that Christ lived and died, and rose again, that he might be the 9 For to this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living.

10 But why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at nought thy brother? for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ.

11 For it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God.

12 So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God.

13 Let us not, therefore, judge one

Lord of the dead and the living; for his power extends equally over both worlds: separate as well as embodied spirits, are under his authority; and he it is who is to raise even the dead to life: and thus all, throughout eternity, shall live under his dominion.

The clause et resurrexerit, and rose, is wanting in several reputable MSS. and certainly is not necessary to the text. Griesbach omits the words, and reads et resurrexerit et vivens, died and lived; of which professor White says, lectio indubie genuina; "this reading is indisputably genuine."

Verse 10. But why dost thou] Christian Jew, observing the rites of the Mosaic law; judge, condemn thy brother, Christian Gentile, who does not think himself bound by this law?

Or why dost thou] Christian Gentile, set at nought thy Christian Jewish brother, as if he were unworthy of thy regard, because he does not yet believe that the Gospel has set him free from the rites and ceremonies of the law?

It is a true saying of Mr. Heylin, on this verse; the superstitious are prone to judge; and those who are not superstitious, are prone to despise.

We shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ] Why should we then judge and condemn each other? We are accountable to God for our conduct, and shall be judged at his bar; and let us consider that whatever measure we mete, the same shall be measured unto us again.

Verse 12. Every one of us shall give account of himself] We shall not, at the bar of God, be obliged to account for the conduct of each other—each shall give account of himself: and let him take heed that he be prepared to give up his accounts with joy.

Verse 13. Let us not, therefore, judge one another any more] Let us abandon such rash conduct; it is dangerous; it is uncharitable: judgment belongs to the Lord, and he will condemn those only, who should not be acquitted.

they should labour to promote each other's spiritual interests; and not be a means of hindering each other in their Christian course; or of causing them to abandon the Gospel, on which, and not on questions of rites and ceremonies, the salvation of their souls depends.

Verse 14. I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus] After reasoning so long and so much with these contending parties, on the subject of their mutual misunderstandings; without attempting to give any opinion, but merely to show them the folly and uncharitableness of their conduct; he now expresses himself fully, and tells them that nothing is unclean of itself, and that he has the inspiration and authority of Jesus Christ to say so; for to such an inspiration he must refer in such words as, I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus. And yet, after having given them this decisive judgment, through respect to the tender, mistaken conscience of weak believers, he immediately adds, But to him that esteemeth any thing to be unclean, to him it is unclean; because if he act contrary to his conscience, he must necessarily contract guilt; for he who acts in opposition to his conscience in one case, may do it in another; and thus even the plain declarations of the word of God may be set aside on things of the utmost importance, as well as the erroneous, though well-intentioned dictates of his conscience, on matters which he makes of the last consequence; though others, who are better taught, know them to be indifferent.

It is dangerous to trifle with conscience, even when erroneous; it should be borne with and instructed; it must be won over, not taken by storm. Its feelings should be respected, because they ever refer to God, and have their foundation in his fear. He who sins against his conscience in things which every one else knows to be indifferent, will soon do it in those things in which his salvation is most intimately concerned. It is a great blessing to have a well-informed conscience; it is a blessing to have a tender conscience, and even a sore conscience is infinitely better than none.

Verse 15. If thy brother be grieved] If he think that thou dost wrong, and he is, in consequence, stumbled at thy conduct;

well-being depend: thou workest ill to him by grieving and distressing his mind; and therefore thou breakest the law of God in reference to him, while pretending that thy Christian liberty raises thee above his scruples.

Destroy not him with thy meat for whom Christ died.] This puts the uncharitable conduct of the person in question in the strongest light; because it supposes that the weak brother may be so stumbled as to fall and perish finally; even the man for whom Christ died. To injure a man in his circumstances is bad; to injure him in his person is worse; to injure him in his reputation is still worse; and to injure his soul is worst of all. No wickedness, no malice, can go further than to injure and destroy the soul; thy uncharitable conduct may proceed thus far; therefore thou art highly criminal before God.

From this verse we learn that a man for whom Christ died may perish, or have his soul destroyed; and destroyed with such a destruction as implies perdition. The original is very emphatic, μη κατασταναι απολλυμεν υμεις ου Χριστος παθωντες, Christ died in his stead; do not destroy his soul. The sacrificial death is as strongly expressed as it can be; and there is no word in the New Testament that more forcibly implies eternal ruin, than the verb απολλυμεν, from which is derived the most significant name of the Devil, ὁ Απολλυμεν, the DESTROYER, the great universal murderer of souls.

Verse 16. Let not then your good be evil spoken of] Do not make such a use of your Christian liberty as to subject the Gospel itself to reproach. Whatsoever you do, do it in such manner, spirit, and time, as to make it productive of the greatest possible good. There are many who have such an unhappy method of doing their good acts, as not only to do little or no good by them, but a great deal of evil. It requires much prudence and watchfulness to find out the proper time of performing even a good action.

Verse 17. For the kingdom of God] That holy religion which God has sent from heaven, and which he intends to make the instrument of establishing a counterpart of the kingdom of glory among men: see on Matt. iii. 2.

Is not meat and drink] It consists not in these outward and indifferent things. It neither particularly enjoins, nor particularly forbids such.

And peace] In the soul, from a sense of God's mercy; peace regulating, ruling, and harmonizing the heart.

And joy in the Holy Ghost] Solid, spiritual happiness; a joy which springs from a clear sense of God's mercy; the love of God being shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost. In a word, it is a happiness brought into the soul by the Holy Spirit, and maintained there by the same influence. This is a genuine counterpart of heaven; righteousness without sin, PEACE without inward disturbance, JOY without any kind of mental agony, or distressing fear. See the note on Matt. iii. 2.

Verse 18. For, he that in these things] The man, whether Jew or Gentile, who in these things, righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, serveth Christ, acts according to his doctrine, is acceptable to God, for he has not only the form of godliness in thus serving Christ, but he has the power, the very spirit and essence of it, in having righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost; and therefore the whole frame of his mind, as well as his acts, must be acceptable to God.—And approved of men; for although religion may be persecuted, yet the righteous man, who is continually labouring for the public good, will be generally esteemed. This was a very common form of speech among the Jews; that he who was a conscientious observer of the law, was pleasing to God, and approved of men.—See several examples in Schoetgen.

Verse 19. Let us therefore follow] Far from contending about meats, drinks, and festival times, in which it is not likely that the Jews and Gentiles will soon agree; let us endeavour, to the utmost of our power, to promote peace and unanimity, that we may be instrumental in edifying each other; in promoting religious knowledge and piety, instead of being stumbling-blocks in each other's way.

Verse 20. For meat, destroy not the work of God] Do not hinder the progress of the Gospel, either in your own souls, or in those of others, by contending about lawful or unlawful meats. And do not destroy the soul of thy Christian brother, ver. 15. by offending him so as to induce him to apostatize.

eats contrary to his own conscience, or so as to grieve and stumble another, does an evil act; and however lawful the thing may be in itself, his conduct does not please God.

Verse 21. It is good neither to eat flesh, &c.] The spirit and self-denying principles of the Gospel teach us, that we should not only avoid every thing in eating or drinking which may be an occasion of offence or apostasy to our brethren, but even to lay down our lives for them, should it be necessary.

Whereby thy brother stumbleth] Προσκοντα, from προσ, against, and κοντα, to strike, to hit the foot against a stone in walking, so as to halt, and be impeded in one's journey. It here means spiritually, any thing by which a man is so perplexed in his mind, as to be prevented from making due progress in the divine life. Any thing by which he is caused to halt, to be indelicate, and undetermined; and under such an influence no man has ever yet grown in grace, and in the knowledge of Jesus Christ.

Or is offended] Η σκανδαλιζουσα, from σκανδαλον, a stumblingblock; any thing by which a person is caused to fall, especially into a snare, trap, or gin. Originally the word signified the piece of wood, or key in a trap, which being trodden on, caused the animal to fall into a pit, or the trap to close upon him. In the New Testament it generally refers to total apostasy from the Christian religion, and this appears to be its meaning in this place.

Or is made weak] Η ασθενια, from α, negative, and σθενος, strength, without mental vigour; without power sufficiently to distinguish between right and wrong, good and evil, lawful and unlawful. To get under the dominion of an erroneous conscience, so as to judge that to be evil or unlawful which is not so. The two last terms are omitted by two excellent MSS. (the Codex Alexandrinus and the Codex Ephraim.) by the Syriac of Erpen, the Coptic and the Ethiopic, and by some of the primitive fathers. It is very likely that they were added by some early hand by way of illustration. Griesbach has left them in the text with a note of doubtfulness.

Verse 22. Hast thou faith] The term faith seems to signify, in this place, a full persuasion in a man's mind that he is right, that what he does is lawful, and has the approbation of God and his conscience. Dr. Taylor has a judicious note on this passage. "There is no necessity," says he, "for reading the first clause interrogatively; and it seems to be more agreeable to the structure of the Greek, to render it, thou hast faith; as if he had said, 'I own thou hast a right persuasion.' Further, there is an anadiplosis in εχει, and εχει the first simply signifies thou hast, the latter, hold fast. Thou hast a right persuasion concerning thy Christian liberty; and I advise thee to hold that persuasion steadfastly, with respect to thyself, in the sight of God. εχει, have, has frequently this emphatical signification. See Matt. xxv. 29," &c.

Happy is he that condemneth not, &c.] That man only can enjoy peace of conscience who acts according to the full persuasion which God has given him of the lawfulness of his conduct: whereas, he must be miserable who allows himself in the practice of any thing for which his conscience upbraids and accuses him. This is a most excellent maxim, and every genuine Christian should be careful to try every part of his conduct by it. If a man have not peace in his own bosom, he cannot be happy; and no man can have peace, who sins against his conscience. If a man's passions or appetite allow or instigate him to a particular thing, let him take good heed that his conscience approve what his passion allows; and that he live not the subject of continual self-condemnation and reproach. Even the man who had the too scrupulous conscience, had better, in such matters as are in question, obey its erroneous dictates, than violate this moral feeling, and live only to condemn the actions he is constantly performing.

Verse 23. And he that doubteth] This verse is a necessary part of the preceding, and should be read thus, But he that doubteth is condemned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith. The meaning is sufficiently plain. He that feeds on any kind of meats prohibited by the Mosaic law, with the persuasion in his mind that he may be wrong in so doing, is condemned by his conscience for doing that which he has reason to think God has forbidden.

For whatsoever is not of faith is sin] Whatever he does, without a full persuasion of its lawfulness, (see ver. 22.) is to him sin, for he does it under a conviction that he may be wrong in so doing. Therefore, if he make a distinction in his own conscience between different kinds of meats, and yet eats of all indifferently, he is a sinner before God; because he eats either through false shame, base compliance, or an unbridled appetite; and any of these is, in itself, a sin against the sincerity, ingenuousness, and self-denying principles of the Gospel of Christ.

Some think that these words have a more extensive signification, and that they apply to all who have not true religion and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ; every work of such persons being sinful in the sight of a holy God, because it does not proceed from a pure motive. On this ground our church says, Artic. xiii. "Works done before the grace of Christ, and the inspiration of his Spirit, are not pleasant to God, forasmuch as they are not of faith in Jesus Christ; yea, for that they are not done as God hath willed and commanded them to be done, we doubt not but they have the nature of sin." To this we may add, that without faith it is impossible to please God; every thing is wrong where this principle is wanting.

There are few readers who have not remarked that the three last verses of this epistle, (chap. xvi. 25, 26, 27.) appear to stand in their present place without any obvious connexion; and apparently after the epistle is concluded. And it is well known to critics, that two MSS. in uncial letters, the Cod. A. and I. with upwards of 100 others, together with the Slavonic, the latter Syriac and Arabic, add those verses at the end of the 14th chapter. The transposition is acknowledged by Cyril, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Æcumenius, Theophylact, Theodulus, Damasceus, and Tertullian, see Wetstein. Griesbach inserts them at the end of this chapter as their proper place; and most learned men approve of this transposition. It may be necessary to repeat the words here, that the reader may see with what propriety they connect with the subject which terminates the fourteenth chapter as it now stands. Chap. xiv. ver. 23. And he that doubteth is condemned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith; for whatsoever is not of faith is sin.

Chap. xvi. ver. 25. Now to him that is of power to stablish you according to my Gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ, (according to the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret since the world began.

Verse 26. But now is made manifest, and by the scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known to all nations for the obedience of faith;)

Verse 27. To God only wise be glory through Jesus Christ for ever. Amen. Chap. xv. 1. We then, that are strong, ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, &c.

These words certainly connect better with the close of the 14th chapter, and the beginning of the 15th, than they do with the conclusion of the 16th, where they are now generally found: but I shall defer my observations upon them till I come to that place, with only this remark, that the stablishing mentioned chap. xvi. ver. 25. corresponds well with the doubting, chap. xiv. ver. 23. and indeed the whole matter of these verses agrees so well with the subject so largely handled in the preceding chapter, that there can be very little doubt of their being in their proper place, if joined to the end of this chapter, as they are in the preceding MSS. and Versions.

NOTES ON CHAP. XV.

Verse 1. We then that are strong] The sense of this verse is supposed to be the following. We, Gentile Christians, who perfectly understand the nature of our Gospel liberty, not only lawfully may, but are bound in duty to bear any inconveniences that may arise from the scruples of the weaker brethren, and to ease their consciences by prudently abstaining from such indifferent things as may offend and trouble them; and not take advantage from our superior knowledge to make them submit to our judgment.

Verse 2. Let every one of us please his neighbour] For it should be a maxim with each of us to do all in our power to please our brethren; and especially in those things in which their spiritual edification is concerned. Though we should not indulge men in mere whims and caprices, yet we should bear with their ignorance and their weakness; knowing that others had much to bear with from us before we came to our present advanced state of religious knowledge.

Verse 3. For, even Christ pleased not himself] Christ never acted as one who sought his own ease or profit; he not only bore with the weakness, but with the insults of his creatures; as it is written in Psalm lxix. 9. The reproaches of them that reproached thee fell upon me. I not only bore their insults, but bore the punishment due to them for their vicious and abominable conduct. That this Psalm refers to the Messiah and his suffering for mankind, is evident, not only from the quotation here, but also from John xix. 28, 29. when our Lord's receiving the vinegar during his expiatory suffering, is said to be a fulfilling of the Scripture, viz. of verse 22. of this very Psalm: and his cleansing the temple, John ii. 15—17. is said to be a fulfilment of verse 9. For the zeal of thy house hath eaten me up, the former part of which verse the apostle quotes here.

Verse 4. For, whatsoever things were written aforetime] This refers not only to the quotation from the 69th Psalm, but to all the Old Testament scriptures; for it can be to no other scriptures that the apostle alludes. And from what he says here of them, we learn that God had not intended them merely for those generations in which they were first delivered: but for the instruction of all the succeeding generations of mankind. That we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures; That we, through those remarkable examples of patience exhibited by the saints and followers of God, whose history is given in those Scriptures; and the comfort which they derived from God, in their patient endurance of sufferings brought upon them through their faithful attachment to truth and righteousness, might have hope; that we shall be upheld and blessed as they were; and our sufferings become the means of our greater advances in faith and holiness; and consequently our hope of eternal glory be the more confirmed. Some think that the word παρηγοριαι, which we translate comfort, should be rendered exhortation; but there is certainly no need here to leave the usual acceptation of the term, as the word comfort makes a regular and consistent sense with the rest of the verse.

Verse 5. Now, the God of patience and consolation] May that God who endured them with patience, and gave them the consolation that one mouth, glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

7 Wherefore ^a receive ye one another, ^b as Christ also received us to the glory of God.

9 And ^e that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy; as it is written, supported them in all their trials and afflictions; grant you to be like-minded, give you the same mode of thinking, and the same power of acting towards each other, according to the example of Christ.

Verse 6. That ye, Jews and Gentiles, with one mind] Thinking the same things, and bearing with each other after the example of Christ; and one mouth, in all your religious assemblies, without jarring or contentions: glorify God, for calling you into such a state of salvation, and showing himself to be your loving, compassionate Father, as he is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

It is very likely that the apostle refers here to religious acts in public worship, which might have been greatly interrupted by the dissensions between the converted Jews and the converted Gentiles: these differences he labours to compose; and after having done all that was necessary in the way of instruction and exhortation, he now pours out his soul to God, who alone could rule and manage the heart; that he would enable them to think the same things, to be of the same judgment, and that all feeling their obligation to him, they might join in the sweetest harmony in every act of religious worship.

Verse 7. Wherefore receive ye one another] ἑκαστὸς ἑκαστὸν, have the most affectionate regard for each other; and acknowledge each other as the servants and children of God Almighty.

As Christ also received us] Καθὼς καὶ ὁ Χριστὸς ὑποδέξατο ἡμᾶς: In the same manner, and with the same cordial affection as Christ has received us into communion with himself; and has made us partakers of such inestimable blessings, condescending to be present in all our assemblies. And as Christ has received us to the glory of God; so should we, Jews and Gentiles, cordially receive each other, that God's glory may be promoted by our harmony and brotherly love.

Verse 8. Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision] To show the Gentiles the propriety of bearing with the scrupulous Jews, he shows them here, that they were under the greatest obligations to this people; to whom, in the days of his flesh, Jesus Christ confined his ministry; giving the world to see, that he allowed the claim of the Jews as having the first right to the blessings of the Gospel. And he confined his ministry thus to the Jews, to confirm the truth of God, contained in the promises made unto the patriarchs; for God had declared that thus it should be; and Jesus Christ, by coming according to the promise, has fulfilled this truth, by making good the promises: therefore, salvation is of the Jews, as a kind of right, conveyed to them through the promises made to their fathers. But this salvation was not exclusively designed for the Jewish people; as God by his prophets had repeatedly declared.

Verse 9. And that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy] As the Jews were to glorify God for his truth; so the Gentiles were to glorify God for his mercy. The Jews received the blessings of the Gospel by right of promise; which promise God had most punctually and circumstantially fulfilled. The Gentiles had received the same Gospel, as an effect of God's mere mercy, having no right, in consequence of any promise or engagement made with any of their ancestors; though they were originally included in the covenant made with Abraham: and the prophets had repeatedly declared that they should be made equal partakers of those blessings with the Jews themselves; as the apostle proceeds to prove.

I will confess to thee among the Gentiles] This quotation is taken from Psalm xviii. 49. and shows that the Gentiles had a right to glorify God for his mercy to them; and we shall see the strength of this saying further, when we consider a maxim of the Jews delivered in Megillah, fol. 14. "From the time that the children of Israel entered into the Promised Land, no Gentile had any right to sing a hymn of praise to God. But after that the Israelites were led into captivity, then the Gentiles began to have a right to glorify God." Thus the Jews themselves confess that the Gentiles have a right to glorify God: and this, on account of being made partakers of his grace and mercy. And if, says Schoetgen, we have a right to glorify God; then it follows that our worship must be pleasing to him: and if it be pleasing to him, then it follows, that this worship must be good; otherwise God could not be pleased with it.

Dr. Taylor gives a good paraphrase of this and the three following verses. As you Jews glorify God for his truth, so the Gentiles have a right to join with you in glorifying God for his mercy. And you have Scripture authority for admitting them to such fellowship: for instance, David says, Psal. xviii. 49. Therefore will I give thanks unto thee, O Lord, among the Gentiles; and sing praises unto thy name. And again, Moses himself says, in Deuter. chap. xxxii. 43. Rejoice, O ye Gentiles, with his people. And again, it is evident, from Psal. cxvii. that praise to God is not to be confined to the Jews only; but that all people, as they all share in his goodness, should also join in thanks to their common Benefactor; O praise the Lord, all ye nations, (Gentiles) praise him all ye people; for his merciful kindness is great towards us; and the truth of the Lord endureth for ever. Again, the prophet Isaiah expressly and clearly declares, chap. xi. ver. 10. There shall be a root of Jesse, (that is the Messiah,) and he shall rise to reign over the Gentiles, and in him shall the Gentiles hope; amen. And thus the apostle proves both to the Jews and to the Gentiles, who were probably unwilling to join with each other in religious fellowship; that they had both an equal right to glorify God; being equally interested in his mercy, goodness, and truth: and that, from the evidence of the above Scriptures, the Gentiles had as much right to hope in Christ, for the full enjoyment of his kingdom, as the Jews had; and taking occasion from the last word hope, amen, which we improperly translate trust, he pours out his heart in the following affectionate prayer.

Verse 13. Now, the God of hope, &c.] O Deus in spe, may the God of this hope, that God who caused both Jews and Gentiles to hope that the gracious promises which he made to them should be fulfilled; and who, accordingly, has fulfilled them in the most punctual manner:—

Fill you with all joy] Give you true spiritual happiness; peace in your own hearts, and unity among yourselves; in believing, not only the promises which he has given you, but believing in Christ Jesus, in whom all the promises are yea and amen.

That ye may abound in hope] That ye may be excited to take more enlarged views of the salvation which God has provided for you, and have all your expectations fulfilled by the power of the Holy Ghost, enabling you to hope and believe and then seeing the fulfilment of the promises upon your hearts.

15 Nevertheless, brethren, I have written the, more boldly unto you in some sort, as putting you in mind, because of the grace that is given to me of God,

Verse 14. And I—am persuaded of you] This is supposed to be an address to the Gentiles: and it is managed with great delicacy; he seems to apologize for the freedom he had used in writing to them; which he gives them to understand proceeded from the authority he had received by his apostolical office; the exercise of which office respected them particularly. So they could not be offended, when they found themselves so particularly distinguished.

Ye—are full of goodness] Instead of αγαθους, goodness, some MSS. of good repute, have αγαπης, love. In this connexion both words seem to mean nearly the same thing. They were so full of goodness and love, that they were disposed of themselves, to follow any plan that might be devised, in order to bring about the most perfect understanding between them and their Jewish brethren.

Filled with all knowledge] So completely instructed in the mind and design of God, relative to their calling, and the fruit which they were to bring forth to the glory of God; that they were well qualified to give one another suitable exhortations on every point.

Instead of αλλήλους, one another, several MSS. have άλλους, others; which gives a clearer sense: for if they were all filled with knowledge, there was little occasion for them to admonish one another; but by this they were well qualified to admonish others; to impart the wisdom they had to those who were less instructed.

Verse 15. Nevertheless—I have written] Notwithstanding I have this conviction of your extensive knowledge in the things of God, I have made bold to write to you, in some sort, επιμυς, to a party, among you, as some learned men translate the words, who stand more in need of such instructions than the others; and I do this, because of the grace, in τω χαρι, because of the office which I have received from God; namely, to be the apostle of the Gentiles. This authority gave him full right to say, advise, or enjoin any thing which he judged to be of importance to their spiritual interests. This subject he pursues further in the following verse.

Verse 15. Ministering the Gospel of God] εργαζομενα, acting as a priest] Here is a plain allusion, says Dr. Whitby, to the Jewish sacrifices offered by the priest, and sanctified, or made acceptable by the libamen offered with them. For he compares himself, in preaching the Gospel, to the priest performing his sacred functions, preparing his sacrifice to be offered. The Gentiles converted by him, and dedicated to the service of God, are his sacrifices and oblation. The Holy Spirit is the libamen poured upon this sacrifice, by which it was sanctified, and rendered acceptable to God. The words of Isaiah, lxi. 20. And they shall bring all your brethren for an offering unto the Lord, out of all nations, might have suggested the above idea to the mind of the apostle.

Verse 17. I have, therefore, whereof I may glory] Being sent of God on this most honourable and important errand, I have matter of great exultation, not only in the honour which he has conferred upon me; but in the great success with which he has crowned my ministry.

Verse 18. For I will not dare to speak] If the thing were not as I have stated it, I would not dare to arrogate to myself honours which did not belong to me. But God has made me the apostle of the Gentiles; and the conversion of the Gentiles is the fruit of my ministry; Christ having wrought by me, for this purpose.

By word and deed] ἄρα καὶ ἔργῳ. These words may refer to the doctrines which he taught; and to the miracles which he wrought among them. So they became obedient to the doctrines, on the evidence of the miracles with which they were accompanied.

Verse 19. Through mighty signs and wonders] This more fully explains the preceding clause:—through the power of the Holy Ghost, he was enabled to work among the Gentiles mighty signs and wonders; so that they were fully convinced that both his doctrine and mission were divine; and therefore they cheerfully received the Gospel of the Lord Jesus.

Round about unto Illyricum] Among ancient writers, this place has gone by a great variety of names, Illyria, Illyrica, Illyricum, Illyris, and Illyrisium. It is a country of Europe, extending from the Adriatic gulf to Pannonia; according to Pliny, it extended from the river Arva, to the river Drivus, thus including Liburnia on the west, and Dalmatia on the east. Its precise limits have not been determined by either ancient or modern geographers. It seems, according to an inscription in Gruter, to have been divided by Augustus into two provinces, the upper and lower. It now forms part of Croatia, Bosnia, Istria, and Sclavonia. When the apostle says that he preached the Gospel from Jerusalem round about to Illyricum, he intends his land journeys chiefly; and by looking at the Map annexed to the Acts of the Apostles, the reader will see that from Jerusalem, the apostle went round the eastern coast of the Mediterranean Sea, and that he passed through Syria, Phœnicia, Arabia, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, Galatia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Phrygia, Troas, Asia, Caria, Lycia, Ionia, Lydia, Thrace, Macedonia, Thessaly, and Achaia; besides the isles of Cyprus and Crete. And no doubt he visited many other places which are not mentioned in the New Testament.

I have fully preached the Gospel] Παράκληται τοὺς μακκαλλοὺς, I have successfully preached: I have not only proclaimed the word, but made converts, and founded churches. See the Note on Matt. v. 17. where this sense of the word πλήρως is noticed; for it signifies not only fully or perfectly, but also to teach with prosperity and success.

Verse 20. So have I strived to preach the Gospel] Ὅσα δὲ φιλοτιμουμένου, for I have considered it my honour to preach the Gospel where that Gospel was before unknown. This is the proper import of the word φιλοτιμουμαι, from φιλος, a friend, and τιμη, honour. As I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, so I esteem it an honour to preach it; and especially to proclaim it among the heathen; not building on another man's foundation, not watering what another apostle had planted; but cheerfully exposing myself to all kinds of dangers and hardships, in order to found new churches.

Verse 21. But as it is written] These words quoted from Isai. lii. 15. the apostle applies to his own conduct; not that the words themselves predicted what Paul had done, but that he endeavoured to fulfil such a declaration by his manner of preaching the Gospel to the heathen.

Verse 22. For which cause, &c.] My considering it a point of honour to build on no other man's foundation, and finding that the Gospel has been long ago planted at Rome, I have been prevented from going thither, purposing rather to spend my time and strength in preaching where Christ has not as yet been proclaimed.

Verse 23. But—having no more place in these parts] Having nothing further at present that I can do; for οπου ουκ εστι, signifies not merely to have a place of residence, or the like, but convenience, opportunity; which is a frequent meaning of the phrase among the best Greek writers: having no large place or city, where Christianity has not yet been planted in which I can introduce the Gospel. The apostle was then at Corinth; and, having evangelized all those parts, he had no opportunity of breaking up any new ground.

Verse 24. Whensoever I take my journey into Spain] Where it is very likely the Gospel had not yet been planted; though legendary tales inform us, that St. James had planted the Gospel there long before this time; and had founded many bishoprics! But this is as unfounded as it is ridiculous and absurd: for nothing like what is now termed a bishopric, nor even a parish, was founded for many years after this. An itinerant preacher might with more propriety, say travelling circuits were formed, rather than bishoprics. Whether the apostle ever fulfilled his design of going to Spain is unknown; but there is no evidence whatever that he did; and the presumption is, that he did not undertake this voyage. Antiquity affords no proof that he fulfilled his intention.

I will come to you] Ελθωμας προς υμας; these words are wanting in almost every MS. of note: and in the Syriac Erpen, Coptic, Vulgate, Aethiopic, Armenian, and Itala. If the first clause of this verse be read in connexion with the latter clause of the preceding, it will fully appear that this rejected clause is useless. Having a great desire these many years, to come unto you, whensoever I take my journey into Spain: for I trust to see you in my journey, &c.

Somewhat filled with your company.] The word επιπληρωθεω, which we translate filled, would be better rendered gratified; for επιπληρωθεις, signifies to be satisfied, to be gratified, and to enjoy. *ELIAN. Οφθαλμοισιν αυτω.

Odyss. lib. xi. ver. 451.

"But my wife never suffered my eyes to be delighted with my son."

The apostle, though he had not the honour of having planted the church at Rome; yet expected much gratification from the visit which he intended to pay them.

Verse 25. Now I go unto Jerusalem] From this and the two following verses, we learn that the object of his journey to Jerusalem was, to carry a contribution made among the Gentile Christians of Macedonia and Achaia, for the relief of the poor Jewish Christians at Jerusalem. About this business he had taken great pains, as appears from 1 Cor. xvi. 1—4. 2 Cor. viii. and ix. chapters. His design in this affair is very evident, from 2 Cor. ix. 12, 13, where he says, The administration of this service not only supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto God; whilst, by the experiment of this ministration, they glorify God for your professed subjection unto the Gospel of Christ; and for your liberal distribution unto them, and unto all men. The apostle was in hopes that this liberal contribution, sent by the Gentile Christians, who had been converted by St. Paul's ministry, would engage the affections of the Jewish Christians, who had been much prejudiced against the reception of the Gentiles into the church, without being previously obliged to submit to the yoke of the law. He wished to establish a coalition between the converted Jews and Gentiles; being sensible of its great importance to the spread of the Gospel; and his procuring this contribution, was one laudable device to accomplish this good end. And this shows why he so earnestly requests the prayers of the Christians at Rome; that his service, which he had for Jerusalem, might be accepted of the saints. See Dr. Taylor.

Verse 27. For, if the Gentiles have been made partakers, &c.] It was through, and by means of the Jews, that the Gentiles were brought to the knowledge of God, and the Gospel of Christ.

this, and have sealed to them * this fruit, I will come by you into Spain.

29 ^b And I am sure that, when I come unto you, I shall come in the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ.

30 Now I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and ^c for the love of the Spirit, ^d that ye strive together with me in your prayers to God for me;

These were the spiritual things which they had received: and the pecuniary contribution was the carnal things which the Gentiles were now returning.

Verse 28. When, therefore, I have performed this Service; And have sealed, faithfully delivered up to them, this fruit of the success of my ministry, and of your conversion to God; I will come by you into Spain: this was in his desire: he had fully purposed it, if God should see meet to permit him; but it does not appear that he ever went. See ver. 24.

Verse 29. In the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ] The words του ευαγγελιου του, of the Gospel, are wanting in almost every MS. of importance. Griesbach has left them out of the text. There is no doubt they should be omitted. The fulness of the blessing of Christ, is really more than the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ. He hoped to come to them not only with the blessing of the Gospel, but endued with the gifts and graces of the Lord Jesus himself: which he was now a constant instrument in the hand of God, to dispense among those who were converted to the Christian faith.

Verse 30. For the love of the Spirit] By that love of God which the Holy Spirit sheds abroad in your hearts.

That ye strive together] Συμαγωνισασθε, that ye agonize with me. He felt that much depended on the success of his present mission to the Christians at Jerusalem; and their acceptance of the charitable contribution which he was bringing with him in order to conciliate them to the reception of the Gentiles into the church of God, without obliging them to submit to circumcision.

Verse 31. That I may be delivered from them that do not believe] He knew that his countrymen who had not received the Gospel, lay in wait for his life; and, no doubt, they thought they should do God service by destroying him: not only as an apostate, in their apprehension, from the Jewish religion; but as one who was labouring to subvert and entirely destroy it.

And that my service] Διανοια; but several eminent MSS. read δωρομα, the gift which I bear. This probably was a gloss, which in many MSS. subverted the word in the text; for Διανοια, service, in its connexion here, could refer to nothing else, but the contribution which he was carrying to the poor saints at Jerusalem.

Verse 32. That I may come unto you with joy] That his apprehensions of ill usage were not groundless, and the danger to which his life was exposed, real, we have already seen in the account given of this visit, Acts xxi. xxii. xxiii. and xxiv. And that he had such intimations from the Holy Spirit himself, appears from Acts xx. 23. xxi. 11. and xx. 38. Should his journey to Jerusalem be prolix, and his service accepted, so that the converted Jews and Gentiles should come to a better understanding, he hoped to see them at Rome with great joy. And if he got his wishes gratified through their prayers, it would be the full proof that this whole business had been conducted according to the will of God.

Verse 33. The God of peace be with you] The whole object of the epistle is to establish peace between the believing Jews and Gentiles; and to show them their mutual obligations, and the infinite mercy of God to both; and now he concludes with praying that the God of peace, he from whom it comes, and by whom it is preserved, may be for ever with them. The word Amen, at the end, does not appear to have been written by the apostle; it is wanting in some of the most ancient MSS.

1. In the preceding chapters the apostle enjoins a very hard, but a very important and necessary duty, that of bearing with each other; and endeavouring to think, and let think, in those religious matters which are confessedly not essential to the salvation of the soul. Most of the disputes among Christians have been concerning non-essential points. Rites and ceremonies, even in the simple religion of Christ, have contributed their part in promoting those animosities by which Christians have been divided. Forms in worship, and sacerdotal garments, have not been without their influence in this general disturbance. Each side has been ready to take out of the 14th and 15th chapters of this epistle, such expressions as seemed suitable to their own case; but few have been found who have taken up the whole. You believe that a person who holds such and such opinions is wrong; pity him, and set him right; lovingly, if possible. He believes you to be wrong, because you do not hold those points: he must bear with you. Both of you stand precisely on the same ground, and are mutually indebted to mutual forbearance.

2. Beware of contentions in religion; if you dispute concerning any of its doctrines, let it be to find out truth; not to support a preconceived, and pre-established opinion. Avoid all potemical heat and rancour; these prove the absence of the religion of Christ. Whatever does not lead you to love God and man more, is most assuredly from beneath. The God of peace is the Author of Christianity: and the Prince of peace, the priest and sacrifice of it; therefore love one another; and leave off contention before it be meddled with. On this subject, the advice of pious Mr. Herbert is good:—

Be calm in arguing; for fierceness makes Error a fault, and truth discourtesy.
Why should I feel another man's mistakes
More than his sickness or his poverty?
In love I should; but anger is not love;
Nor wisdom neither:—therefore gently move.

CHAPTER XVI.

The apostle commends to the Christians at Rome, Phæbe, a deaconess of the church at Cenchræa, 1, 2. Sends greetings to Aquila and Priscilla, of whom he gives a high character; and greets also the church at their house, 3—5. Mentions several others by name, both men and women, who were members of the church of Christ at Rome, 6—16. Warns them to beware of those who cause dissensions and divisions, of whom he gives an awful character, 17, 18. Extols the obedience of the Roman Christians, and promises them a complete victory over Satan, 19, 20. Several persons send their salutations, 21—23. To whose good wishes he subjoins the apostolic blessing; commends them to God; gives an abstract of the doctrines of the Gospel; and concludes with ascribing glory to the only wise God, through Christ Jesus, 24—27.

NOTES ON CHAP. XVI.

Verse 1. I commend unto you Phæbe] As the apostle had not been at Rome, previously to his writing this epistle; he could not have had a personal acquaintance with those members of the church there, to whom he sends these friendly salutations. It is likely that many of them were his own converts; who, in different parts of Asia Minor and Greece, had heard him preach the Gospel, and afterward became settlers at Rome.

Phæbe is here termed a servant, διακονος, a deaconess of the church at Cenchræa. There were deaconesses in the primitive church, whose business it was to attend the female converts at baptism; to instruct the catechumens, or persons who were candidates for baptism; to visit the sick, and those who were in prison; and, in short, perform those religious offices, for the female part of the church, which could not with propriety be performed by men. They were chosen in general out of the most experienced of the church; and were ordinarily widows, who had borne children. Some ancient constitutions required them to be forty, others fifty, and others sixty years of age. It is evident that they were ordained to their office, by the imposition of the hands of the bishop; and the form of prayer used on the occasion is extant in the apostolical constitutions. In the tenth or eleventh century, the order became extinct in the Latin church; but continued in the Greek church till the end of the twelfth century.—See Broughton's Dictionary, article Deaconess.

Cenchræa was a seaport on the east side of the Isthmus, which joined the Morea to Greece; as the Lecheum was the seaport on the west side of the same Isthmus. These were the only two havens and towns of any note next to Corinth, that belonged to this territory. As the Lecheum opened the road to the Ionian Sea, so Cenchræa opened the road to the Ægean: and both were so advantageously situated for commerce, that they were very rich. It was on the Isthmus, between those two ports, which was about six miles wide, that the Isthmian games were celebrated; to which St. Paul makes such frequent allusions.

Verse 2. Succourer of many] One who probably entertained the apostles and preachers who came to minister at Cenchræa; and who was remarkable for entertaining strangers. See on chap. xii. 8.

Verse 3. Greet Priscilla and Aquila] This pious couple had been obliged to leave Rome, on the edict of Claudius, see Acts xviii. 2. and take refuge in Greece. It is likely that they returned to Rome at the death of Claudius, or whenever the decree was annulled. It seems they had greatly contributed to assist the apostle in his important labours. Instead of Priscilla, the principal MSS. and Versions, have Prisca, which most critics suppose to be the genuine reading.

Verse 4. Who have for my life laid down their own necks] What transaction this refers to we know not; but it appears that these persons had, on some occasion, hazarded their own lives to save that of the apostle; and that the fact was known to all the churches of God in that quarter; who felt themselves under the highest obligations to these pious persons for the important service which they had thus rendered.

Verse 5. The church that is in their house] In these primitive times, no such places existed as those which we now term churches; the word always signifying the congregation, or assembly of believers, and not the place they assembled in.—See the term defined at the end of notes on Matt. xvi.

Epenetus—the first-fruits of Achaia] In 1 Cor. xvi. 15. the house or family of Stephanas, is said to be the first-fruits of Achaia:—how then can it be said here, that Epenetus was the first-fruits, or first person who had received the Gospel in that district? Ans.—Epenetus might have been one of the family of Stephanas; for it is not said that Stephanas was the first-fruits, but his house or family; and there can be no impropriety in supposing that one of that house or family was called Epenetus: and that this person being the only one of the family now at Rome, might be mentioned as the first-fruits of Achaia; that is, one of that family which first received the Gospel in that country. This would rationally account for the apparent difficulty, were we sure that Αχαια, Achaia, was the true reading; but this is more than doubtful, for Ασια, Asia, is the reading of ABCDEFG, some others; the Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Vulgate, and Itala; and some of the chief of the Fathers. On this evidence, Griesbach has admitted it into the text. Yet the other reading is sufficiently natural, for the reasons already assigned.

Verse 6. Greet Mary, who bestowed much labour on us.] Who this Mary was, or what the labour was, which she bestowed upon the apostles, we know not. Her works, though hidden from man, are with God; and her name is recorded with honour in this book of life.

Verse 7. Andronicus and Junia, my kinsmen] As the word συγγενος, signifies relatives, whether male or female; and as Junia may probably be the name of a woman, the wife of Andronicus, it would be better to say relatives, than kinsmen. But probably St. Paul means no more than that they were Jews; for in chap. ix. 3. he calls all the Jews his kinsmen according to the flesh.

My fellow-prisoners] As Paul was in prisons often, it is likely that these persons shared this honour with him on some occasion, which is not distinctly marked.

Of note among the apostles] Whether this intimates that they were noted apostles, or only highly reputed by the apostles, is not absolutely clear: but the latter appears to me the most probable. They were not only well known to St. Paul, but also to the rest of the apostles.

In Christ before me.] That is, they were converted to Christianity before Paul was; probably at the day of Pentecost, or by the ministry of Christ himself, or by that of the seventy disciples.

Verse 8. Amplias, my beloved in the Lord] One who is my particular friend; and also a genuine Christian.

Verse 9. Urbane, our helper] Who this Urbane was, we know not: what is here stated, is, that he had been a fellow-labourer with the apostles.

Stachys my beloved] One of my particular friends.

Verse 10. Apelles, approved in Christ] A man who, on different occasions, had given the highest proofs of the sincerity and depth of his religion. Some suppose that Apelles was the same with Apollos. Whoever he was, he had given every demonstration of being a genuine Christian.

Of Aristobulus' household] It is doubted whether this person was converted: as the apostle does not salute him, but his household; or, as the margin reads, his friends. He might have been a Roman of considerable distinction: who, though not converted himself, had Christians among his servants or his slaves. But, whatever he was, it is likely that he was dead at this time, and therefore those of his household only are referred to by the apostle.

another converted Jew. See on ver. 7.

Of the household of Narcissus] Probably dead also, as we have supposed Aristobulus to have been at this time.

Which are in the Lord.] This might intimate that some of this family were not Christians; those only of that family that were converted to the Lord, being saluted. There was a person of the name of Narcissus, who was a freed man of the emperor Claudius, mentioned by Suetonius, in his life of that prince, cap. 37. And by Tacitus, An. lib. xii. cap. 57. But there does not seem any reason to suppose that this was the person designed by St. Paul.

Verse 12. Tryphena and Tryphosa] Two holy women, who, it seems, were assistants to the apostle in his work; probably by exhorting, visiting the sick, &c. Persis was another woman, who, it seems, excelled the preceding; for, of her it is said, she laboured much in the Lord.
We learn from this, that Christian women, as well as men, laboured in the ministry of the word. In those times of simplicity, all persons, whether men or women, who had received the knowledge of the truth, believed it to be their duty to propagate it to the uttermost of their power. Many have spent much useless labour in endeavouring to prove that these women did not preach. That there were some prophetesses, as well as prophets, in the Christian church, we learn; and that a woman might pray or prophesy, provided she had her head covered, we know; and that whoever prophesied, spoke unto others to edification, exhortation, and comfort, St. Paul declares 1 Cor. xiv. 3. And that no preacher can do more, every person must acknowledge; because to edify, exhort, and comfort, are the prime ends of the Gospel ministry. If women thus prophesied, then women preached. There is, however, much more than this implied in the Christian ministry; of which men only, and men called of God, are capable.

His mother and mine] It is not likely that the mother of Rufus was the mother of Paul; but while she was the natural mother of the former, she acted as a mother to the latter. We say of a person of this character that she is a motherly woman. Among the ancients, he or she, who acted a kind, instructing, and indulgent part to another, was styled the father or mother of such a one. So Terence.

Naturā tu illi pater es, consiliū ego.
Adelphi, Act i. scene 2. ver. 47.

Thou art his father by nature, I, by instruction.

Verse 14. Salute Asyncritus, &c.] Who these were, we know not: Hermas was probably the same to whom a work called the Shepherd, is attributed; a work with this title is still extant, and may be found among the writings of the apostolical fathers. But it is vain to look for identity of persons, in similarity of names; for, among the Greeks and Romans, at this time there were many persons who bore the same names mentioned in this chapter.

Verse 15. Salute Philologus, &c.] Of these several persons, though much has been conjectured, nothing certain is known. Even the names of some are so ambiguous, that we know not whether they were men or women. They were persons well known to St. Paul, and undoubtedly were such as had gone from different places where the apostle had preached, to sojourn or settle at Rome. One thing we may remark, that there is no mention of St. Peter, who, according to the Roman and Papistical catalogue of bishops, must have been at Rome at this time; if he were not now at Rome, the foundation stone of Rome's ascendancy, of Peter's supremacy, and of the uninterrupted succession, is taken away; and the whole fabric falls to the ground. But, if Peter were at Rome at this time, Paul would have sent his salutations to him, in the first place; and if Peter were there, he must have been there according to the Papistical doctrine, as bishop and vicar of Jesus Christ. But if he were there, is it likely that he should have been passed by, while Andronicus and Junia are mentioned as of note amongst the apostles, ver. 7. and that St.
Paul should call on the people to remedy the disorders that had crept in among themselves; should not these directions have been given to Peter, the head of the church? And if there were a church, in the Papistical sense of the word, founded there, of which Peter was the head, is it likely that that church should be in the house of Priscilla and Aquila? ver. 5. But it is loss of time to refute such ridiculous and groundless pretensions. It is very likely that Peter, so far from being universal bishop at Rome, never saw the city in his life.

Verse 16. Salute one another with a holy kiss] In those early times, the kiss, as a token of peace, friendship, and brotherly love, was frequent among all people; and the Christians used it in their public assemblies, as well as in their occasional meetings. This was at last laid aside, not because it was abused, but because the church becoming very numerous, the thing was impossible. In some countries the kiss of friendship is still common; and in such countries it is scarcely ever abused; nor is it an incentive to evil, because it is customary and common. Shaking of hands is now substituted for it in almost all Christian congregations.

The churches of Christ salute you] The word εσπασαν, ALL, is added here by some of the most reputable MSS. and principal Versions; and Griesbach has received it into his text. St. Paul must mean here, that all the churches in Greece and Asia, through which he had passed, in which the faith of the Christians at Rome was known, spoke of them affectionately and honourably: and probably knowing the apostle's design of visiting Rome, desired to be kindly remembered to the church in that city.

Verse 17. Mark them which cause divisions] Several MSS. read απομαρτυρομενοι, look sharply after them: let them have no kiss of charity nor peace; because they strive to make divisions, and thus set the flock of Christ at variance among themselves; and from these divisions, offences, εκαταστασεις, scandals are produced; and this is contrary to that doctrine of peace, unity, and brotherly love, which you have learned. Look sharply after such, that they do you no evil: and avoid them: give them no countenance, and have no religious fellowship with them.

Verse 18. They serve not our Lord Jesus] They profess to be apostles, but they are not apostles of Christ: they neither do his will, nor preach his doctrine; they serve their own belly. They have intruded themselves into the church of Christ, that they might get a secular support. It is for worldly gain alone, that they take up the profession of the ministry; they have no Divine credentials; they convert not the heathen nor the ungodly; they have no Divine unction; but by good words and fair speeches, (for they have no miraculous nor saving powers,) deceive the hearts of the simple, perverting Christian converts, that they may get their property; and thus secure a maintenance for themselves.—The church of God has ever been troubled with such pretended pastors; men who feed themselves, not the flock; men who are too proud to beg, and too lazy to work: who have neither grace nor gifts to plant the standard of the cross on the devil's territories; and by the power of Christ, make inroads upon his kingdom, and spoil him of his subjects. On the contrary, by sowing the seeds of dissensions, by means of doubtful disputations, and the propagation of scandals; by glaring and insinuating speeches, χρηστολογιας, for they affect elegance and good breeding, they rend Christian congregations, form a party for themselves, and thus live on the spoils of the church of God.

Should it be asked, Whom do you intend by this description? I answer, no soul, nor party, but such as the description suits. Irasceris?—De re fabula narratus.

Verse 19. For your obedience is come abroad] The apostle gives this as a reason why they should continue to hear and heed those who had led them into the path of truth; and avoid those false teachers whose doctrines tended to the subversion of their souls.

Yet I would have you wise] I would wish you carefully to discern the good from the evil, and to show your wisdom by carefully avoiding the one, and cleaving to the other.

Verse 20. The God of peace] Who neither sends nor favours such disturbers of the tranquillity of his church.

Shall bruise Satan] Shall give you the dominion over the great adversary of your souls; and over all his agents, who, through his influence, endeavour to destroy your peace, and subvert your minds.

Several critics suppose that the word Satan is a sort of collective term here, by which all opponents and adversaries are meant; and especially those false teachers to whom he refers above. It rather means the devil and his agents.

The grace of our Lord] That you may be truly wise; simple, obedient, and steady in the truth; may the favour, or gracious influence, of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you! without which you cannot be preserved from evil, nor do any thing that is good.

Here the apostle appears to have intended to conclude his epistle: but afterward he added a postscript, if not two, as we shall see below. Several ancient MSS. omit the whole of this clause, probably thinking that it had been borrowed from ver. 24. but on the ground that the apostle might have added a postscript or two, not having immediate opportunity to send the epistle, there is no need for this supposition.

Verse 21. Timotheus, my work-fellow] This is on all hands allowed to be the same Timothy to whom St. Paul directs the two epistles which are still extant. See some account of him in the notes on Acts xvi. 1, &c.

Lucius] This was probably Luke, the evangelist, and writer of the book called The Acts of the Apostles. For a short account of him, see the Preface to that book.

Jason] It is likely that this is the same person mentioned Acts xvii. 7. who, at Thessalonica, received the apostles into his house, and befriended them at the risk both of his property and life.

Sosipater] He was a Berean, the son of one Pyrrhus, a Jew by birth; and accompanied St. Paul from Greece into Asia; and probably into Judea. See Acts xx. 4.

Verse 22. I Tertius, who wrote this epistle] Some eminent commentators suppose Tertius to be the same with Silas, the companion of St. Paul. If this were so, it is strange that the name which is generally given him elsewhere in Scripture, should not be used in this place. I have already noticed, (Preface, page 5.) that some learned men have supposed that St. Paul wrote this epistle in Syriac; and that Tertius translated it into Greek: but this can never agree with the declaration here; I Tertius, who wrote, ἡ γράμματις τῆς ἐπιστολῆς, this epistle; not translated or interpreted it. It appears that St. Paul dictated it to him; and he wrote it down from the apostle's mouth: and here introduces himself as joining with St. Paul in affectionate wishes for their welfare.

tionate respect which the grace of the Lord Jesus inspires. It is not clear whether the two following verses be the words of Tertius, or St. Paul.

Verse 23. Gaius, mine host] Gaius, in Greek, is the same as Caius in Latin, which was a very common name among the Romans. St. Luke, Acts xix. 29. mentions one Gaius of Macedonia, who was exposed to much violence at Ephesus in the tumult excited by Demetrius the silversmith, against St. Paul and his companions; and it is very possible that this was the same person. He is here called not only the host, ξένος, the entertainer of St. Paul, or Tertius, (if he wrote this and the following verse,) but also of the whole church: that is, he received and lodged the apostles who came from different places, as well as the messengers of the churches. All made his house their home; and he must have been a person of considerable property to be able to bear this expense: and of much piety and love to the cause of Christ, else he had not employed that property in this way.

Erastus, the chamberlain of the city] Treasurer of the city of Corinth, from which St. Paul wrote this epistle. This is supposed to be the same person as is mentioned Acts xix. 22. He was one of St. Paul's companions; and, as appears from 2 Tim. iv. 20. was left about this time by the apostle at Corinth. He is called the chamberlain, αἰνομαστός, which signifies the same as treasurer; he to whom the receipt and expenditure of the public money was entrusted. He received the tolls, customs, &c. belonging to the city, and out of them paid the public expenses. Such persons were in very high credit, and if Erastus was at this time treasurer, it would appear that Christianity was then in considerable repute in Corinth. But if the Erastus of the Acts were the same with the Erastus mentioned here, it is not likely that he now held the office, for this could not at all comport with his travelling with St. Paul. Hence several, both ancients and moderns, who believe the identity of the persons, suppose that Erastus was not now treasurer, but that having formerly been so, he still retained the title. Chrysostom thought that he still retained the employment.

Quartus, a brother] Whether the brother of Erastus or of Tertius we know not; probably nothing more is meant than that he was a Christian, one of the heavenly family, a brother in the Lord.

Verse 24. The grace of our Lord] This is the conclusion of Tertius, and is similar to what St. Paul used above. Hence it is possible that Tertius wrote the whole of the 22d, 23d, and 24th verses, without receiving any particular instructions from St. Paul, except the bare permission to add his own salutations with those of his particular friends.

There is a great deal of disagreement among the MSS. and Versions relative to this verse; some rejecting it entirely, and some of those which place the following verses at the end of chap. xiv. inserting it at the end of the 27th verse in that place. The reader who chooses, may consult Wetstein, and Griesbach on these discordances.

Verse 25. Now to him] In the note at the end of chap. xiv. I have shown that this and the following verses are, by the most reputable MSS. and Versions, placed at the end of that chapter; which is supposed, by most critics, to be their proper place. Some of the arguments adduced in favour of this transposition, may be found in the note above-mentioned. I shall, therefore, refer to Griesbach, and proceed to make a few short remarks on the verses as they occur here.

Of power to stablish you] To that God without whom nothing is wise, nothing strong; who is as willing to teach as he is wise; as ready to help, as he is strong.

According to my Gospel] That Gospel which explains and publishes God's purpose of taking the Gentiles to be His people under the Messiah, without subjecting them to the law of Moses. This is what he here calls the preaching of Jesus Christ, for without this he did not think, as Mr. Locke observes, that Christ was preached to the Gentiles as he ought to be; and therefore in several places of his epistle to the Galatians, he calls it the truth, and the truth of the Gospel, and uses the like expressions to the Ephesians and Colossians. This is that mystery which he is so much concerned that the Ephesians should understand and adhere to firmly; and which was revealed to him according to that Gospel whereof he was made a minister. And it is probable that this grand mystery of bringing the Gentiles into the kingdom of God, without passing through the rites of the Mosaic law, was revealed more particularly to St. Paul, than to any other of the apostles; and that he preached it more pointedly, and certainly with more success. See Taylor and Locke.

Which was kept secret] This purpose of calling the Gentiles, and giving them equal privileges to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known to all nations for the obedience of faith:

27 To ^a God only wise, be glory through Jesus Christ for ever. ^b Amen.

Verse 26. But now is made manifest] Now, under the New Testament dispensation, and by my preaching.

By the scriptures of the prophets] Hints relative to this important work being scattered up and down through all their works, but no clear revelation that the Gentiles who should be admitted into the church, should be admitted without passing under the yoke of the Mosaic law. This was the point which was kept secret: as to the calling of the Gentiles, this was declared in general terms by the prophets, and the apostle quotes and makes a most important use of their predictions; but the other was a point on which the prophets gave no information, and it seems to have been peculiarly revealed to St. Paul, who received the commandment of the everlasting God to make it known in πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, to all the Gentiles; all the people of the earth that were not of Jewish extraction. And it was to be made known for the obedience of faith, that they might believe its doctrines, and obey its precepts; its universal voice requiring repentance towards God, faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and circumcision of the heart, in the place of all Jewish rites and ceremonies.

Verse 27. To God only wise] This comes in with great propriety. He alone, who is the Fountain of wisdom and knowledge, had all this mystery in himself, and he alone who knew the times, places, persons, and circumstances, could reveal the whole; and he has revealed all in such a way as not only to manifest his unsearchable wisdom, but also his infinite goodness. Therefore, to him be glory for his wisdom in devising this most admirable plan; and his goodness in sending Christ Jesus to execute it: to Him, through Christ Jesus, be glory for ever! Because this plan is to last for ever; and is to have no issue but in eternal glory.

Written to the Romans from Corinthus, &c.] That this epistle was written from Corinth is almost universally believed. That Phœbe was a deaconess of the church at Cenchrea, we have seen in the first verse of this chapter; and that the epistle might have been sent by her to Rome is possible: but that she should have been the writer of the epistle, as this subscription states, ἡ φαιβη διακονησασα, is false, for the 22d verse shows that Tertius was the writer, though by inserting the words and sent, we represent her rather as the carrier than the writer. This subscription, however, stands on very questionable grounds. It is wanting in almost all the ancient MSS. and even of those which are more modern, few have it entirely, as in our common editions. It has already been noted that the subscriptions to the sacred books are of little or no authority; all having been added in latter times, and frequently by injudicious hands. The most ancient have simply To the Romans, or the epistle to the Romans is finished. The word Amen was seldom added by the inspired writers, and here it is wanting in almost all the ancient MSS. As this was a word in frequent use in religious services, pious people would naturally employ it in finishing the reading or copying of this epistle, as they would thereby express their conviction of the truth of its contents, and their desire that the promises contained in it might be fulfilled to them and to the church at large; and in this sense the word is not only harmless, but useful. May the fulness of the Gentiles be brought in, and may all Israel be saved! This is treated of at large in this epistle; and to this prayer let every pious reader say AMEN! See the observations on this word at the end of the Gospel of John.

Before I conclude this work, I shall beg leave to add several important observations, chiefly extracted from Dr. Taylor.

1. Paul, the apostle, writes to all the Christians at Rome, without distinction, as being called of Jesus Christ; beloved of God, called saints, as justified by faith, and having peace with God, as standing in the grace of the Gospel, chap. v. 1, 2. as alive from the dead, chap. vi. 13, &c. He gives them various exhortations, Walk in newness of life. Let not sin reign in your mortal body. Yield yourselves unto God, chap. xii. 1, &c. I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service: chap. xiv. 10, 12. We shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ. Every one of us shall give account of himself to God: chap. xiii. 11, 12, 13, 14. It is high time to awake out of sleep; let us therefore cast off the works of darkness; let us not walk in rioting and drunkenness, in chambering and wantonness, in strife and envying; Make no provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof: viii. 13. For, if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; but if ye shall deny yourselves hereafter die, meaning in the world to come. But if ye, through the Spirit, do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live.

2. The rites and ceremonies of the law of Moses were incorporated into the civil state of the Jews, and so might be considered as national and political usages. Now, as the Gospel did not interfere with, or subvert, any national polity upon earth; but left all men, in all the several countries of the globe, to live, in all things not sinful, according to the civil constitution under which it found them: so it left the Jews also at liberty to observe all the rites and injunctions of the law of Moses, considered as a part of the civil and political usages of the nation. And in this respect, they remained in force so long as the Jews were a nation, having the temple, the token of God's presence and residence, among them. But when the temple was destroyed, and they were expelled the land of Canaan, their polity was dissolved, and the Mosaic rites were quite laid aside. And as the time in which this happened was near, when the Epistle to the Hebrews was written, therefore the apostle saith, The first covenant, or Mosaic dispensation, was then decaying and waxing old, and ready to vanish away, Hebr. viii. 13.

3. But though the Gospel was not, in itself, intended to unchurch the Jews; yet the Jews every where warmly opposed the preaching of it, though not for the same reasons. Some Jews opposed it totally, and rejected the whole Gospel as unnecessary, judging the Mosaic constitution, and their conformity to the law there delivered, completely sufficient for justification or salvation, without any further provision made by the grace of God. These accounted Christ our Lord an impostor, and the Gospel a forgery; and therefore persecuted the apostles with the utmost assiduity and outrage, as deceivers who had no divine mission. Such were the Jews who put Stephen to death, Acts vi. vii. chapters. Such were they at Antioch, in Pisidia, who were filled with envy, and spake against the things that were spoken by Paul, contradicting and blaspheming, Acts xiii. 45, 50. Such were the Jews at Iconium, Acts xiv. 2, 19.—at Thessalonica, xvii. 5.—at Corinth, xviii. 5, 6. and in other places. And such a Jew was Paul himself before his conversion. He consented to the death of Stephen, made havoc of the church, Acts viii. 3. and breathed out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, ix. 1. xxii. 4. xxvi. 9, 10, 11.

4. What Paul's principles, and those of the unbelieving Jews were, we may learn, if we observe, that the first persecution raised against the apostles at Jerusalem, was, partly, on account of their preaching through Jesus the resurrection from the dead, Acts iv. 1, 2. This gave great offence to the Sadducees; and, partly, because they openly affirmed that Jesus, whom the rulers of the Jews slew and hanged on a tree, was the Messiah, whom God had exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour. This disgusted all the council and senate of the Jews, Acts v. 21, 28, 29, 30, 31. But with regard to these two particulars, the indignation of the Jews seems, for some time, abated; till the doctrine the apostles taught was better understood; and Stephen in his dispute with some learned Jews, had suggested that the Gospel was intended to abrogate the Mosaic constitution, Acts vi. 9—15. This irritated the Jews afresh; especially the Pharisees, the strictest, and most numerous sect among them. And Saul, one of that sect, (Acts xvi. 5. xxiii. 6.) being then a young man, just come out of Gamaliel's school, having finished his studies in the law, and being fully persuaded that the Jewish dispensation was instituted by God, never to be altered, but to abide for ever, he really believed that Jesus and his followers were deceivers, and that it was his duty to oppose them, and to stand up courageously for God and his truth. Thus he honestly followed the dictates of his own conscience. How far other unbelieving Jews were, or were not, upright in their opposition to the Gospel, God only knows; but their professed principles seem to be nearly the same. In short; they were for seizing on the inheritance, (Matt. xxi. 38.) and for engrossing all salvation, and the favour of God, to themselves. The Jews, they judged, were the only people of God; and the Jewish nation the only true church, out of which there was no salvation. No man could be in a state of acceptance with God, without observing the law of Moses. The works of the law, moral and ceremonial, must be performed, in order to his being a member of God's church and family, and having a right to future and eternal happiness. They expected the Messiah indeed and his kingdom; but not as if either had a reference to another world. The law, and a punctual observance of it, was the ground of their expectations in a future world. And as for the Messiah, they supposed his coming and kingdom related only to the temporal prosperity and grandeur of the Jewish nation, and the perpetual establishment of their law, by rescuing them out of the hands of the Gentile powers, who had greatly embarrassed and distressed their constitution. Thus they endeavoured to establish their own righteousness, (Rom. x. 3.) salvation or interest in God; an interest which they imagined for themselves, and which excluded men of all other nations, who, they thought, were, in fact, utterly excluded from the Divine favour and eternal life, as quite lost and hopeless. Against us Gentiles, they had the strongest prejudices, accounting us as perfectly vile, as nothing, as abandoned of God, only because we were not included in their peculiarity; while they imagined themselves to be vastly superior to us, and the only people beloved of God, purely on account of their external privileges, and relation to God as the seed of Abraham; being circumcised, enjoying the law, the promises and ordinances of worship, &c.

5. And this was another ground of their opposition to the Gospel, when it was preached to the Gentiles. Indeed the apostles themselves, and the first Christians among the Jews, had, for some time, no notion of the Gospel's being preached to the Gentiles; till God, in a vision, convinced Peter it was his will that it should, Acts x. But the unbelieving Jews regarded the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles, or the declaring that they were, upon their faith in Christ, pardoned and admitted into the church of God, and to the hopes of eternal life, almost in the same manner as we should regard the preaching of the Gospel to brute creatures. They could not bear the thought that the Gentiles, any barbarous nations, should, only by faith, have an equal interest in God and the blessings of his covenant, with themselves. They did not indeed deny the possibility of their being taken into the church, and of obtaining salvation. But it must be only by their becoming Jews; they must first submit to the law, and yield obedience to its precepts and obligations, before they could be the qualified objects of God's mercy. There was no grace, no part in the kingdom of God, either here or hereafter, for a Gentile, unless he first became a Jew, and performed the works of the Mosaic law. By these sentiments they were led to do all they could to oppose the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles, and became very bitter enemies to Paul, who was the apostle particularly selected and commissioned for that purpose. They could not allow the Gentiles to have any access to the privileges of God's church and people, but through the door of the law; and to introduce them any other way, was not only to overthrow their law and peculiarity, but to deceive the Gentiles. Therefore they did all in their power to withstand the apostle: and to persuade the Gentiles every where that he was an odious impostor; that his Gospel was a forgery, destitute of divine authority; that he proposed admitting them into the church and covenant of God, in a way which had no foundation in the declared will of God. Their law was the only divine establishment, and obedience to it the only means to introduce them into the kingdom of God; and Paul could have no commission from heaven to teach otherwise, whatever he might pretend, or what miracles soever he might work. Of this sort of Jews the apostle speaks, 1 Thess. ii. 14, 15, 16.

Other Jews there were who believed the Gospel, and agreed that it ought to be preached to the Gentiles. But so that the Gentiles, at the same time they accepted the Gospel, were obliged to submit to the law of Moses in every part; otherwise they could not be saved, or have any interest in the kingdom and covenant of God, Acts xv. 1. These taught that the Gospel was insufficient without the law. They differed from the fore-mentioned Jews in that they embraced the faith of Jesus Christ. But agreed with them in this, that the law of Moses was to be in force for ever, and the observance of all its rituals absolutely necessary to a standing in the church of God, and the hopes of eternal life. And for this reason, they were upon pretty good terms with the unbelieving Jews, and avoided the persecution to which those who adhered to the pure and unmixed Gospel were exposed, Gal. vi. 12. These Jews, who were for joining law and Gospel together, were also great enemies to our apostle. He speaks of them, Phil. iii. 2, 3, &c.

6. Now against the mistakes of the infidel Jews, the apostle thus argues in the Epistle to the Romans: Jews, as well as Gentiles, have corrupted themselves, and are become obnoxious to the Divine wrath; and if they repent not, will certainly fall under the wrath of God in the last day. Consequently, as both are obnoxious to wrath, both must be indebted to grace and mercy for any favour shown them. The continuance of the Jews in the church, as well as the admittance of the Gentiles into it, is wholly of grace: mere grace or favour. Upon which footing, the Gentiles must have as good a right to the blessings of God's covenant as the Jews themselves. And why not? Is not God the Creator and Governor of the Gentiles, as well as of the Jews? And, if both Jews and Gentiles have corrupted themselves by wicked works, it is impossible that either should have a right to the privileges of God's church and people, on account of WORKS, or obedience to the law of God, whether natural or revealed. It must be pure mercy, accepted by faith, through Christ, as a persuasion of that mercy on their part which gives that right. All must be indebted to grace. The works of the law never gave the Jews themselves a right to the privileges and promises of the covenant. Even Abraham himself, (the head of the nation, who was first taken into God's covenant, and from whom the Jews derive all their peculiar blessings and advantages,) was not justified by works of the law. It was free grace, or favour, which at once admitted him and his posterity into the covenant and church of God. And that the grace of the Gospel actually extends to all mankind, appears from the universality of the resurrection; which is the effect of God's grace or favour in a Redeemer; and is the first and fundamental part of the new dispensation, with regard to the gift of eternal life. For, as all were involved in death, in consequence of Adam's sin; so shall all be restored to life at the last day, in consequence of Christ's obedience. And, therefore, it is certain that all men actually have a share in the mercy of God in Christ Jesus.— Thus the apostle argues.

7. And we ought particularly to observe; how he combats the engrossing temper of the Jews, in his arguments. They could not engross all virtue to themselves, for they were as bad as other people; they could not engross God and his favour to themselves, for he was the Governor and Creator of Gentiles as well as Jews; they could not engross Abraham, and the promise made to him, to themselves, for he is the father of many nations, and the believing Gentiles are his seed as well as the Jews; they could not engross the resurrection, the necessary introduction to eternal life to themselves, because it is known and allowed to be common to all mankind.

8. And he had good reason to be so large and particular in confuting the mistakes of the infidel Jews. For, had their principles prevailed, the Gospel could not have maintained its ground. For, if we must have performed the works of the law, before we could have been interested in the blessings of the covenant, then the Gospel would have lost its nature and force. For then it would not have been a motive to obedience, but the result of obedience; and we could have had no hope towards God, prior to obedience. Therefore, the apostle has done a singular and eminent piece of service to the church of God, in asserting and demonstrating the free grace and covenant of God, as a foundation to stand upon, prior to any obedience of ours, and as the grand spring and motive of obedience. This sets our interest in the covenant or promise of God upon a foundation very clear and solid.

9. To understand rightly the Epistle to the Romans, it is further necessary to observe; that the apostle considers mankind as obnoxious to the Divine wrath, and as standing before God, the Judge of all. Hence it is, that he uses forensic, or law terms, used in Jewish courts; such as the LAW, RIGHTEOUSNESS or JUSTIFICATION, being JUSTIFIED, JUDGMENT to CONDEMNATION, JUSTIFICATION of LIFE, being made SINNERS, and being made RIGHTEOUS. These I take to be forensic, or court terms; and the apostle, by using them, naturally leads our thoughts to suppose a court held, a judgment seat to be erected by the most High God, in the several cases whence he draws his arguments. For instance; chap. v. 12—20. he supposes Adam standing in the court of God, after he had committed the first transgression; when the judgment, passed upon him for his offence, came upon all men to condemnation; and when he and his posterity, by the favour and in the purpose of God, were again made righteous, or obtained the justification of life. Again, chap. iv. he supposes Abraham standing before the bar of the Supreme Judge; when as an idolater, he might have been condemned; but, through the pure mercy of God, he was justified; pardoned, and taken into God's covenant, on account of his faith. He also supposes, chap. iii. 19—29. all mankind standing before the universal Judge, when Christ came into the world. At that time neither Jew nor Gentile could pretend to justification, upon the foot of their own works of righteousness; having both corrupted themselves, and come short of the glory of God. But at that time, both had righteousness or salvation prepared for them in a Redeemer; namely, the righteousness which results from the pure mercy or grace of God; the Lawgiver and Judge. And so both, (instead of being destroyed,) had admittance into the church and covenant of God, by faith, in order to their eternal salvation.

10. But, besides these three instances, in which he supposes a court to be held by the Supreme Judge, there is a fourth to which he points, chap. ii. 1—17. and that is the final judgment, or the court which will be held in the day when God will judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ. And it is with regard to that future court of judicature, that he argues, chap. ii. 1—17. But in the other cases, whence he draws his arguments, he supposes the courts of judicature to be already held: and, consequently, argues in relation to the economy, constitution, or dispensation of things in this present world. This is very evident with regard to the court, which he supposes to be held when our Lord came into the world, or when the Gospel constitution was erected in its full glory. For, speaking of the justification which mankind then obtained through the grace of God in Christ, he expressly confines that justification to the present time, chap. iii. 26. To demonstrate, I say, his righteousness, Ev NTN xapp, at the PRESENT TIME. This plainly distinguishes the righteousness, or salvation, which God then exhibited, from that righteousness or justification, which he will vouchsafe in the day of judgment, to pious and faithful souls.

11. Before the coming of our Lord, the peculiar kingdom of God was confined to the Jewish nation, and to such only of the heathens as were incorporated among them by becoming Jews, and observing the whole law of Moses. And the Jews firmly believed it would always continue in the same state.

But when our Lord came, the mystery of God, which had been concealed both from Jews and Gentiles, was revealed; namely, that the Gentiles also, even men of all nations, should be freely admitted into it. This was an act of great favour, considering the darkness, idolatry, and wickedness, into which the heathen world was then sunk.

But God mercifully passed over their former sins; and our Lord commissioned his apostles, and particularly St. Paul, to promulge a general pardon; and to call, or invite, all who repented, and accepted of the grace, to all the blessings and privileges of his kingdom; confirming their interest in those blessings, by pouring out the Holy Ghost upon them, in various miraculous gifts, or endowments above the ordinary capacity of men. This was a very evident seal to them, (and to us too,) of a title to the blessings of God's kingdom and covenant, Gal. iii. 2—5.

And it had such an effect upon the Christian Jews at Jerusalem, that though they were at first greatly disgusted at Peter, for treating the first uncircumcised Gentile converts as members of the kingdom of God, (Acts xi. 2, 3,) yet, when they heard that the Holy Ghost was fallen upon those converts, they were much surprised, and glorified God, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted, (the benefit of,) repentance unto, (eternal,) life; which, before this, they verily believed, could not have been granted unto them without obedience to the law of Moses, by being circumcised.

But the unbelieving Jews paid no regard to this, or any other argument in favour of the uncircumcised Gentiles. The notion of admitting them into the kingdom and congregation of God, only upon faith in Christ, they opposed and persecuted every where, with great zeal and bitterness. And it was not long before good impressions wore off, and old prejudices revived, among even the believing Jews. Numbers of them very stiffly, and with much warmth and contention, endeavoured to persuade the Gentile converts, that, except they were circumcised after the manner of Moses, they could not be saved, or admitted to the privileges of the kingdom of God, and the hope of eternal life, Acts xv. 1, 2.

The Gentiles, even the most learned and wise amongst them, were wholly ignorant in the affair. They were perfect strangers to the Gospel scheme: they had no notion or expectation of being received into the kingdom and covenant of God; and could have no knowledge of it but what they received from some or other of the Jews: nor could they have any objection against it, worth regarding, but what came from that quarter. And the Jews had a considerable influence among them, having synagogues in most, if not all, the great towns in the empire, from the Euphrates, as far as Rome itself: which numbers of the Gentiles frequented, and so had received impressions in favour of the Jewish religion.

But had the Jewish notion prevailed, that no part of mankind could have any share in the blessings of God's covenant, the pardon of sin, and the hope of eternal life, but only such as were circumcised, and brought themselves under obligations to the whole law of Moses; had this notion prevailed, the extensive scheme of the Gospel would have been ruined, and the gracious design of freeing the church from the embarrassments of the law of Moses, would have been defeated. The Gospel, or glad tidings of salvation, must not only have been confined to the narrow limits of the Jewish peculiarity, and clogged with all the ceremonial observances belonging to it, which, to the greatest part of mankind, would have been either impracticable, or excessively inconvenient; but, which is still worse, must have sunk and fallen with that peculiarity. Had the Gospel been built upon the foundation of the Jewish polity, it must have been destroyed, when that was demolished; and the whole kingdom of God in the world, would have been overthrown and extinct at the same time; and so all the noble principles it was intended to inspire, to animate, and comfort our hearts, would have been lost; and all the light it was calculated to diffuse, throughout the world, would have been quite extinguished.

It was, therefore, the apostle's duty to vindicate and assert the truth of the Gospel, which he was commissioned to preach to the Gentiles; and of very great consequence to prove, that we Gentiles are the children of God, interested in his covenant; and all the honours, blessings, and privileges of his family and kingdom here upon earth; only by faith in Christ, without coming under any obligations to the law of Moses as such. Which is the main drift and subject of this epistle.

12. It is worth notice, that there is this difference, in one respect, between the Gospels and Epistles; namely, That our Lord, in the Gospels, represents the doctrines and principles of the Christian religion, chiefly in an absolute sense; or as they are in themselves. But in the Epistles, those doctrines and principles are chiefly considered in a relative view; as they respect, partly, the foregoing Jewish dispensation, and partly, the future corruption of the Christian church: but principally as they respect the different state of Jews and Heathens; showing how just, true, and necessary, they are with reference to both, and directing and exhorting both to value them, and to make a right use of them. This was absolutely necessary to a full explication of the Gospel, to guard it against all objections, and to give it a solid establishment in the world.

And we must not forget that in the Epistle to the Romans the Gospel is presented in this relative view, as adapted to the circumstances of us Gentiles, and obliging us to all virtue and piety.

13. Further, we can neither duly value this epistle, nor be sensible how much we are indebted to the author of it, unless we make this sentiment familiar to our thoughts: namely, That St. Paul is the patron and defender of all that is by far the most valuable and important to us in the world, against the only opposition that could be made to our title and claim. Give me leave to explain this by an easy comparison.—A person, to me unknown, leaves me at his death 1000*l.* a year; I myself can have no objection against the noble donation; and the good pleasure of the donor, who had an undoubted right to dispose of his own, may silence any of the cavillers' surmises. But a person claiming, as heir at law, gives me the greatest uneasiness. He alleges, the estate was entailed, and that he has a prior title, which renders the donation to me invalid. Here I want an able advocate, to prove that his pretensions are ill grounded, and that my title is perfectly good and firm. St. Paul is that advocate: he argues and strongly proves, that we, believing Gentiles, have a just and solid title to all the blessings of God's covenant; and effectually establishes us in possession of all the noble principles, motives, comfort, hope, and joy of the Gospel. The sum of what he demonstrates, is comprehended in 1 Pet. ii. 8, 9, 10. They, the Jews, stumble, and lose their ancient honours and privileges; but ye Gentiles, are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should show forth the praises of him who has called you out of heathenish darkness, into his marvellous light. Thus, on the authority of God, we Gentiles have an indisputable right to all the blessings of the Gospel; and if we receive by Christ Jesus, that grace which pardons and cleanses the soul, we shall pass from the church militant into the church triumphant.

At the conclusion of my notes on this very important epistle, I feel it necessary to make a few additional remarks. I have sincerely and conscientiously given that view of the apostle's work which I believe to be true and correct. I am well aware that many great and good men have understood this portion of Divine revelation differently, in many respects, from myself; they have the same right of private judgment which I claim; and to publish those opinions which they judge to accord best with their views of the Gospel. My business is to give what I think to be the mind of my author; and every where I have laboured to do this without even consulting any pre-established creed. I hope my readers will take in good part what is honestly intended. I wish to avoid controversy: I give my own views of Divine truth. The plan on which I have endeavoured to expound this epistle shows it a beautiful, highly important, and consistent whole: a work which casts the clearest light on the grand original designs of God, relative to the diffusion of the Gospel, and its blessings over the face of the earth: illustrating many apparently dark and unaccountable providences; fully proving that, though clouds and darkness are often round the Supreme Being, yet righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne. Where this grand view of this epistle is not taken, the major part of its beauties are lost. God, who is not the God of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles, shows by his apostle in this admirable epistle, that from the beginning he had purposed to call the whole Gentile world to that salvation which he appeared for a time to restrain to the Jews alone: and which they imagined should be exclusively theirs for ever. This prejudice the apostle overturns: and shows that the Gentiles also had an equal share in the election of grace.—We should be careful how we make that partial and exclusive which shows the Fountain of goodness to be no respector of persons, or even, ultimately, of nations; who, like the sun, the faint, though brightest image of his glory in this lower world, shines equally upon the just and the unjust. God, with the same benevolent design, orders his Gospel to be preached to every creature under heaven.

The peculiar phraseology of this epistle I have also endeavoured to explain; and where this could not be conveniently done in the notes, I have generally stated it at the end of the chapters. And for the explanations of difficult points, or articles which may have been but slightly handled in the notes, I beg to refer to those concluding observations; and particularly to those at the end of chapters viii. and ix. — But it is necessary to make some remarks on this epistle, as an epistle directed to the Romans; that is, to the church of God founded at Rome. Though the Gospel was preached and established there long before either the apostle had visited this city, or written this epistle; yet we may rest assured that the doctrine contained here was the doctrine of the church of Rome, and therefore that church was holy and apostolic. If it do not continue to walk by the same rule, and mind the same thing, it is no longer so; in a time then, when the Roman church that now is, invites the attention of the Christian world by making great and bold pretensions; assuming to itself the titles of holy, catholic, and apostolic; representing Rome as the fountain whence pure truth and apostolical authority emanate; it may be useful to examine whether such pretensions are well founded; and not permit confident assumption, noise, and parade, to carry away our understandings; and occupy the place of reason, argument, and truth. This, however, cannot be done to any extent in this place; only it may be necessary to state, that as the doctrines, &c. of the Roman church, profess to be apostolic, they must be found in the Epistle to the ROMANS, this being the only apostolic work directed to that church. If they are not to be met with here, it would be absurd to look for them any where else. But there is not one distinguishing doctrine, or practice of the Romish church, found in this epistle. Here is no pope, no exclusive churchship, no Perseperce, first-fruits, legatine levies, dispensations, pardons, indulgences, reliques, Agnus Dei's, jubilees, pilgrimages, crusades, carnivals, canonizations, abbeys, monasteries, cells, shrines, privileged altars, auricular confessions, purgatories, masses, prayers for the dead, requiems, placebos, dirges, lamps, processions, holy water, chrisms, baptism of bells, justification by works, penances, transubstantiation, works of supererogation, extreme unction, invocation of saints and angels, worship of images, crossings of the body, rosaries, albs, stoles, &c. nor the endless orders of priests, abbots, monks, friars, nuns, anchorets, hermits, capuchins, &c. &c. Here are no inquisitions, no writs de heretico comburendo, no auto da fés, no racks, gibbets, tortures, nor death in all variable and horrid forms, for those who may differ from this mother church, in any part of their religious creed. In vain will the reader look into this epistle for any thing that is not consistent with sound sense, inflexible reason, and the justice, purity, and endless benevolence of the Great God, the equal Father of the spirits of all flesh. Here, indeed, he will see the total fall and degeneracy of all mankind, strongly asserted and proved; the utter helplessness of the human race, to rescue itself from this state of corruption; the endless mercy of God, in sending Christ Jesus into the world to die for sinners; the doctrine of justification by faith in the blood of the Lamb; regeneration by the energy of the Divine Spirit, producing that holiness, without which no man can see God. Here, the sacrificial death of Jesus Christ takes place of all Jewish sacrifices, and works or sufferings of man, in reference to justification. Here is nothing puerile, nugatory, or superstitious; no dogma degrading to the understanding; no religious act unworthy of the spirit and dignity of the Gospel; nothing that has not the most immediate tendency to enlighten the mind, and mend the heart of man: in a word, every thing is suitable to the state of man, and worthy of the majesty, justice, and benevolence of that God, from whom this epistle came. Here, indeed, is the model of a pure church. What a pity it is not more closely followed by all, whether Protestant or Popish, that profess the faith of Christ crucified! Alas! that a church which was once pure and apostolic, and still retains all the essential doctrines of the Gospel, should compound them with others, which are not only the commandments and invention of men, but which so counteract the influence of the truths still retained, as to destroy their efficacy; and no wonder, when this foreign admixture is an assemblage of rites and ceremonies, borrowed partly from the Jews, and partly from the ancient heathens; rendered palatable by a small proportion of Christianity.

The reader will observe, that in the attempt to illustrate this difficult and most important epistle, I have levied contributions in all quarters.—Jews, Christians, Heathens, Fathers, schoolmen, orthodox and heterodox, have all contributed their quota. I sought the light of truth, and was regardless whose hand held the lamp.

Tros tyriusque mihi nullo discrimine agetur.
Æn. l. ver. 574

To divines and critics, both on the continent, and in our own country, I am under great obligation; and this obligation I have felt gratified in acknowledging, whenever an opportunity presented itself:—but to no man am I under so much obligation as to the late Dr. John Taylor of Norwich. No man, previous to his time, ever studied this epistle so closely, or understood it so well. He alone was the first who set all its parts in a consistent, edifying, and glorious light, as far as its grand nature and design are concerned. On his plan alone, this epistle can be interpreted; those who have had the rashness to say, (because his religious creed and theirs happened to differ,) “Dr. T. knew nothing of this epistle; and his key far from opening, has locked it;” are worthy of no regard; they are either too weak, or too prejudiced, to be able to discern truth, unless it come to them through the medium of their own preconceptions. Such persons would refuse the water of life, if not brought to them in their own pitcher. I have now only to add, that a re-impression of this epistle being now called for, the first being entirely sold off, I have carefully revised the whole, and have found little to alter; and not one sentence either in the introductory matter, or in the notes themselves, that I can either in conscience or honour expunge.

Millbrook, January 23. 1818. A. C.

A SHORT EXPLANATION

OF THE FOLLOWING

ANCIENT ROMAN CALENDAR.

FESTIVALS, &c. OF THE PRESENT ROMISH CHURCH.

INSTEAD of Chronological Tables, which the subject of this epistle neither admits nor requires, for it was probably all written in the course of a few days; (and I have entered the supposed year at the top of every page,) I here insert the ancient Roman Calendar, regularly distinguished into all its Calends, Nones, and Ides, with the different festivals observed in honour of their gods, goddesses, &c. in each month, and their principal astronomical notes. The modern Roman Calendar I have also introduced, with as many of the festivals, saints' days, &c. as the margin would receive. The reader will, no doubt, be struck with the conformity that subsists between ancient and modern Rome on this subject; on which, in this place, I shall make no further remarks.

This Calendar, which was made by Julius Cæsar, in the year of Rome 708, and before Christ 45, is still exceedingly useful, especially for understanding the writers of antiquity, particularly those of the Latin church; as well as for ascertaining the precise dates of bulls, diplomas, and public acts in general.

The Roman month, the reader will observe, is divided into Calends, Nones, and Ides; all of which are reckoned backward. The Calends are the first day of the month; as Calendis Januarii, is the first day of January; Pridie Calendarum, or Calendas, is the 31st of December; iii. Cal. the 30th; iv. Cal. the 29th; v. Cal. the 28th, &c.

The Nones, which are four, follow the Calends; as iv. Nonas Januarii, is Jan. 2. iii. Nonas Januarii, is Jan. 3. Pridie Nonas Jan. is Jan. 4. and Nonas Januarii, is Jan. 5. But in March, May, July, and October, there are six Nones.

After these, the Ides in each month are eight; as viii. Id. Jan. (Octavo Idus, or Iduum Januarii), is January the 6th; vii. Id. Jan. (Septimo Idus, or Iduum Januarii), is January the 7th; vi. Id. Jan. (sexto Idus, or Iduum Januarii), is January the 8th; and so on, till you come to the Ides themselves, Idibus Januarii, being January the 13th.

Observe—1. When the accusative case is used, as Nonas, Idus, Calendas, the preposition ante, before, which governs this case, is understood; as tertio ante Calendas, the third day before the Calends; quarto ante Calendas, the fourth day before the Calends, &c. Observe—2. That after the Ides which are on the 13th day of January, February, April, June, August, September, November, and December; and on the 15th of March, May, July, and October, which have six Nones a-piece, the Calends following are to be reckoned to the next month.

The first column in each month, contains the regular days of that month; the next column, the Calends, Nones, and Ides; and the slightest inspection will show how the days of these denominations answer to the common days of the month in their regular order.

The Nundinal Letters I have not inserted, as they only refer to the custom of administering law, or trying causes, holding public assemblies, electing magistrates, &c. among the ancient Romans. I have thought it best to fill up that place with other matters belonging to this calendar, in which general readers might find more interest.

The last column, the reader will perceive, is the modern Roman Calendar, copiously filled with the days of real and reputed saints; these, however, are not the whole whose festivals are observed, and whose protection is implored in that church; as, upon an average, there are not fewer than five of these real or imaginary beings to every day of the year!

The Saints' days and Festivals of the Romish church are taken from Mr. Alban Butler's Lives of the Saints, (one of the best publications of this kind,) conferred with the Connaissance des Temps, edited by La Lande.

The ancient Roman Calendar has been taken chiefly from Ainworth; the two copies, one English, the other Latin, in his second volume, being collated together, and mutually corrected.

OBSERVATIONS

On the Progressive Improvement of the Roman Calendar; from the Days of Romulus, about 750 Years before Christ, to the present Time.

The ROMAN CALENDAR, before the time of Julius Cæsar, was very defective: in the reign of Romulus, the first king of Rome, the science of astronomy was so little understood in Italy, that the calendar was made to consist of ten months, and the year of only 304 days. The names of the ten months were in order as follows:—March, April, May, June, Quintilis, Sextilis, September, October, November, December. Besides the 304 days, Romulus is said to have intercalated days without name, to make up the number of 360: but whether this was the case, or in what way these days were intercalated, cannot be determined; as history, with reference to this point, is extremely obscure. The months of March, May, Quintilis, and October, contained 31 days each; and the other six, only 30 days each; as may be seen in the following Table, which exhibits the state of the Roman Calendar about 750 years previously to the Incarnation:

March	April	May	June	Quintilis	Sextilis	September	October	November	December

In the reign of Numa Pompilius, the second king of the Romans, the Calendar was very much improved. This monarch, by means of the instructions he received from Pythagoras, the prince of the Italian philosophers, adopted very nearly the same kind of year which the Greeks then used; with this principal exception, that he assigned to every one of his years 355 days, which is one day more than the Grecian and Rabbinical years usually contained. The reformation of the Calendar of Romulus, consisted in taking away one day from April, June, Sextilis, September, November, and December, (the day after the Ides of these months, being named the 16th before the Calends of the ensuing one,) and then adding these six days to the 51 which the year of Romulus wanted, to make up his own of 355 days: with these 57 days he made two new months, viz. January and February, the former of which was the first, and the other the last month of his year; assigning to the former 29 and to the latter 28 days. In order to make his year equal to that which the Greeks used in their Olympiads, Numa is said to have intercalated 82 days in every eight years, in the following manner:—At the end of the first two years, an intercalation of 22 days; at the end of the next two, an intercalation of 23 days; at the end of the third two, an intercalation of 22 days; and at the end of the last two, an intercalation of the remaining 15 days.

The Calendar of Numa Pompilius, (with the slight variation in it at the time of the Decemviri, about 452, B. C. which consisted in constituting February the second instead of the last month,) continued in use among the Romans till the time of Julius Cæsar, who, perceiving the great inconveniences that resulted from not making the civil year equal in length to the solar revolution through the 12 signs of the zodiac, employed Sosigenes of Alexandria, (esteemed the greatest astronomer of his time,) to reform the Calendar in such a way that the seasons of the year might perpetually correspond to the same months. As, according to the calculations of Sosigenes, the solar ecliptical revolution took up about 365 days six hours, it was found necessary to lengthen the civil year at least ten days, making it to consist of 365 days, instead of 355; and to make a proper compensation for the six hours which the solar year exceeds 365 days, every fourth year was proposed to be an intercalary one, containing 366 days. Julius Cæsar, by public edict, accordingly ordered these corrections to be made; and the Calendar, thus corrected, is the same as that already given in the preceding Table, with the Festivals, &c. of the ancient Romans. In consequence of the ignorance of the priests, a considerable error was committed in the first 50 years after the Julian reformation of the Calendar; for the priests imagined that the fourth year in which the intercalation should be made was to be computed from that in which the preceding intercalation took place, by which means they left only two common years instead of three between the two intercalary ones. Consequently, twelve days, instead of nine, were intercalated in 50 years, an error too considerable to escape the notice of the Augustan age: and, accordingly, the emperor directed that no intercalation should be made for the first twelve years, that the three superfluous days might be gradually dropped; and that the intercalations should be afterward regulated in such a manner that three common years should continually intervene. This last alteration of the Calendar continued without any interruption till the pontificate of Gregory XIII. in the latter part of the 16th century, when he gave orders that the Roman Calendar should be again reformed.

The necessity of this reformation originated in Sosigenes assigning precisely 365 days six hours, for the sun's passage through the twelve signs of the zodiac; instead of 365 days, five hours, and 48 minutes, and 48 seconds, as ascertained by the more perfect observations of modern astronomers. The error of Sosigenes, of about eleven minutes in the length of the solar year, amounts to a whole day in 134 years, insomuch that from the council of Nice, in A. D. 325, to the time of Gregory XIII., ten days too many had crept into the calendar, the vernal equinox which, in 325, was fixed on the 21st of March, happening in 1582, on the 11th, though the Calendar constantly placed it on the 21st.

To remedy this defect, Pope Gregory ordered that ten days should be suppressed in the almanac of 1582, the 5th of October being denominated the 15th, and in these days fewer festivals occurred than in any other ten consecutive days in the year; and to prevent the recurrence of this error for the future, it was directed by a public bull, that every three centurial years out of four, after A. D. 1600, (which in the Julian Calendar are leap-years,) should be only common years of 365 days each. Thus 1700, 1800, and 1900, are styled common years, 2000 a bissextile, 2100, 2200, and 2300, common years, 2400 a bissextile, &c. &c.

By this last correction of the Calendar, the Gregorian year is so nearly commensurate with the revolution of the earth round the sun, that an error of a day cannot be made in less than 3,600 years. If the intercalations be made according to the calculations of the late M. de la Laude, and other eminent astronomers of the last and present centuries, an error of a day need not be committed in less than a million of years!

The Papal bull, by which this alteration is made, is thus intitled:—“Constitutio Gregorij Papæ XIII. pro approbatione et introductione novi Kalendarij ad usum universæ Ecclesiæ Romanæ; quâ, inter plura cætera præcipit, et mandat, ut de mense Octobris hujus anni 1582, decem dies inclusivè a 11 Nonarum usque ad Pridiæ Idus eximantur, et dies qui festum S. Francisci 14 Nonas celebrari solitum sequitur, dicatur Idus Octobris. Datum Tusculi, Anno Incarnationis Dom. 1582, sexto Kal. Martii, Pontif. sui anno X.”

“The Constitution of Pope Gregory XIII. for the approval and introduction of a New Calendar for the use of the Romish Church universally; in which, among many other things, he decrees and commands, that ten days be struck off from the month of October of this present year 1582: namely, from the third of the Nones, (Oct. 5.) to the day before the Ides, (Oct. 14.) both inclusive; and that the day which follows the festival of St. Francis, usually celebrated as the fourth of the Nones, should be called the Ides of October. Given at Tusculum, in the year of the incarnation of our Lord 1582, on the sixth of the Calends of March, (Feb. 24.) and in the tenth year of his Pontificate.” See Suppl. au Corps Diplomatique, Tome II. Part I. pp. 187, 188.

This alteration of the Calendar was not adopted by the British till 1752, in which year, the day after the second of September was called Sept. 14. All the nations of Europe have adopted this mode of reckoning except the Russians, who follow the Julian account, introduced among them by Peter the Great, instead of the Constantinopolitan æra, by which their chronology had been previously regulated.

The Commentator should make an apology to his readers for the introduction of the preceding Tables and Calculations, as having apparently but little relation to the subject of the Epistle to the Romans; but the very obvious utility of what is here inserted, will more than plead his excuse.

INTRODUCTION

NO. 1234

FIRST EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

IN my Preface to the Epistle to the Romans I have made several extracts from Dr. Paley's Horæ Paulinæ, in which, from internal evidence, he demonstrates the authenticity of that epistle. His observations on the first Epistle to the Corinthians, are distinguished by the same profound learning and depth of thought: and as, in an age in which scepticism has had an unbridled range, it may be of great consequence to a sincere inquirer after truth, to have all his doubts removed relative to the authenticity of the epistle in question: and as Dr. Paley's observations cast considerable light on several passages in the work; I take the liberty to introduce them, as something should be said on the subject; and I do not pretend to have any thing equal to what is here prepared to my hands. I have scarcely made any other change than to introduce the word section for number.

SECTION I.

† Before we proceed to compare this epistle with the history, says Dr. Paley, or with any other epistle; we will employ one section in stating certain remarks applicable to our argument, which arise from a perusal of the epistle itself.

By an expression in the first verse of the seventh chapter, "Now concerning the things whereof ye wrote unto me," it appears that this letter to the Corinthians was written by St. Paul in answer to one which he had received from them; and that the seventh, and some of the following chapters, are taken up in resolving certain doubts, and regulating certain points of order, concerning which the Corinthians had in their letter consulted him. This alone is a circumstance considerably in favour of the authenticity of the epistle: for it must have been a far-fetched contrivance in a forger, first to have feigned the receipt of a letter from the church of Corinth, which letter does not appear; and then to have drawn up a fictitious answer to it, relative to a great variety of doubts and inquiries, purely economical and domestic; and which, though likely enough to have occurred to an infant society, in a situation and under an institution so novel as that of a Christian Church then was, it must have very much exercised the author's invention, and could have answered no imaginable purpose of forgery, to introduce the mention of it at all. Particulars of the kind we refer to, are such as the following; the rule of duty and prudence relative to entering into marriage, as applicable to virgins, and to widows; the case of husbands married to unconverted wives, of wives having unconverted husbands; that case where the unconverted party chooses to separate, or where he chooses to continue the union; the effect of which their conversion produced upon their prior state, of circumcision, of slavery; the eating of things offered to idols, as it was in itself, or as others were affected by it; the joining in idolatrous sacrifices; the decorum to be observed in their religious assemblies, the order of speaking, the silence of women, the covering or uncovering of the head, as it became men, as it became women. These subjects, with their several subdivisions, are so particular, minute, and numerous, that, though they be exactly agreeable to the circumstances of the persons to whom the letter was written, nothing, I believe, but the existence and reality of those circumstances, could have suggested to the writer's thoughts.

But this is not the only, nor the principal observation upon the correspondence between the church of Corinth, and their apostle, which I wish to point out. It appears, I think, in this correspondence, that although the Corinthians had written to St. Paul, requesting his answer and his directions in the several points above enumerated; yet that they had not said one syllable about the enormities and disorders which had crept in amongst them, and in the blame of which they all shared; but that St. Paul's information concerning the irregularities then prevailing at Corinth had come round to him from other quarters. The quarrels and disputes excited by their contentious adherence to their different teachers, and by their placing of them in competition with one another, were not mentioned in their letter, but communicated to St. Paul by more private intelligence: "It hath been declared unto me, my brethren, by them which are of the house of Chloe, that there are contentions among you. Now this I say, that every one of you saith, I am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and I of Cephas, and I of Christ." (i. 11, 12.) The incestuous marriage

INTRODUCTION TO THE FIRST

"of a man with his father's wife," which St. Paul reprehends with so much severity in the fifth chapter of this epistle; and which was not the crime of an individual only, but a crime in which the whole church, by tolerating and conniving at it, had rendered themselves partakers, did not come to St. Paul's knowledge by the letter, but by a rumour which had reached his ears: "It is reported commonly that there is fornication among you, and such fornication as is not so much as named among the Gentiles: that one should have his father's wife; and ye are puffed up, and have not rather mourned that he that hath done this deed might be taken away from among you." (v. 1, 2.) Their going to law before the judicature of the country, rather than arbitrate and adjust their disputes among themselves, which St. Paul animadverts upon with his usual plainness, was not intimated to him in the letter, because he tells them his opinion of this conduct before he comes to the contents of the letter. Their litigiousness is censured by St. Paul, in the sixth chapter of his epistle; and it is only at the beginning of the seventh chapter that he proceeds upon the articles which he found in their letter; and he proceeds upon them with this preface: "Now concerning the things whereof ye wrote unto me," (vii. 1.) which introduction he would not have used if he had been already discussing any of the subjects concerning which they had written. Their irregularities in celebrating the Lord's Supper, and the utter perversion of the institution which ensued, were not in the letter, as is evident from the terms in which St. Paul mentions the notice he had received of it: "Now in this that I declare unto you, I praise you not, that ye come together not for the better, but for the worse; for, first of all, when ye come together in the church, I hear that there be divisions among you, and I partly believe it." Now that the Corinthians should, in their own letter, exhibit the fair side of their conduct to the apostle, and conceal from him the faults of their behaviour, was extremely natural, and extremely probable: but it was a distinction which would not, I think, have easily occurred to the author of a forgery; and much less likely is it, that it should have entered into his thoughts to make the distinction appear in the way in which it does appear, viz. not by the original letter, not by any express observation upon it in the answer; but distantly by marks perceivable in the manner, or in the order, in which St. Paul takes notice of their faults.

SECTION II.

† This epistle purports to have been written after St. Paul had already been at Corinth: "I brethren, when I came unto you, came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom," (ii. 1.) and in many other places to the same effect. It purports also to have been written upon the eve of another visit to that church: "I will come to you shortly, if the Lord will," (iv. 19.) and again, "I will come to you when I shall pass through Macedonia," (xvi. 5.) Now the history relates that St. Paul did in fact visit Corinth twice: once as recorded at length in the eighteenth, and a second time as mentioned briefly in the twentieth chapter of the Acts. The same history also informs us, Acts xx. 4. that it was from Ephesus St. Paul proceeded upon his second journey into Greece. Therefore, as the epistle purports to have been written a short time preceding that journey; and as St. Paul, the history tells us, had resided more than two years at Ephesus, before he set out upon it, it follows that it must have been from Ephesus, to be consistent with the history, that the epistle was written; and every note of place in the epistle agrees with this supposition. "If, after the manner of men, I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not!" (xv. 32.) I allow that the apostle might say this, wherever he was; but it was more natural, and more to the purpose to say it, if he was at Ephesus at the time, and in the midst of those conflicts to which the expression relates. "The churches of Asia salute you," (xvi. 19.) Asia, throughout the Acts of the Apostles, and the epistles of St. Paul, does not mean the whole of Asia Minor or Anatolia, nor even the whole of the proconsular Asia, but a district in the interior part of that country, called Lydian Asia, divided from the rest, much as Portugal is from Spain, and of which district Ephesus was the capital. "Aquila and Priscilla salute you," (xvi. 19.) Aquila and Priscilla were at Ephesus during the period within which this epistle was written. (Acts xviii. 18—26.) "I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost," (xvi. 8.) This, I apprehend, is in terms almost asserting that he was at Ephesus at the time of writing the epistle—"A great and effectual door is opened unto me," (xvi. 9.) How well this declaration corresponded with the state of things at Ephesus, and the progress of the Gospel in these parts, we learn from the reflection with which the historian concludes the account of certain transactions which passed there: "So mightily grew the word of God and prevailed," (Acts xix. 20.) as well as from the complaint of Demetrius, "that not only at Ephesus, but also throughout all Asia, this Paul hath persuaded, and turned away much people," (xix. 26.) "And there are many adversaries," says the epistle, (xvi. 9.) Look into the history of this period: "When divers were hardened and believed not, but spake evil of that way before the multitude, he departed from them, and separated the disciples." The conformity, therefore, upon this head of comparison, is circumstantial and perfect. If any one think that this is a conformity so obvious, that any forger of tolerable caution and sagacity would have taken care to preserve it; I must desire such a one to read the epistle for himself; and, when he has done so, to declare whether he has discovered one mark of art or design; whether the notes of time and place appear to him to be inserted with any reference to each other, with any view of their being compared with each other, or for the purpose of establishing a visible agreement with the history, in respect of them.

SECTION III.

† Chap. iv. 17—19. "For this cause I have sent unto you Timotheus, who is my beloved son, and faithful in the Lord, who shall bring you into remembrance of my ways which be in Christ, as I teach every where in every church. Now some are puffed up, as though I would not come unto you; but I will come unto you shortly, if the Lord will."

EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

With this I compare Acts xix. 21, 22. "After these things were ended, Paul purposed in the spirit, when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem; saying, After I have been there, I must also see Rome; so he sent unto Macedonia two of them that ministered unto him, Timotheus and Erastus."

Though it be not said, it appears I think with sufficient certainty, I mean from the history, independently of the epistle, that Timothy was sent upon this occasion into Achaia, of which Corinth was the capital city, as well as into Macedonia: for the sending of Timothy and Erastus is, in the passage where it is mentioned, plainly connected with St. Paul's own journey: he sent them before him. As he therefore purposed to go into Achaia himself, it is highly probable that they were to go thither also. Nevertheless, they are said only to have been sent into Macedonia, because Macedonia was in truth the country to which they went immediately from Ephesus; being directed, as we suppose, to proceed afterward from thence into Achaia. If this be so, the narrative agrees with the epistle; and the agreement is attended with very little appearance of design. One thing at least concerning it is certain: that if this passage of St. Paul's history had been taken from his letter, it would have sent Timothy to Corinth by name, or expressly however into Achaia.

But there is another circumstance in these two passages much less obvious, in which an agreement holds without any room for suspicion that it was produced by design. We have observed, that the sending of Timothy into the peninsula of Greece, was connected in the narrative with St. Paul's own journey thither; it is stated as the effect of the same resolution. Paul purposed to go into Macedonia; "so he sent two of them that ministered unto him, Timotheus and Erastus." Now, in the epistle also you remark that, when the apostle mentions his having sent Timothy unto them, in the very next sentence he speaks of his own visit: "for this cause have I sent unto you Timotheus, who is my beloved son, &c. Now some are puffed up, as though I would not come to you; but I will come to you shortly, if God will." Timothy's journey, we see, is mentioned in the history and in the epistle, in close connexion with St. Paul's own. Here is the same order of thought and intention: yet conveyed under such diversity of circumstances and expressions, and the mention of them in the epistle so allied to the occasion which introduces it, viz. the insinuation of his adversaries that he would come to Corinth no more, that I am persuaded no attentive reader will believe, that these passages were written in concert with one another, or will doubt that the agreement is unsought and uncontrived.

But, in the Acts, Erastus accompanied Timothy in this journey, of whom no mention is made in the epistle. From what has been said in our observations upon the Epistle to the Romans, it appears probable that Erastus was a Corinthian. If so, though he accompanied Timothy to Corinth, he was only returning home, and Timothy was the messenger charged with St. Paul's orders.—At any rate, this discrepancy shows that the passages were not taken from one another.

SECTION IV.

† Chap. xvi. 10, 11.—"Now, if Timotheus come, see that he may be with you without fear; for he worketh the work of the Lord, as I also do: let no man therefore despise him, but conduct him forth in peace, that he may come unto me, for I look for him with the brethren."

From the passage considered in the preceding section, it appears that Timothy was sent to Corinth, either with the epistle, or before: "for this cause have I sent unto you Timotheus." From the passage now quoted, we infer that Timothy was not sent with the epistle: for had he been the bearer of the letter, or accompanied it, would St. Paul in that letter have said, "If Timothy come?" Nor is the sequel consistent with the supposition of his carrying the letter: for if Timothy was with the apostle when he wrote the letter, could he say, as he does, "I look for him with the brethren?" I conclude, therefore, that Timothy had left St. Paul to proceed upon his journey before the letter was written. Further, the passage before us seems to imply, that Timothy was not expected by St. Paul to arrive at Corinth till after they had received the letter. He gives them directions in the letter how to treat him when he should arrive: "if he come," act towards him so and so. Lastly, the whole form of expression is most naturally applicable to the supposition of Timothy's coming to Corinth, not directly from St. Paul, but from some other quarter; and that his instructions had been, when he should reach Corinth, to return. Now, how stands this matter in the history? Turn to the nineteenth chapter and twenty-first verse of the Acts, and you will find that Timothy did not, when sent from Ephesus, where he left St. Paul, and where the present epistle was written, proceed by a straight course to Corinth, but that he went round through Macedonia. This clears up every thing; for, although Timothy was sent forth upon his journey before the letter was written, yet he might not reach Corinth till after the letter arrived there; and he would come to Corinth, when he did come, not directly from St. Paul at Ephesus, but from some part of Macedonia. Here, therefore, is a circumstantial and critical agreement, and unquestionably without design; for neither of the two passages in the epistle mentions Timothy's journey into Macedonia at all, though nothing but a circuit of that kind can explain and reconcile the expressions which the writer uses.

SECTION V.

† Chap. i. 12. "Now this I say, that every one of you saith, I am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and I of Cephas, and I of Christ."

Also, iii. 6. "I have planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the increase."

INTRODUCTION TO THE FIRST

This expression, "I have planted, Apollos watered," imports two things; first, that Paul had been at Corinth before Apollos; secondly, that Apollos had been at Corinth after Paul, but before the writing of this epistle. This implied account of the several events, and of the order in which they took place, corresponds exactly with the history. St. Paul, after his first visit into Greece, returned from Corinth into Syria, by the way of Ephesus; and, dropping his companions Aquila and Priscilla at Ephesus, he proceeded forward to Jerusalem; from Jerusalem he descended to Antioch; and from thence made a progress through some of the upper or northern provinces of the Lesser Asia, Acts xviii. 19—23, during which progress, and consequently in the interval between St. Paul's first and second visit to Corinth, and consequently also before the writing of this epistle, which was at Ephesus two years at least after the apostle's return from his progress, we hear of Apollos, and we hear of him at Corinth. Whilst St. Paul was engaged, as had been said, in Phrygia and Galatia, Apollos came down to Ephesus, and being, in St. Paul's absence, instructed by Aquila and Priscilla, and having obtained letters of recommendation from the church at Ephesus, he passed over to Achaia; and when he was there, we read that he "helped them much which had believed through grace, for he mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly." Acts xviii. 27, 28. To have brought Apollos into Achaia, of which Corinth was the capital city, as well as the principal Christian church; and to have shown that he preached the Gospel in that country, would have been sufficient for our purpose. But the history happens also to mention Corinth by name, as the place in which Apollos, after his arrival in Achaia, fixed his residence; for, proceeding with the account of St. Paul's travels, it tells us, that while Apollos was at Corinth, Paul, having passed through the upper coasts, came down to Ephesus, xix. 1. What is said, therefore, of Apollos in the epistle, coincides exactly and especially in the point of chronology, with what is delivered concerning him in the history. The only question now is, whether the allusions were made with a regard to this coincidence. Now, the occasions and purposes for which the name of Apollos is introduced in the Acts and in the epistles, are so independent and so remote, that it is impossible to discover the smallest reference from one to the other. Apollos is mentioned in the Acts, in immediate connexion with the history of Aquila and Priscilla, and for the very singular circumstance of his "knowing only the baptism of John." In the epistle, where none of these circumstances are taken notice of, his name first occurs, for the purpose of reproving the contentious spirit of the Corinthians; and it occurs only in conjunction with that of some others: "Every one of you saith, I am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and I of Cephas, and I of Christ." The second passage in which Apollos appears, "I have planted, Apollos watered," fixes, as we have observed, the order of time amongst three distinct events: but it fixes this, I will venture to pronounce, without the writer perceiving that he was doing any such thing. This sentence fixes this order in exact conformity with the history; but it is itself introduced solely for the sake of the reflection which follows:—"Neither is he that planteth, any thing, neither he that watereth, but God that giveth the increase."

SECTION VI.

† Chap. iv. 11, 12. "Even unto this present hour we both hunger and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling-place; and labour, working with our hands."

We are expressly told, in the history, that at Corinth St. Paul laboured with his own hands: "He found Aquila and Priscilla; and, because he was of the same craft, he abode with them, and wrought; for by their occupation they were tent-makers." But, in the text before us, he is made to say, that "he laboured even unto this present hour," that is, to the time of writing the epistle at Ephesus. Now, in the narration of St. Paul's transactions at Ephesus, delivered in the nineteenth chapter of the Acts, nothing is said of his working with his own hands; but in the twentieth chapter we read, that upon his return from Greece, he sent for the elders of the church of Ephesus, to meet him at Miletus; and in the discourse which he there addressed to them, amidst some other reflections which he calls to their remembrance, we find the following: "I have coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel: yea, you yourselves also know, that these hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me." The reader will not forget to remark, that though St. Paul be now at Miletus, it is to the elders of the church of Ephesus he is speaking, when he says, "Ye yourselves know that these hands have ministered to my necessities;" and that the whole discourse relates to his conduct during his last preceding residence at Ephesus. That manual labour, therefore, which he had exercised at Corinth, he continued at Ephesus: and not only so, but continued it during that particular residence at Ephesus, near the conclusion of which this epistle was written; so that he might with the strictest truth say, at the time of writing the epistle, "Even unto this present hour we labour, working with our own hands." The correspondency is sufficient, then, as to the undesignedness of it. It is manifest to my judgment, that if the history, in this article, had been taken from the epistle, this circumstance, if it appeared at all, would have appeared in its place, that is, in the direct account of St. Paul's transactions at Ephesus. The correspondency would not have been effected, as it is, by a kind of reflected stroke, that is, by a reference in a subsequent speech, to what in the narrative was omitted. Nor is it likely, on the other hand, that a circumstance which is not extant in the history of St. Paul at Ephesus, should have been made the subject of a factitious allusion, in an epistle purporting to be written by him from that place; not to mention that the allusion itself, especially as to time, is too oblique and general to answer any purpose of forgery whatever.

SECTION VII.

† Chap. ix. 20. "And unto the Jews, I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews; to them that are under the law, as under the law."

EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

We have the disposition here described, exemplified in two instances which the history records; one, Acts xvi. 3. "Him, (Timothy,) would Paul have to go forth with him, and took and circumcised him, because of the Jews in those quarters; for they knew all that his father was a Greek." This was before the writing of the epistle. The other, Acts xxi. 23, 26. and after the writing of the epistle: "Do this that we say to thee; we have four men which have a vow on them; them take, and purify thyself with them, that they may shave their heads; and all may know that those things, whereof they were informed concerning thee, are nothing; but that thou thyself also walkest orderly, and keepest the law.—Then Paul took the men, and the next day, purifying himself with them, entered into the temple." Nor does this concurrence between the character and the instances look like the result of contrivance. St. Paul, in the epistle, describes, or is made to describe, his own accommodating conduct towards Jews and towards Gentiles, towards the weak and over-scrupulous, towards men indeed of every variety of character; "to them that are without law, as without law, being not without law to God, but under the law to Christ, that I might gain them that are without law; to the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak; I am made all things to all men, that I might gain some." This is the sequel of the text which stands at the head of the present section. Taking, therefore, the whole passage together, the apostle's condescension to the Jews is mentioned only as a part of his general disposition towards all. It is not probable that this character should have been made up from the instances in the Acts, which relate solely to his dealings with the Jews. It is not probable that a sophist should take his hint from those instances, and then extend it so much beyond them: and it is still more incredible that the two instances, in the Acts, circumstantially related and interwoven with the history, should have been fabricated, in order to suit the character which St. Paul gives of himself in the epistle.

SECTION VIII.

† Chap. i. 14—17. "I thank God that I baptized none of you but Crispus and Gaius, lest any should say that I baptized in my own name; and I baptized also the household of Stephanas; besides, I know not whether I baptized any other; for Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the Gospel."

It may be expected, that those whom the apostle baptized with his own hands, were converts distinguished from the rest by some circumstance, either of eminence, or of connexion with him. Accordingly, of the three names here mentioned, Crispus, we find, from Acts xviii. 8. was a "chief ruler of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth, who believed in the Lord with all his house." Gaius, it appears from Romans xvi. 23. was St. Paul's host at Corinth, and the host, he tells us, "of the whole church." The household of Stephanas, we read in the sixteenth chapter of this epistle, "were the first-fruits of Achaia." Here, therefore, is the propriety we expected: and it is a proof of reality not to be contemned; for their names appearing in the several places in which they occur, with a mark of distinction belonging to each, could hardly be the effect of chance, without any truth to direct it: and, on the other hand, to suppose that they were picked out from these passages, and brought together in the text before us, in order to display a conformity of names, is both improbable in itself, and is rendered more so by the purpose for which they are introduced. They come in to assist St. Paul's exculpation of himself, against the possible charge of having assumed the character of a founder of a separate religion, and with no other visible, or, as I think, imaginable design.*

SECTION IX.

† Chap. xvi. 10, 11. "Now, if Timotheus come, let no man despise him."—Why despise him? This charge is not given concerning any other messenger whom St. Paul sent; and, in the different epistles, many such messengers are mentioned. Turn to 1st of Timothy, chap. iv. 12. and you will find that Timothy was a young man, younger than those who were usually employed in

* Chap. i. 1. "Paul, called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ, through the will of God, and Sosthenes, our brother, unto the church of God, which is at Corinth." The only account we have of any person who bore the name of Sosthenes, is found in the eighteenth chapter of the Acts. When the Jews at Corinth had brought Paul before Gallio, and Gallio had dismissed their complaint as unworthy of his interference, and had driven them from the judgment seat; "then all the Greeks," says the historian, "took Sosthenes, the chief ruler of the synagogue, and beat him before the judgment seat." The Sosthenes here spoken of, was a Corinthian; and, if he was a Christian, and with St. Paul when he wrote this epistle, was likely enough to be joined with him in the salutations of the Corinthian church. But here occurs a difficulty.—If Sosthenes was a Christian at the time of this uproar, why should the Greeks beat him? The assault upon the Christians was made by the Jews. It was the Jews who had brought Paul before the magistrate. If it had been the Jews also who had beaten Sosthenes, I should not have doubted that he had been a favourite of St. Paul, and the same person who is joined with him in the epistle. Let us see, therefore, whether there be not some error in our present text. The Alexandrian manuscript gives παρτες alone, without ὁ Ἐλλαντες, and is followed in this reading by the Coptic version, by the Arabic version, published by Jeremias, by the Vulgate, and by Bede's Latin version. Three Greek manuscripts again, as well as Chrysostom, give ὁ Ἰουδαίος, in the place of ὁ Ἐλλαντες. A great plurality of manuscripts authorize the reading which is retained in our copies. In this variety it appears to me extremely probable that the historian originally wrote παρτες alone, and that ὁ Ἐλλαντες and ὁ Ἰουδαίος have been respectively added as explanatory of what the word παρτες was supposed to mean. The sentence, without the addition of either name, would run very perspicuously thus, "καὶ ἀπέλασαν αὐτοὺς ἀπὸ τοῦ βήματος: ἀνιλαβόμενοι δὲ παρτες Σάβωνα τὸν ἀρχισυνάγωγον, ἐτύπηται μπροστὴ τοῦ βήματος; and he drove them away from the judgment seat; and they all," viz. the crowd of Jews whom the judge had bid begone, "took Sosthenes, and beat him before the judgment seat." It is certain that, as the whole body of the people were Greeks, the application of all to them was unusual and hard. If I were describing an insurrection at Paris, I might say all the Jews, all the Protestants, or all the English, acted so and so; but I should scarcely say all the French, when the whole mass of the community were of that description."—See the note on Acts xviii. 27. where the subject mentioned here by the learned Archbishop, is particularly considered.

INTRODUCTION TO THE FIRST EPISTLE, &c.

the Christian mission; and that St. Paul, apprehending lest he should, on that account, be exposed to contempt, urges upon him the caution which is there inserted, "Let no man despise thy youth."

SECTION X.

† Chap. xvi. 1. "Now, concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even so do ye."

The churches of Galatia and Phrygia were the last churches which St. Paul had visited before the writing of this epistle. He was now at Ephesus, and he came thither immediately from visiting these churches: "He went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia, in order, strengthening all the disciples. And it came to pass that Paul, having passed through the upper coasts," (viz. the above-named countries, called the upper coasts, as being the northern part of Asia Minor,) "came to Ephesus." Acts xviii. 23. xix. 1. These, therefore, probably, were the last churches at which he left directions for their public conduct during his absence. Although two years intervened between his journey to Ephesus and his writing this epistle, yet it does not appear that during that time he visited any other church. That he had not been silent when he was in Galatia, upon this subject of contribution for the poor, is further made out from a hint which he lets fall in his epistle to that church: "Only they (viz. the other apostles,) would that we should remember the poor, the same also which I was forward to do."

SECTION XI.

† Chap. iv. 18. "Now, some are puffed up, as though I would not come unto you."

Why should they suppose that he would not come? Turn to the first chapter of the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, and you will find that he had already disappointed them: "I was minded to come unto you before, that you might have a second benefit; and to pass by you into Macedonia, and to come again out of Macedonia unto you, and of you to be brought on my way towards Judea. When I, therefore, was thus minded, did I use lightness? Or the things that I purpose, do I purpose according to the flesh, that with me there should be yea, yea, and nay, nay? But, as God is true, our word towards you was not yea and nay." It appears from this quotation, that he had not only intended, but that he had promised them a visit before; for otherwise, why should he apologize for the change of his purpose, or express so much anxiety lest this change should be imputed to any culpable fickleness in his temper; and lest he should thereby seem to them, as one whose word was not, in any sort, to be depended upon? Besides which, the terms made use of, plainly refer to a promise, "Our word towards you was not yea and nay." St. Paul therefore had signified an intention, which he had not been able to execute; and this seeming breach of his word, and the delay of his visit, had, with some who were evil affected towards him, given birth to a suggestion that he would come no more to Corinth.

SECTION XII.

† Chap. v. 7, 8. "For even Christ, our pass-over, is sacrificed for us; therefore, let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth."

Dr. Benson tells us, that from this passage, compared with chapter xvi. 8. it has been conjectured that this epistle was written about the time of the Jewish pass-over; and to me the conjecture appears to be very well founded. The passage to which Dr. Benson refers us is this: "I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost." With this passage he ought to have joined another in the same context: "And it may be that I will abide, yea, and winter with you;" for from the two passages laid together, it follows that the epistle was written before Pentecost, yet after winter; which necessarily determines the date to the part of the year within which the pass-over falls. It was written before Pentecost, because he says, "I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost." It was written after winter, because he tells them, "It may be that I may abide, yea, and winter with you." The winter which the apostle purposed to pass at Corinth, was undoubtedly the winter next ensuing to the date of the epistle; yet it was a winter subsequent to the ensuing Pentecost, because he did not intend to set forwards upon his journey, till after that feast. The words, "let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth," look very like words suggested by the season: at least they have, upon that supposition, a force and significancy which do not belong to them upon any other; and it is not a little remarkable, that the hints casually dropped in the epistle concerning particular parts of the year, should coincide with this supposition.

PREFACE

TO THE FIRST EPISTLE

CORINTHIANS.

CORINTH, to which this and the following epistle were sent, was one of the most celebrated cities of Greece. It was situated on a gulf of the same name, and was the capital of the Peloponnesus, or Achaia; and was united to the continent by an isthmus, or neck of land, that had the port of Lecheum on the west, and that of Cenchrea on the east, by which it commanded the navigation and commerce both of the Ionian and Aegean seas. It is supposed by some, to have been founded by Sisyphus, the son of Aeolus, and grandfather of Ulysses, about the year of the world 2490, or 2500, and before the Christian era 1504 years. Others report that it had both its origin and name from Corinthus, the son of Pelops. It was at first but a very inconsiderable town; but at last, through its extensive commerce, became the most opulent city of Greece, and the capital of a powerful state. It was destroyed by the Romans under Mummius, about 146 years before Christ, but was afterward rebuilt by Julius Cæsar.

By its port of Lecheum, it received the merchandise of Italy and the western nations; and by Cenchrea, that of the islands of the Aegean Sea, the coasts of Asia Minor, and the Phœnicians.

Corinth exceeded all cities of the world, for the splendour and magnificence of its public buildings, such as temples, palaces, theatres, porticoes, cenotaphs, baths, and other edifices; all enriched with a beautiful kind of columns, capitals, and bases, from which the Corinthian order in architecture took its rise. Corinth is also celebrated for its statues, those especially of Venus, the Sun, Neptune and Amphitrite, Diana, Apollo, Jupiter, Minerva, &c. The temple of Venus was not only very splendid, but also very rich, and maintained, according to Strabo, not less than 1000 courtezans, who were the means of bringing an immense concourse of strangers to the place. Thus riches produced luxury, and luxury a total corruption of manners; though arts, sciences, and literature, continued to flourish long in it; and a measure of the martial spirit of its ancient inhabitants, was kept alive in it by means of those public games, which, being celebrated on the isthmus which connects the Peloponnesus to the main land, were called the Isthmian games; and were exhibited once every five years. The exercises in the games were leaping, running, throwing the quoit or dart, boxing and wrestling. It appears, that besides these, there were contentions for poetry and music; and the conquerors in any of these exercises, were ordinarily crowned either with pine leaves, or with parsley. It is well known that the apostle alludes to those games in different parts of his epistles, which shall all be particularly noticed as they occur.

Corinth, like all other opulent and well situated places, has often been a subject of contention between rival states; has frequently changed masters, and undergone all forms of government. The Venetians held it till 1715, when the Turks took it from them, under whose dominion it has ever since remained. Under this deteriorating government, it is greatly reduced; its whole population amounting only to between 13 and 14,000 souls. It lies about 46 miles to the east of Athens; and 342 south-west of Constantinople. A few vestiges of its ancient splendour still remain; which are objects of curiosity and gratification to all intelligent travellers.

As we have seen that Corinth was well situated for trade, and consequently very rich; it is no wonder that, in its heathen state, it was exceedingly corrupt and profligate. Notwithstanding this, every part of the Grecian learning was highly cultivated here; so that before its destruction by the Romans, Cicero (Pro lege Manli. cap. v.) scrupled not to call it totius Græciæ lumen, The eye of all Greece. Yet the inhabitants of it were as lascivious as they were learned. Public prostitution formed a considerable part of their religion; and they were accustomed, in their public prayers, to request the gods to multiply their prostitutes! and, in order to express their gratitude to their deities for the favours they received, they bound themselves by vows, to increase the number of such women; for commerce with them, was neither esteemed sinful nor disgraceful. Lais, so famous in history, was a Corinthian prostitute, and whose price was not less than 10,000 drachmas. Demosthenes, from whom this price was required by her, for one night's lodging, said, "I will not buy repentance at so dear a rate." So notorious was this city for such conduct, that the verb κορινθιαζωμαι, to Corinthize, signified to act the prostitute: and Κορινθια κορη, a Corinthian damsel, meant a harlot, or common woman. I mention these things the more particularly, because they account for several things mentioned by the apostle in his letters to this city; and things which, without this knowledge of their previous Gentile state and customs, we could not comprehend. It is true, as the apostle states, that they carried these things to an extent that was not practised in any other Gentile country. And yet, even in Corinth, the Gospel of Jesus Christ, prevailing over universal corruption, founded a Christian Church!

ANALYSIS OF THE FIRST EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

This epistle, as to its subject matter, has been variously divided; into three parts by some, into four, seven, eleven, &c. parts by others. Most of these divisions are merely artificial, and were never intended by the apostle. The following seven particulars comprise the whole—

I.—The Introduction, ch. i. 1—9.

II.—Exhortations relative to their dissentions, ch. i. 9. and to ch. iv. inclusive.

III.—What concerns the person who had married his stepmother; commonly called the incestuous person, ch. v. vi. and vii.

IV.—The question concerning the lawfulness of eating things which had been offered to idols, ch. viii. ix. and x. inclusive.

V.—Various ecclesiastical regulations, ch. xi.—xiv. inclusive.

VI.—The important question concerning the resurrection of the dead, ch. xv.

VII.—Miscellaneous matters, containing exhortations, salutations, commendations &c. &c.

(The reason of the discrepancy of the fifteenth of Nisan with the day of the mean Paschal Full Moon arises from the inaccuracy of the Metonic Cycle, which reckoned 235 mean lunations to be precisely equal to nineteen solar years, these lunations being actually performed in one hour and a half less time. The correspondence of the Pass-over with the mean Full-Moon, according to the Julian account, was in A. D. 325.—True time of the Paschal Full Moon at Corinth, according to Ferguson's Tables, the XIIth of the Calends of May, (April 20.) at fifty-seven minutes and forty-one seconds past five in the morning.—Easter Sunday, April 18, or the XIVth of the Calends of May.—Epace, or moon's age on the twenty-second of March, or the Xth of the Calends of April, 18.—Year of the reign of Nero Caesar, the Roman emperor, and fifth Caesar, 3.—Year of Claudius Felix, the Jewish Governor, 4.—Year of the reign of Vologesus, king of the Parthians, of the family of the Arsacidae, 7.—Year of Caius Numidius Quadratus, governor of Syria, 6.—Year of Ismael, high-priest of the Jews, 2.—Year of the reign of Corbred I. king of the Scots, brother to the celebrated Caractacus, who was carried prisoner to Rome, but afterward released by the emperor, 2.—According to Struyk's catalogue of eclipses, which he collected from the Chinese chronology, the sun was eclipsed at Canton in China, on the 25th of December of this year, or on the VIIIth of the Calends of January, A. D. 57. The middle of the eclipse was at twenty-eight minutes past twelve at noon; the quantity eclipsed at this time being nine digits and twenty minutes. The day of this eclipse was on the 19th of Tybi, in the 804th year of the Nabonassarean era, and on the 24th of Cisleu of the minor Rabbinical, or Jewish era of the world 3816, or 4415 of their greater era.—Roman Consuls, Q. Volusius Saturninus, and P. Cornelius Scipio.

CHAPTER I.

The salvation of Paul and Sosthenes, 1, 2. The apostolical benediction, 3. Thanksgiving for the prosperity of the church at Corinth, 4. In what that prosperity consisted, 5—9. The apostle reproves their dissensions, and vindicates himself from being any cause of them, 10—17. States the simple means which God uses to convert sinners, and confound the wisdom of the wise, &c. 18—21. Why the Jews and Greeks did not believe, 22. The matter of the apostle's preaching, and the reasons why that preaching was effectual to the salvation of men, 23—29. All should glory in God, because all blessings are dispensed by him through Christ Jesus, 30, 31.

NOTES ON CHAP. I.

Verse 1. Paul, called to be an apostle] Bishop Pearce contends that a comma should be placed after καλεσ, called, which should not be joined to αποστολος, apostle; the first signifies being called to, the other sent from. He reads it, therefore, Paul the called; the apostle of Jesus Christ. The word καλεσ, called, may be here used, as in some other places, for constituted. For this, and the meaning of the word apostle, see the note on Rom. i. 1.

As the apostle had many irregularities to reprehend in the Corinthian church, it was necessary that he should be explicit in stating his authority. He was called, invited to the Gospel feast; had partaken of it, and by the grace he received, was qualified to proclaim salvation to others: Jesus Christ therefore made him an apostle, that is, gave him a Divine commission to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles.

Through the will of God] By a particular appointment from God alone; for, being an extraordinary messenger, he derived no part of his authority from man.

Sosthenes our brother] probably the same person mentioned Acts xviii. 17. where see the note.

Verse 2. The church of God which is at Co-

Sanctified in Christ Jesus] ἁγιασμενοι, separated from the corruptions of their place and age.

Called to be saints] κατοι ἀγιοι, constituted saints; or invited to become such; this was the design of the Gospel: for Jesus Christ came to save men from their sins.

With all that in every place, &c.] All who profess Christianity, both in Corinth, Ephesus, and other parts of Greece or Asia Minor: and by this we see, that the apostle intended that this epistle should be a general property of the universal church of Christ; though there are several matters in it, that are suited to the state of the Corinthians only.

Both theirs and ours] That is, Jesus Christ is the common Lord and Saviour of all. He is the exclusive property of no one church, or people, or nation. Calling on, or invoking the name of the Lord Jesus, was the proper distinguishing mark of a Christian. In those times of apostolic light and purity, no man attempted to invoke God, but in the name of Jesus Christ: this is what genuine Christians still mean, when they ask any thing from God for Christ's sake.

Verse 3. Grace be unto you] For a full explanation of all these terms, see the notes on Rom. i. 7.

Verse 4. For the grace—which is given you] Not only their calling to be saints, and to be sanctified in Christ Jesus; but for the various spiritual gifts which they had received, as is specified in the succeeding verses.

Verse 5. Ye are enriched—(ye abound)—in all utterance] Εν παντι λεγομεν, in all doctrine, for so the word should certainly be translated and understood. All the truths of God, relative to their salvation, had been explicitly declared to them; and they had all knowledge; so that they perfectly comprehended the doctrines which they had heard.

Verse 6. As the testimony of Christ, &c.] The testimony of Christ is the Gospel which the apostle had preached, and which had been confirmed by various gifts of the Holy Spirit, and miracles wrought by the apostle.

Verse 7. So that ye come behind in no gift] Every gift and grace of God's Spirit was possessed by the members of that church, some having their gifts after this manner, others after that.

Waiting for the coming of our Lord] It is difficult to say whether the apostle means the final judgment, or our Lord's coming to destroy Jerusalem, and make an end of the Jewish polity.—

See 1 Thess. iii? 13. As he does not explain himself particularly, he must refer to a subject with which they were well acquainted. As the Jews, in general, continued to contradict and blaspheme; it is no wonder, if the apostle should be directed to point out to the believing Gentiles, that the judgments of God were speedily to fall upon this rebellious people, and scatter them over the face of the earth; which shortly afterward took place.

Verse 8. Who shall confirm you] As the testimony of Christ was confirmed among you; so, in conscientiously believing and obeying, God will confirm you through that testimony.—See ver. 6.

In the day of our Lord Jesus] In the day that he comes to judge the world, according to some; but, in the day in which he comes to destroy the Jewish polity, according to others.

While God destroys them who are disobedient, he can save you who believe.

Verse 9. God is faithful] The faithfulness of God is a favourite expression among the ancient Jews; and, by it, they properly understand the integrity of God, in preserving whatever is entrusted to him. And they suppose that in this sense, the fidelity of man may illustrate the fidelity of God; in reference to which they tell the two following stories. "Rabbi Phineas, the son of Jair, dwelt in a certain city, whither some men came who had two measures of barley, which they desired him to preserve for them. They afterward forgot their barley, and went away. Rabbi Phineas, each year, sowed the barley, reaped, threshed, and laid it up in his granary. When seven years had elapsed, the men returned, and desired to have the barley with which they had entrusted him. Rabbi Phineas recollected them, and said, 'come and take your treasure,' i. e. the barley they had left; with all that it had produced for seven years. Thus, from the faithfulness of man, ye may know the faithfulness of God."

"Rabbi Simeon, the son of Shetach, bought an ass from some Edomites, at whose neck his disciples saw a diamond hanging: they said unto him, Rabbi, the blessing of the Lord maketh rich, Prov. x. 22. But he answered—The ass I have bought, but the diamond I have not bought: therefore he returned the diamond to the Edomites. Thus, from the fidelity of man, ye may know the fidelity of God." This was an instance of rare honesty, not to be paralleled among the Jews of the present day; and probably among few Gentiles. Whatever is committed to the keeping of God, he will most carefully preserve; for, he is faithful.

Unto the fellowship, &c.] Εκ κοινωνιας, into the communion or participation of Christ, in the graces of his Spirit, and the glories of his future kingdom. God will continue to uphold and save you, if you entrust your bodies and souls to him. But, can it be said that God will keep what is either not entrusted to him; or, after being entrusted, is taken away?

to his second point, exhorting them to abstain from dissensions, that they might be of the same heart and mind, striving together for the hope of the Gospel.

By the name of our Lord Jesus] By his au- thority, and in his place; and on account of your infinite obligations to his mercy, in calling you into such a state of salvation.

That ye all speak the same thing] If they did not agree exactly in opinion on every subject; they might, notwithstanding, agree in the words which they used to express their religious faith.
 The members of the church of God should labour to be of the same mind, and to speak the same thing, in order to prevent divisions; which always hinder the work of God. On every essential doctrine of the Gospel, all genuine Christians agree: why then need religious communion be interrupted? This general agree- ment is all that the apostle can have in view; for, it cannot be expected that any number of men should, in every respect, perfectly coincide in their views of all the minor points, on which an exact conformity in sentiment is impossible, to minds so variously constituted as those of the human race. Angels may thus agree, who see nothing through an imperfect or false medium; but, to man, this is impossible. Therefore, men should bear with each other; and not be so ready to imagine that none have the truth of God but they and their party.

Verse 11. By them which are of the house of Chloe] This was doubtless some very religious matron at Corinth, whose family were converted to the Lord; some of whom were probably sent to the apostle to inform him of the dissensions which then prevailed in the church at that place. Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Archæicus, mentioned ch. xvi. 17. were probably the sons of this Chloe.

Contentions] Ephæ, alterations; produced by the χρημα, divisions, mentioned above. When once they had divided, they must necessarily have contended, in order to support their respective parties.

Verse 12. Every one of you saith] It seems, from this expression, that the whole church at Corinth was in a state of dissention: they were all divided into the following sects, 1. Paulians, or followers of St. Paul: 2. Apollonians, or followers of Apollos: 3. Kephians, or followers of Kephas: 4. Christians, or followers of Christ.
 See the Introduction, sect. v.

The converts at Corinth were partly Jews, and partly Greeks. The Gentile part, as Dr.

Lightfoot conjectures, might boast the names of Paul and Apollos: the Jewish, those of Kephas and Christ. But these again might be subdivided: some probably considered themselves disciples of Paul, he being the immediate instrument of their conversion; while others might prefer Apollos for his extraordinary eloquence.

If by Kephas the apostle Peter be meant, some of the circumcision who believed, might prefer him to all the rest; and they might consider him more immediately sent to them; and therefore have him in higher esteem than they had Paul, who was the minister or apostle of the uncircumcision: and on this very account, the converted Gentiles would prize him more highly than they did Peter.

Instead of Χριστο, Christ, some have conjectured that we should read Κριστου, of Crispus; who is mentioned ver. 14. And some think that Χριστο, of Christ, is an interpolation, as it is not likely that Christ, in any sense of the word, could be said to be the head of a sect or party in his own church: as all those parties held that Gospel, of which himself was both the author and the subject. But it is very easy to conceive that, in a church so divided, a party might be found, who, dividing Christ from his ministers, might be led to say,—"We will have nothing to do with your parties, nor with your party- spirit: we are the disciples of Christ, and will have nothing to do with Paulians, Apollonians, or Kephians, as contra-distinguished from Christ." The reading Κριστου for Χριστο, is not acknowledged by any MS. or Version.

Verse 13. Is Christ divided?] Can he be split into different sects and parties? Has he different and opposing systems? Or, is the Messiah to appear under different persons?

Was Paul crucified for you?] As the Gospel proclaims salvation through the crucified only; has Paul poured out his blood as an atonement for you? This is impossible, and therefore your being called by my name is absurd: for his disciples you should be alone, who has bought you by his blood.

Were ye baptized in the name of Paul?] To be baptized in, or into the name of one, implied that the baptized was to be the disciple of him into whose name, religion, &c. he was baptized.
 As if he had said, Did I ever attempt to set up a new religion, one founded on my own autho- rity, and coming from myself? On the contrary, have I not preached Christ crucified for the sin of the world, and called upon all mankind, both Jews and Gentiles, to believe on him?

Verse 14. I thank God that I baptized none of you] None of those who now live in Corinth, except Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, Acts xviii. 8. And Gaius, the same person probably with whom Paul lodged, Rom. xvi. 23. where see the notes. Dr. Lightfoot observes, "If this be Gaius, or Cains, to whom the third Epistle of John was written, which is very probable, when the first verse of that epistle is compared with Rom. xvi. 23. then, it will appear probable, that John wrote his first Epistle to the Corinthians.—I wrote, says he, unto the church—What church? Certainly it must have been some particular church which the apostle has in view; and the church where Gaius himself resided. And if this be true, we may look for Diotrephes, 3 John, ver. 9. in the Corinthian church; and the author of the schism of which the apostle complains. See the Introduction, sect. viii.

Verse 15. Lest any should say, &c.] He was careful not to baptize, lest it should be supposed that he wished to make a party for himself; because superficial observers might imagine, that he baptized them into his own name; to be his followers, though he baptized them into the name of Christ only.

Instead of κάρρια, I have baptized, the Codex Alexandrinus, the Codex Ephraim, and several others, with the Coptic, Sahidic, latter Syriac in the margin, Armenian, Vulgate, some copies of the Itala, and several of the Fathers, read, κάρριας, ye were baptized. And if we read in, so that, instead of lest, the sentence will stand thus; so that no one can say, that ye were baptized into my name. This appears to be the true reading; and for it Bp. Pearce offers several strong arguments.

Verse 16. The household of Stephanus.] From chap. xvi. 15. we learn that the family of Stephanus were the first converts in Achaia; probably converted and baptized by the apostle himself. Epenetus is supposed to be one of this family; see the note on Rom. chap. xvi. 5.

I know not whether I baptized any other] I do not recollect that there is any person now residing in Corinth or Achaia besides the above-mentioned, whom I have baptized. It is strange that the doubt here expressed by the apostle should be construed so as to affect his inspiration! What, does the inspiration of prophet or apostle, necessarily imply that he must understand the geography of the universe, and have an intuitive knowledge of all the inhabitants of the earth, and how often, and where, they may have changed their residence! Nor, was that inspiration ever given, so to work on a man's memory, that he could not forget any of the acts which he had performed during life. Inspiration was given to the holy men of old, that they might be able to write and proclaim the mind of God, in the things which concern the salvation of men.

Verse 17. For Christ sent me not to baptize] Bp. Pearce translates thus, For Christ sent me, not so much to baptize as to preach the Gospel; and he supports his version thus—"The writers of the Old and New Testaments do, almost every where, (agreeably to their Hebrew idiom,) express a preference given to one thing beyond another, by an affirmation of that which is preferred, and a negation of that which is contrary to it: and so it must be understood here, for, if St. Paul was not sent at all to baptize, he baptized without a commission: but if he was sent, not only to baptize, but to preach also; or to preach rather than baptize, he did in fact discharge his duty aright." It appears sufficiently evident that baptizing was considered to be an inferior office; and, though every minister of Christ might administer it, yet apostles had more important work. Preparing these adult heathens for baptism, by the continual preaching of the word, was of much greater consequence than baptizing them when thus prepared to receive and profit by it.

Not with wisdom of words] Οὐκ ἐν σοφίᾳ λόγου. In several places in the New Testament, the term λογος is taken not only to express a word, a speech, a saying, &c. but doctrine, or the matter of teaching. Here, and in 1 Thes. i. 5. and in several other places, it seems to signify reason, or that mode of rhetorical argumentation so highly prized among the Greeks. The apostle was sent not to pursue this mode of conduct, but simply to announce the truth; to proclaim Christ crucified for the sin of the world; and to do this in the plainest and simplest manner possible, lest the numerous conversions which followed, might be attributed to the power of the apostle's eloquence, and not to the demonstration of the Spirit of God. It is worthy of remark, that in all the revivals of religion with which we are acquainted, God appears to have made very little use of human eloquence, even when possessed by pious men. His own nervous truths, announced by plain common sense, though in homely phrase, have been the general means of the conviction and conversion of sinners. Human eloquence and learning have often been successfully employed in defending the out-works of Christianity; but simplicity and truth have preserved the citadel.

It is further worthy of remark, that when God was about to promulgate his laws, he chose

Moses as the instrument, who appears to have laboured under some natural impediment in his speech, so that Aaron his brother was obliged to be his spokesman to Pharaoh: and that, when God had purposed to publish the Gospel to the Gentile world—to Athens, Ephesus, Corinth, and Rome, he was pleased to use Saul of Tarsus, as the principal instrument; a man whose bodily presence was weak, and his speech contemptible, 2 Cor. x. 1, 10. And thus it was proved that God sent him to preach not with human eloquence, lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect; but with the demonstration and power of his own Spirit: and thus the excellence of the power appeared to be of God, and not of man.

Verse 18. For the preaching of the cross] Ὁ λόγος γὰρ ὁ τοῦ σταυροῦ, the doctrine of the cross; or the doctrine that is of, or concerning the cross; that is, the doctrine that proclaims salvation to a lost world, through the crucifixion of Christ.

Is to them that perish, foolishness] There are, properly speaking, but two classes of men known where the Gospel is preached, ἀπιστοῦντες, the unbelievers and gain-sayers, who are perishing: and ὀβριμνοὶ, the obedient believers, who are in a state of salvation. To those who will continue in the first state, the preaching of salvation through the merit of a crucified Saviour is folly. To those who believe, this doctrine of Christ crucified is the power of God to their salvation: it is divinely efficacious to deliver them from all the power, guilt, and pollution of sin.

Verse 19. For it is written] The place referred to is, Isai. xxix. 14.

I will destroy the wisdom of the wise] Τῶ σοφῶν, of wise men; of the philosophers; who, in their investigations, seek nothing less than God; and whose highest discoveries amount to nothing in comparison of the grand truths relative to God, the invisible world, and the true end of man, which the Gospel has brought to light. Let me add that the very discoveries which are really useful, have been made by men who feared God, and conscientiously credited Divine Revelation: witness Newton, Boyle, Pascal, and many others. But all the sceptics, and deists, by their schemes of natural religion and morality, have not been able to save one soul! No sinner has ever been converted from the error of his ways by their preaching or writings.

Verse 20. Where is the wise—the scribe—the disputer of the world?] These words most manifestly refer to the Jews; as the places, Isai. xxix. 14. xxxiii. 18. and xlv. 25. to which he refers, cannot be understood of any but the Jews.

The wise man, σοφός, of the apostle, is the חכם chakam of the prophet, whose office it was to teach others.

The scribe, γραμματικός, of the apostle, is the סופר sopher of the prophet; this signifies any man of learning, as distinguished from the common people; especially any master of the traditions.

The disputer, Συζητητής, answers to the שרר derosh, or דרשן derushen, the propounder of questions; the seeker of allegorical, mystical, and cabalistical senses from the Holy Scriptures. Now, as all these are characters well known among the Jews; and as the words ἀνοητός, of this world, are a simple translation of רחוק דלם hazzeh, which is repeatedly used to designate the Jewish republic; there is no doubt that the apostle has the Jews immediately in view. This wisdom of theirs induced them to seek out of the sacred oracle any sense, but the true one; and they made the word of God of none effect, by their traditions. After them, and precisely on their model, the school-men arose; and they rendered the doctrine of the Gospel of no effect, by their hypercritical questions, and endless distinctions without differences. By the preaching of Christ crucified, God made foolish the wisdom of the Jewish wise men; and after that the pure religion of Christ had been corrupted by a church that was of this world; God rendered the wisdom and disputing of the school-men foolishness, by the revival of pure Christianity, at the reformation. The Jews themselves allow that nothing is wise, nothing strong, nothing rich, without God.

"Our rabbins teach that there were two wise men in this world; one was an Israelite, Achitophel, the other was a Gentile, Balaam: but both were miserable in this world."

"There were also two strong men in the world; one an Israelite, Sampson; the other a Gentile, Goliath: but they were both miserable in this world."

"There were two rich men in the world; one an Israelite, Korah; the other a Gentile, Haman: but both these were miserable in this world. And why?—Because their gifts came not from God." See Schoeigen.

In truth, the world has derived very little, if any, moral good, either from the Jewish rabbins, or the Gentile philosophers.

God] Dr. Lightfoot observes, " that Σοφία του Θεου, the wisdom of God, is not to be understood of that wisdom which had God for its author; but that wisdom which had God for its object. There was, among the heathen, Σοφία τῶν φυσικῶν, wisdom about natural things; that is, philosophy; and Σοφία του Θεου, wisdom about God; that is, divinity. But the world in its divinity, could not, by wisdom, know God." The plain meaning of this verse is, that the wise men of the world, especially the Greek philosophers, who possessed every advantage that human nature could have, independently of a divine revelation, and who had cultivated their minds to the uttermost, could never, by their learning, wisdom, and industry, find out God: nor had the most refined philosophers among them, just and correct views of the Divine Nature: nor of that in which human happiness consists. The work of Lucretius, De Natura Rerum; and the work of Cicero, De Natura Deorum, are incontestable proofs of this. Even the writings of Plato and Aristotle, have contributed little to remove the veil which clouded the understanding of men. No wisdom but that which came from God, could ever penetrate and illuminate the human mind.

By the foolishness of preaching] By the preaching of Christ crucified, which the Gentiles termed μωρία, foolishness, in opposition to their own doctrines, which they termed σοφία, wisdom. It was not by the foolishness of preaching, literally, nor by the foolish preaching, that God saved the world; but by that Gospel which they called μωρία, foolishness; which was, in fact, the wisdom of God, and also the power of God to the salvation of them that believed.

Verse 22. For the Jews require a sign] Instead of σημειον, a sign, ABCDEFG. several others: both the Syriac, Coptic, Vulgate, and Itala, with many of the Fathers, have σημεια, signs; which reading, as undoubtedly genuine, Griesbach has admitted into the text. There never was a people in the universe more difficult to be persuaded of the truth than the Jews: and had not their religion been incontestably proved, by the most striking and indubitable miracles, they never would have received it. The slowness of heart to believe, added to their fear of being deceived, induced them to require miracles to attest every thing that professed to come from God. They were a wicked and adulterous generation, continually seeking signs, and never saying, It is enough. But the sign which seems particularly referred to here, is the assumption of secular power, which they expected in the Messiah: and because this sign did not appear in Christ, therefore they rejected him.

And the Greeks seek after wisdom] Such wisdom, or philosophy, as they found in the writings of Cicero, Seneca, Plato, &c. which was called philosophy; and which came recommended to them in all the beauties and graces of the Latin and Greek languages.

Verse 23. But we] Apostles, differing widely from these Gentile philosophers—

Preach Christ crucified] Call on men, both Jews and Gentiles, to believe in Christ, as having purchased their salvation by shedding his blood for them.

Unto the Jews a stumblingblock] Because Jesus came meek, lowly, and impoverished; not seeking worldly glory, nor affecting worldly pomp; whereas they expected the Messiah to come as a mighty prince and conqueror: because Christ did not come so, they were offended at him. Out of their own mouths we may condemn the gain-saying Jews. In Sohar Chadaah, fol. 26. the following saying is attributed to Moses, relative to the brazen serpent: "Moses said, This serpent is a stumblingblock to the world. The holy blessed God answered, Not at all; it shall be for punishment to sinners; and life to upright men." This is a proper illustration of the apostle's words.

Unto the Greeks foolishness] Because they could not believe that proclaiming supreme happiness, through a man that was crucified at Judea as a malefactor, could ever comport with reason and common sense: for both the matter and manner of the preaching, were opposite to every notion they had formed of what was dignified and philosophic. In Justin Martyr's dialogue with Trypho the Jew, we have these remarkable words, which serve to throw light on the above. "Your Jesus," says Trypho, "having fallen under the extreme curse of God, we cannot sufficiently admire how you can expect any good from God, who place your hopes, Εν' ανθρωποι σταυρωθῆντα, upon a man that was crucified." The same writer adds, "They count us mad; that, after the eternal God, the Father of all things, we give the second place, ανθρωποι σταυρωθῆντι, to a man that was crucified." "Where is your understanding," said the Gentiles, "Who worship for a God, him who was crucified?" Thus Christ crucified was, to the Jews, a stumblingblock; and to the Greeks foolishness. See Whitby on this verse.

Verse 24. But unto them which are called] Τῶν κλητῶν. I see both of Jews and Greeks, who were, by the preaching of the Gospel.

A. M. 4060. 25 Because the foolishness of God is wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men.

27 But ^b God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise;

A. M. 4060. and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty;

28 And base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and ^c things which are not, ^d to bring to nought things that are; called or invited to the marriage feast; and have accordingly believed in Christ Jesus: they prove this doctrine to be divinely powerful, to enlighten and convert the soul; and to be a proof of God's infinite wisdom, which has found out such an effectual way to glorify both his justice and mercy; and save, to the uttermost, all that come to him, through Christ Jesus. The called, or invited, κλητοι, is a title of genuine Christians; and is frequently used in the New Testament. ἁγιοι, saints, is used in the same sense.

29 ^e That no flesh should glory in his presence.

Verse 25. The foolishness of God is wiser, &c.] The meaning of these strong-expressions is, that the things of God's appointment which seem to men foolishness; are infinitely beyond the highest degree of human wisdom: and those works of God, which appear to superficial observers, weak and contemptible, surpass all the efforts of human power. The means which God has appointed for the salvation of men, are so wisely imagined, and so energetically powerful, that all who properly use them, shall be infallibly brought to the end, final blessedness, which he has promised to them who believe and obey.

Verse 26. Ye see your calling] ΤΗΝ ΚΛΗΣΙΝ; the state of grace and blessedness to which ye are invited. I think ΚΛΗΣΙΣ ΤΗΝ ΚΛΗΣΙΝ, &c. should be read in the imperative: Take heed to, or consider your calling, brethren; that (οτι) not many of you are wise after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble; men is not in the original, and Paul seems to allude to the Corinthian believers in particular. This seems to have been said in opposition to the high and worldly notions of the Jews, who assert that the Divine Spirit never rests upon any man, unless he be wise, powerful, and rich. Now, this Divine Spirit did rest upon the Christians at Corinth; and yet these were, in the sense of the world, neither wise, rich, nor noble. We spoil, if not corrupt, the apostle's meaning, by adding are called, as if God did not send his Gospel to the wise, the powerful, and the noble; or did not will their salvation. The truth is, the Gospel has an equal call to all classes of men: but the wise, the mighty, and the noble, are too busy, or too sensual, to pay any attention to an invitation so spiritual and so divine; and, therefore, there are few of these in the church of Christ, in general.

Verse 27. But God hath chosen the foolish things] God has chosen, by means of men, who are esteemed rude and illiterate, to confound the greatest of the Greek philosophers, and overturn their systems: and, by means of men, weak, without secular power or authority, to confound the scribes and Pharisees; and in spite of the exertions of the Jewish sanhedrin, to spread the doctrine of Christ crucified all over the land of Judea: and by such instruments as these, to convert thousands of souls to the faith of the Gospel, who are ready to lay down their lives for the truth. The Jews have proverbs that express the same sense as these words of the apostle. In Shemoth Rabba, sect. 17. fol. 117. it is said, "There are certain matters which appear little to men, yet by them God points out important precepts. Thus hyssop, in the sight of man is worth nothing; but, in the sight of God, its power is great: sometimes he equals it to the cedar, particularly in the ordinance concerning the lepers; and in the burning of the red heifer. Thus, God commanded them in Egypt, Exod. xii. 22, And ye shall take a bunch of hyssop, &c. And concerning Solomon, it is said, 1 Kings v. 13, And he discoursed of trees, from the cedar on Lebanon, to the hyssop that grows out of the wall. Whence we may learn, that great and small things are equal in the eyes of the Lord; and that, even by small things, he can work great miracles."

Verse 28. And base things—and things which are despised] It is very likely that the apostle refers here to the Gentiles, and to the Gentile converts, who were considered base and despicable in the eyes of the Jews, who counted them no better than dogs; and who are repeatedly called the things that are not. By these very people, converted to Christianity, God has brought to nought all the Jewish pretensions; and, by means of the Gentiles themselves, he has annihilated the whole Jewish polity: so that even Jerusalem itself was, soon after this, trodden under foot of the Gentiles.

Verse 29. That no flesh should glory] God does his mighty works in such a way, as proves, that though he may condescend to employ men as instruments; yet, they have no part either in the contrivance or energy, by which such works were performed.

God; for it is by and through him, that Christ Jesus comes, and all the blessings of the Gospel dispensation.

Who of God is made unto us wisdom] As being the author of that evangelical wisdom which far excels the wisdom of the philosopher and the scribe; and even that legal constitution which is called the wisdom of the Jews; Deut. iv. 6.

And righteousness] Δικαιοσύνη, justification; as procuring for us that remission of sins, which the law could not give, Gal. ii. 21. iii. 21.

And sanctification] As procuring for, and working in us, not only an external and relative holiness as was that of the Jews; but ὁσιότητα τῆς εὐαγγελίας, true and eternal holiness, Eph. iv. 24. wrought in us by the Holy Spirit.

And redemption] He is the author of redemption, not from the Egyptian bondage, or Babylonish captivity, but from the servitude of Satan, the dominion of sin and death; and from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the sons of God; or the redemption of the body, Rom. viii. 21, 23. See Whitby.

The object of the apostle is to show, that man, of himself, possesses no good; that whatever he has, comes from God; and from God only through Christ. For the different acceptations of the word righteousness, the reader may consult the note on Rom. i. 17. where the subject is considered in every point of view.

Verse 31. According as it is written] In Jerem. ix. 23, 24. Thus saith the Lord, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom; neither let the mighty man glory in his might; let not the rich man glory in his riches; but let him that glorieth, glory in this—That he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord, which exercise loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness, in the earth. So then, as all good is of, and from God, let him that has either wisdom, strength, riches, pardon, holiness, or any other blessing, whether temporal or spiritual, acknowledge that he has nothing but what he has received; and that, as he has cause of glorying (boasting or exultation) in being made a partaker of these benefits and mercies of his Creator and Redeemer, let him boast in God alone, by whom, through Christ Jesus, he has received the whole.

1. This is an admirable chapter, and drawn up with great skill and address. The divided state of the Corinthian church we have already noticed; and it appears that in these factions, the apostle's authority had been set at nought by some, and questioned by many. St. Paul begins his letter with showing his authority; he had it immediately through Christ Jesus himself, by the will of God. And, indeed, the success of his preaching, was a sufficient proof of the divinity of his call. Had not God been with him, he never could have successfully opposed the whole system of the national religion of the Corinthians; supported as it was by the prejudice of the people, the authority of the laws, and the eloquence and learning of their most eminent philosophers. It was necessary, therefore, that he should call the attention of this people to the divine origin of his mission, that they might acknowledge that the excellency of the power was of God, and not of man.

2. It was necessary also, that he should conciliate their esteem; and therefore speak as favourably concerning them, as truth would allow; hence he shows them that they were a church of God, sanctified in Christ Jesus, and called to be saints; that they abounded and even excelled in many excellent gifts and graces; and that they were not inferior to any church of God, in any gift. And he shows them, that they received all these through God's confirmation of that testimony, which he had delivered among them, ver. 4—7.

3. When he had thus prepared their minds to receive and profit by his admonitions; he proceeds to their schisms, which he mentions, and reprehends in the most delicate manner; so that the most obstinate and prejudiced could take no offence.

4. Having gained this point, he gently leads them to consider that, as God is the fountain of all good, so their good had all come from him; and that none of them should rest in the gift, but in the giver; nor should they consider themselves as of particular consequence, on account of possessing such gifts, because all earthly good was transitory, and those who trust in power, wisdom, or wealth, are confounded and brought to nought; and that they alone are safe who receive every thing as from the hand of God; and, in the strength of His gifts, glorify him who is the donor of all good. He who can read this chapter without getting much profit, has very little spirituality in his soul; and must be utterly unacquainted with the work of God in the heart.

CHAPTER II.

The apostle makes an apology for his manner of preaching, 1. And gives the reason why he adopted that manner, 2—5. He shows that this preaching, notwithstanding it was not with excellency of human speech or wisdom, yet was the mysterious wisdom of God, which the princes of this world did not know, and which the Spirit of God alone could reveal, 6—10. It is the Spirit of God only, that can reveal the things of God, 11. The apostles of Christ know the things of God by the Spirit of God, and teach them, not in the words of man's wisdom, but in the words of that Spirit, 12, 13. The natural man cannot discern the things of the Spirit, 14. But the spiritual man can discern and teach them, because he has the mind of Christ, 15, 16.

NOTES ON CHAP. II.

Verse 1. When I came to you] Acting suitably to my mission, which was to preach the Gospel, but not with human eloquence, chap. 1. 17. I declared to you the testimony, the Gospel of God; not with excellency of speech, not with arts of rhetoric used by your own philosophers, where the excellence of the speech recommends the matter, and compensates for the want of solidity and truth; on the contrary, the testimony concerning Christ and his salvation, is so supremely excellent, as to dignify any kind of language by which it may be conveyed. See the Introduction, sect. ii.

Verse 2. I determined not to know any thing among you] Satisfied that the Gospel of God could alone make you wise unto salvation, I determined to cultivate no other knowledge; and to teach nothing but Jesus Christ, and him crucified, as the foundation of all true wisdom, piety, and happiness. No other doctrine shall I proclaim among you.

Verse 3. I was with you in weakness] It is very likely that St. Paul had not only something in his speech very unfavourable to a ready and powerful elocution; but also some infirmity of body, that was still more disadvantageous to him. A fine appearance, and a fine voice, cover many weaknesses and defects, and strongly and forcibly recommend what is spoken, though not remarkable for depth of thought, or solidity of reasoning. Many popular orators have little besides their persons and their voice to recommend them. Lewis XIV. styled Peter du Bosc, le plus beau parleur de son royaume; the finest speaker in his kingdom: and, among his own people, he was styled l'orateur parfait; the perfect orator. Look at the works of this French Protestant divine, and you find it difficult to subscribe to the above sayings. The difficulty is solved, by the information that the person of M. Du Bosc was noble and princely;

3 And I was with you in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling.

4 And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power:

5 That your faith should not stand and his voice, full, harmonious, and majestic. Paul had none of these advantages, and yet idolatry and superstition fell before him. Thus God was seen in the work, and the man was forgotten.

In fear, and in much trembling] This was often the state of his mind; dreading lest he should at any time be unfaithful, and so grieve the Spirit of God; or, that after having preached to others, himself should be a castaway. See chap. ix. 27.

An eminent divine has said, that it requires three things to make a good preacher; study, temptation, and prayer. The latter no man that lives near to God, can neglect; the former, no man who endeavours rightly to divide the word of truth, will neglect; and, with the second, every man will be more or less exercised, whose whole aim is to save souls. Those of a different cast, the devil permits to pass quietly on, in their own indolent and prayerless way.

Verse 4. And my speech] Ὁ λόγος μου, my doctrine, the matter of my preaching.

And my preaching] Ἡ κηρυξία μου, my proclamation, my manner of recommending the grand but simple truths of the Gospel.

Was not with enticing words of man's wisdom] Ἐν ῥητοῖς ἀνθρώπων σοφίας λόγου, with persuasive doctrines of human wisdom: in every case I left man out, that God might become the more evident. I used none of the means of which great orators avail themselves, in order to become popular, and thereby to gain fame.

But in demonstration of the Spirit] Ἀποδείξω, in the manifestation; or as two ancient MSS. have it, ἀποκαλύψω, in the revelation of the Spirit. The doctrine that he preached was revealed by the Spirit:—that it was a revelation of the Spirit, the holiness, purity, and usefulness of the doctrine rendered manifest: and the overthrow of idolatry and the conversion of souls, by the power and energy of the preaching, was the demonstration that all was divine. The greater part of the best MSS. Versions, and Fathers, leave out the adjective arbitrarium, man's, before opus, wisdom: it is possible that the word may be a gloss, but it is necessarily implied in the clause. Not with the persuasive discourses or doctrines of wisdom; i. e. of human philosophy.

 Verse 5. That your faith should not stand That the illumination of your souls, and your conversion to God, might appear to have nothing human in it: your belief, therefore, of the truths which have been proposed to you, is founded, not in human wisdom, but in divine power; human wisdom was not employed: and human power, if it had been employed, could not have produced the change:

Verse 6. We speak wisdom among them that are perfect By the ω ταις τελαις, among those that are perfect, we are to understand Christians of the highest knowledge and attainments: those who were fully instructed in the knowledge of God through Christ Jesus. Nothing, in the judgment of St. Paul, deserved the name of wisdom but this. And though he apologizes for his not coming to them with excellency of speech or wisdom, yet he means what was reputed wisdom among the Greeks; and which, in the sight of God, was mere folly when compared with that wisdom that came from above. Dr. Lightfoot thinks, that the apostle mentions a four-fold wisdom. 1. Heathen wisdom, or that of the Gentile philosophers, chap. i. 22. which was termed by the Jews חוכמה Chokmah yonith, Grecian wisdom; and which was so undervalued, by them, that they joined these two under the same curse; and curst is he that breeds dogs; and curst is he who teaches his son Grecian wisdom. Bava Kama, fol. 82.

2. Jewish wisdom; that of the scribes and Pharisees, who crucified our Lord, ver. 8.

3. The Gospel, which is called the wisdom of God in a mystery, ver. 7.

4. The wisdom, ω ταις τελαις, of this world; that system of knowledge which the Jews made up out of the writings of their scribes and doctors. This state is called חכמת העולם hokmat hazzeah; this, or the present world; to distinguish it from חכמת העולם הבא hokmat haba, the world to come; i. e. the days of the Messiah. Whether we understand the term this world, either as relating to the state of the Gentiles, cultivated to the uttermost in philosophical learning; or the then state of the Jews, who had made the word of God of no effect by their traditions, which contained a sort of learning of which they were very fond and very proud; yet, by this Grecian and Jewish wisdom, no soul ever could have arrived at any such knowledge or wisdom as that communicated by the revelation of Christ. This was perfect wisdom; and they who were thoroughly instructed in it, and had received the grace of the Gospel, were termed τελειοι, the perfect. This, says the apostle, is not the wisdom of this world, for that has not the manifested Messiah in it; nor the wisdom of the rulers of this world. The chief men, whether philosophers among the Greeks, or rabbins among the Jews; for those we are to understand as implied in the term rulers, used here by the apostle. These rulers came to nought; for they, their wisdom, and their government, were shortly after overturned in the destruction of Jerusalem. This declaration of the apostle is prophetic. The ruin of the Grecian superstition soon followed.

Verse 7. The wisdom of God in a mystery The GOSPEL of Jesus Christ, which had been comparatively hidden from the foundation of the world, (the settling of the Jewish economy, as this phrase often means,) though appointed from the beginning, to be revealed in the fulness of time. For though this Gospel was, in a certain sense, announced by the prophets, and prefigured by the law; yet it is certain that even the most intelligent of the Jewish rulers, their doctors, scribes, and Pharisees, had no adequate knowledge of it; therefore it was still a mystery to them and others; till it was so gloriously revealed by the preaching of the apostles.

Verse 8. Which none of the princes of this world knew Here, it is evident, that this world refers to the Jewish state, and to the degree of knowledge in that state: and the rulers, the priests, rabbins, &c. who were principally concerned in the crucifixion of our Lord.

The Lord of glory Or the glorious Lord: infinitely transcending all the rulers of the universe; whose is, eternal glory; who gave that glorious Gospel in which his followers may glory, as it affords them such cause of triumph as the heathens had not, who gloried in their philosophers. Here is a teacher who has come from God, who has taught the most glorious truths which it is possible for the soul of man to conceive ; and has promised to lead all the followers of his crucified master, to that state of glory which is ineffable and eternal.

Verse 9. But as it is written] The quotation is taken from Isai. lxiv. 4. The sense is continued here from verse the seventh, and ἀλαβύμεν, we speak, is understood. We do not speak or preach the wisdom of this world ; but that mysterious wisdom of God, of which the prophet said, Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God has prepared for them that love him. These words have been applied to the state of glory in a future world ; but they certainly belong to the present state ; and express merely the wondrous light, life, and liberty, which the Gospel communicates to them that believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, in that way which the Gospel itself requires. To this the prophet himself refers ; and, it is evident, from the following verse, that the apostle also refers to the same thing. Such a scheme of salvation, in which God's glory, and man's felicity, should be equally secured, had never been seen, never heard of, nor could any mind but that of God, have conceived the idea of so vast a project : nor could any power, but his own, have brought it to effect.

Verse 10. But God hath revealed them unto us] A manifest proof that the apostle speaks here of the glories of the Gospel, and not of the glories of the future world.

For the Spirit searcheth all things] That is, the Spirit of God which spoke by the prophets ; and has now given to the apostles the fulness of that heavenly truth of which he gave to the former only the outlines.

Yea, the deep things of God] It is only the Spirit of God, which can reveal the councils of God ; these are the purposes which have existed in his infinite wisdom and goodness from eternity ; and particularly what refers to creation, providence, redemption, and eternal glory ; as far as men and angels are concerned in these purposes. The apostles were so fully convinced that the scheme of redemption proclaimed by the Gospel was divine, that they boldly asserted that these things infinitely surpassed the wisdom and comprehension of man. God was now, in a certain way, become manifest ; many attributes of his, which to the heathen world would have for ever lain in obscurity, (for the world by wisdom knew not God,) were now, not only brought to light as existing in him ; but illustrated by the gracious displays which he had made of himself. It was the Spirit of God alone that could reveal these things ; and it was the energy of that Spirit alone that could bring them all into effect ; stamp and seal them as attributes and works of God for ever. The apostles were as truly conscious of their own inspiration, as they were that they had consciousness at all ; and what they spoke, they spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.

Verse 11. For what man knoweth the things of a man] The word ἀνθρώπου in the first clause, is omitted by the Codex Alexandrinus, and one other ; and by Athanasius, Cyril, and Vigil of Tapscum. Bishop Pearce contends strongly against the authenticity of the word, and reads the passage thus : "For what is there that knoweth the things of a man except the spirit of a man that is in him ?" "I leave out," says the learned bishop, "ἀνθρώπου, with the Alexandrian MS. and read τις τις αὐτοῦ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ; because I conceive that the common reading is wide of St. Paul's meaning ; for to say, What man except the spirit of a man ; is (I think) to speak improperly ; and to suppose that the spirit of a man is a man : but it is very proper to say, What except the spirit of a man : τις, is feminine as well as masculine, and therefore may be supplied with ovis, or some such word, as well as with ἀνθρώπου." Though the authority for omitting this word, is comparatively slender, yet it must be owned that its omission renders the text much more intelligible. But even one MS. may preserve the true reading.

The spirit of a man knows the things of a man : that is, a man is conscious of all the schemes, plans, and purposes, that pass in his own mind ; and no man can know these things but himself. So, the Spirit of God, He whom we call the third person of the glorious TRINITY, knows all the counsels and determinations of the Supreme Being. As the Spirit is here represented to live in God, as the soul lives in the body of a man : and as this Spirit knows all the things of God, and had revealed those to the apostles, which concern the salvation of the world ; therefore, what they spoke and preached was true, and men may implicitly depend upon it. The miracles which they did, in the name of Christ, was the proof that they had that Spirit, and spoke the truth of God.

Verse 12. Now we have received, not the spirit of the world] We, who are the genuine apostles of Christ, have received this Spirit of God, by which we know the deep things of God; and through the teaching of that Spirit, we preach Christ crucified. We have not, therefore, received the spirit of the world, of the Jewish teachers, who are all looking for a worldly kingdom, and a worldly Messiah; and interpret all the scriptures of the Old Testament, which relate to him, in a carnal and worldly sense.

A. M. 4060. A. D. 56. A. U. C. 809. An Imp. Nerois Cms. 3. teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; comparing spiritual things with spiritual.

14 But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.

That we might know the things] We receive this teaching that we may know what those super-eminentely excellent things are which God has purposed freely to give to mankind. It is evident that, as the apostle means by princes of the world, the rulers of the Jews, ver. 6—8. so, by spirit of the world, he here means Jewish wisdom, or their carnal mode of interpreting the sacred oracles; and their carnal expectation of a worldly kingdom under the Messiah.

Verse 13. Which things also we speak] We dare no more use the language of the Jews and the Gentiles, in speaking of those glorious things, than we can indulge their spirit. The Greek orators affected a high and florid language, full of tropes and figures, which dazzled more than it enlightened. The rabbins affected obscurity, and were studious to find out cabalistical meanings, which had no tendency to make the people wise unto salvation. The apostles could not follow any of these; they spoke the things of God in the words of God: every thing is plain and intelligible; every word well placed, clear, and nervous. He who has a spiritual mind, will easily comprehend an apostle's preaching.

Comparing spiritual things with spiritual] This is commonly understood to mean, comparing the spiritual things under the Old Testament, with the spiritual things under the New: but this does not appear to be the apostle's meaning. The word συνηγορειν, which we translate comparing, rather signifies conferring, discussing, or explaining; and the word πνευματικων, should be rendered to spiritual men, and not be referred to spiritual things. The passage, therefore, should be thus translated; explaining spiritual things to spiritual persons. And this sense the following verse absolutely requires.

Verse 14. But the natural man] ψυχικος, the animal man; the man who is in a mere state of nature, and lives under the influence of his animal passions: for the word ψυχη, which we often translate soul, means the lower and sensitive part of man, in opposition to νους, the understanding, or rational part. The Latins use anima, to signify these lower passions; and animus, to signify the higher. The person in question, is not only one who either has had no spiritual teaching, or has not profited by it; but one who lives for the present world, having no respect to spiritual or eternal things. This ψυχικος, or animal man, is opposed to the πνευματικος, or spiritual man; and, as this latter is one who is under the influence of the Spirit of God; so the former is one who is without that influence.

The apostle did speak of those high and sublime spiritual things to these animal men; but he explained them to those which were spiritual. He uses this word in this sense, chap. iii. 1. ix. 11. and particularly in ver. 15. of the present chapter: He that is spiritual judgeth all things.

But the natural man—The apostle appears to give this as a reason why he explained those deep spiritual things to spiritual men; because the animal man, the man who is in a state of nature, without the regenerating grace of the Spirit of God; receiveth not the things of the Spirit; neither apprehends nor comprehends them: he has no relish for them; he considers it the highest wisdom to live for this world. Therefore, these spiritual things are foolishness to him; for, while he is in his animal state, he cannot see their excellency, because they are spiritually discerned; and he has no spiritual mind.

Verse 15. But he that is spiritual judgeth all things] He who has the mind of Christ, discerns and judges of all things spiritual; yet he himself is not discerned by the mere animal man. Some suppose that the word εραυνειν should be understood thus: he examines, scrutinizes, convinces, reproves, which it appears to have in ch. xiv. 24. and they read the verse thus: the spiritual man, the well taught Christian, convinces, i. e. can easily convict all men, (παρα, accus. sing.) every animal man, of error and vice. Yet he himself is convicted of no man; his mind is enlightened, and his life is holy; and therefore the animal man cannot convict him of sin. This is a good sense, but the first appears the most natural. See Pearce and Rosenmüller.

Verse 16. For who bath known the mind of the Lord] Who that is still an animal man, can know the mind of God, so as to instruct him, viz. the spiritual man, the same that is spoken of, ver. 15. But the words may be better understood thus: How can the animal man know the mind of the Lord; and how can any man communicate that knowledge which he has never acquired; and which is foolishness to him, because it is spiritual, and he is animal? This quotation is made from Isai. xl. 13.

But we have the mind of Christ He has endowed us with the same disposition, being born again by his Spirit; therefore, we are capable of knowing his mind, and receiving the teachings of his Spirit. These teachings we do receive, and therefore are well qualified to convey them to others.

The words that we may instruct him, or συγγίγνωσιν αὐτοῦ, should be translated that he may teach IT: that is, the mind of God; not instruct God, but teach his mind to others. And this interpretation the Hebrew will also bear.

Bishop Pearce observes, "the principal questions here, are what συγγίγνωσιν signifies; and what αὐτοῦ is relative to? The Hebrew word, which the Septuagint translate by these two is yodiennu: now, since yodiā signifies as well to make known as to know, (and indeed this is the most frequent sense of it in the Old Testament) the suffix, (postfix) u nu, may relate to a thing, as well as to a person; and therefore it may be rendered not by him, but by it, i. e. the mind of the Lord. And in this sense the apostle seems to have used the words of the Seventy; for if we understand αὐτοῦ here to be the relative to Κυρίου, Lord, this verse contains no reason for what went before: whereas, if it be a relative to our, mind, it affords a reason for what had been said before, ver. 14." The true translation of the passage, as used by the apostle, appears to be this: For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he should TEACH IT? And this translation agrees with every part of the context, and particularly with what follows.

1. This chapter might be considered a good model for a Christian minister to regulate his conduct by, or his public ministry; because it points out the mode of preaching used by St. Paul and the apostles in general. This great apostle came not to the people with excellency of speech and of wisdom, when he declared unto them the counsel of God. They know little either of the spirit of St. Paul, or the design of the Gospel, who makes the chief excellence of their preaching consist in the eloquence of language, or depth of human reasoning. That may be their testimony; but it is not God's. The enticing words of men's wisdom, are seldom accompanied by the demonstration and power of the Holy Spirit.

2. One justly remarks, that "the foolishness of preaching has its wisdom, loftiness, and eloquence; but this consists in the sublimity of its truths, the depths of its mysteries, and the ardour of the Spirit of God." In this respect Paul may be said to have preached wisdom among those which were perfect. The wisest and most learned men in the world, who have seriously read the Bible, have acknowledged that there is a depth and height of wisdom and knowledge in that book of God, which are sought in vain any where else; and indeed it would not be a revelation from God were it not so. The men who can despise and ridicule this sacred book, are those who are too blind to discover the objects presented to them by this brilliant light; and are too sensual to feel and relish spiritual things. They, above all others, are incapable of judging; and should be no more regarded, when employed in talking against the sacred writings than an ignorant peasant should be, who, not knowing his alphabet, pretends to decry mathematical learning.

-3. A new mode of preaching has been diligently recommended—"Scripture phraseology should be generally avoided where it is antiquated, or conveys ideas inconsistent with modern delicacy." St. Paul did not preach in the words which man's wisdom teacheth; such words are too mean and too low for a religion so divine. That which the Holy Spirit alone can discover, he alone can explain. Let no man dare to speak of God in any other way than he speaks of himself in his word. Let us take care not to profane his truths and mysteries, either by such low and object ideas as are merely human: or by new and worldly expressions altogether unworthy of the Spirit of God.

4. It is the glory of God, and ought to be ours, not to be acceptable to carnal men. The natural man always finds some pretence to excuse himself from believing, by looking on the mysteries of religion, as being either too much above man, or too much below God: the spiritual man judges them to be so much the more credible, the less credible they are to the natural man.

The opposition, contempt, and blindness of the world, with regard to the things of God, render all its judgments concerning them, liable to exception: this blindness in spiritual things is the just punishment of a carnal life. The principal part of the above is extracted from the reflections of the pious Quemel.

CHAPTER III.

Because of the carnal, divided state of the people at Corinth, the apostle was obliged to treat them as children, in the knowledge of sacred things, 1—3. Some were for setting up Paul, others Apollos, as their sole teachers, 4. The apostle shows that himself, and fellow apostles, were only instruments which God used to bring them to the knowledge of the truth; and even their reasoning and watering the seed, was of no use, unless God gave the increase, 5—8. The church represented as God's husbandry; and as God's building, the foundation of which is Christ Jesus, 9—11. Ministers must beware how and what they build on this foundation, 12—15. The church of God is his temple, and he that defiles it shall be destroyed, 16, 17. No man should depend on his own wisdom; for the wisdom of the world is foolishness with God, 18—20. None should glory in man as his teacher; God gives his followers every good, both for time and eternity, 21—23.

NOTES ON CHAP. III.

Verse 1. I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual] This is a continuation of the preceding discourse. See the notes there.

But as unto carnal] Σαρρικός, persons under the influence of fleshly appetites; coveting and living for the things of this life.

Babes in Christ] Just beginning to acquire some notion of the Christian religion; but as yet very incapable of judging what is most suitable to yourselves; and, consequently, utterly unqualified to discern between one teacher and another; so that your making the distinctions which you do make, so far from being a proof of mature judgment, is, on the contrary, a proof that you have no right judgment at all; and this springs from your want of judgment in divine things.

Verse 2. I have fed you with milk] I have instructed you in the elements of Christianity; in its simplest and easiest truths; because, from the low state of your minds in religious knowledge, you were incapable of comprehending the higher truths of the Gospel; and in this state you still continue. The apostle thus exposes to them the absurdity of their conduct, in pretending to judge between preacher and preacher; while they had but a very partial acquaintance even with the first principles of Christianity.

Verse 3 There is among you envying, and strife, and divisions] Ζηλος και ημε και διχοστασιαι. There are three things here worthy of note: these people were wrong in thought, word, and deed. Ζηλος, envying, refers to the state of their souls; they had inward grudgings and disaffection towards each other. Ημε, strife or contention, refers to their words; they were continually disputing and contending whose party was the best; each endeavouring to prove that he and his party were alone in the right. Διχοστασιαι, divisions, refers to their conduct; as they could not agree, they contended till they separated from each other; and thus rent the church of Christ. Thus the envying and grudging led to strife and evil speaking; and this led to divisions and fixed parties. In this state well might the apostle say, Are ye not carnal, and walk as men? Ye act just as the people of the world; and have no more of the spirit of religion than they.

4 For while one saith, ¹I am of Paul; and another, ¹I am of Apollos; are ye not carnal?

5 Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ^kministers by whom ye believed, ¹even as the Lord gave to every man?

6 ^mI have planted, ⁿApollos watered; ^obut God gave the increase.

Verse 4. For while one saith, I am of Paul, &c.] It was notorious that both Paul and Apollos held the same creed; between them there was not the slightest difference; when, therefore, the dissentients began to prefer the one to the other, it was the fullest proof of their carnality; because in the doctrines of these apostles there was no difference; so that what the people were captivated by, must be something in their outward manner, Apollos being probably more eloquent than Paul. Their preferring one to another, on such an account, proved that they were carnal, led by their senses and mere outward appearances, without being under the guidance either of reason or grace. There are thousands of such people in the Christian church, to the present day. See the notes on chap. i. 10, &c.

Verse 5. Ministers by whom ye believed] The different apostles who have preached unto you the word of life, are the means which God has used to bring you to the knowledge of Christ. No one of those has either preached or recommended himself; they all preach and recommend Christ Jesus the Lord.

Even as the Lord gave to every man?] Whatever difference there may be in our talents, it is of God's making; and he who knows best, what is best for his church, has distributed both gifts and graces according to his own mind: and, as his judgment is infallible, all these dispensations must be right. Paul, therefore, is as necessary to the perfecting of the church of Christ as Apollos; and Apollos as Paul. Both, but with various gifts, point out the same Christ; building on one and the same foundation.

Verse 6. I have planted] I first sowed the seed of the Gospel at Corinth, and the regions of Achaia.

Apollos watered] Apollos came after me, and, by his preaching and exhortations, watered the seed which I had sowed; but God gave the increase. The seed has taken root, has sprung up, and borne much fruit, but this was by the especial blessing of God. As in the natural, so in the spiritual world; it is by the especial blessing of God that the grain which is sown in the ground, brings forth thirty, sixty, or a hundred-fold. It is neither the sower nor the waterer that produces this strange and inexplicable multiplication; it is God alone. So it is by the particular agency of the Spirit of God, that even good seed, sown in good ground, the purest doctrine conveyed to the honest heart, produces the salvation of the soul.

Verse 7. So then, neither is he that planteth any thing] God alone should have all the glory, as the seed is his, the ground is his, the labourers are his, and the produce all comes from himself.

Verse 8. He that planteth and he that watereth are one] Both Paul and Apollos have received the same doctrine, preached the same doctrine, and labour to promote the glory of God in the salvation of your souls. Why should you be divided with respect to Paul and Apollos, while these apostles are intimately one in spirit, design, and operation?

According to his own labour.] God does not reward his servants according to the success of their labour, because that depends on himself: but he rewards them according to the quantum of faithful labour which they bestow on his works. In this sense, none can say I have laboured in vain, and spent my strength for nought.

Verse 9. For we are labourers together with God] We do nothing of ourselves, nor in reference to ourselves; we labour together in that work which God has given us to do, expect all our success from him; and refer the whole to his glory. It would perhaps be more correct to translate Θεοῦ καὶ ἡμῶν σὺνργῶν, we are fellow-labourers of God; for as the preposition σὺν may express the joint labour of the teachers one with another, and not with God, I had rather, with Bp. Pearce, translate as above: i. e. we labour together in the work of God. Far from being divided among ourselves, we jointly labour as oxen in the same yoke, to promote the honour of our Master.

Ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building.] Θεοῦ γεωργίον, Θεοῦ οἰκοδομήν τε. The word γεωργίον, which we translate husbandry, signifies properly an arable field: so Prov. xxiv. 30. I went by the field, γεωργίον, of the slothful: and chap. xxxi. 16. The wise woman considereth a field, γεωργίον, and buyeth it. It would be more literal to translate it, Ye are God's farm: γεωργίον in Greek answers to מִשְׁכַּח שֶׂדֶה, in Hebrew, which signifies, properly, a sown field.

Ye are God's building.—Ye are not only the field which God cultivates, but ye are the house which God builds, and in which he intends to dwel. As no man, in viewing a fine building, extols the quarry-man, that dug up the stones, the hewer that cut and squared them, the mason that placed them in the wall, the woodman that hewed down the timber, the carpenter that squared and jointed it, &c. but the architect who planned it; and under whose direction the whole work was accomplished; so, no man should consider Paul, or Apollos, or Kephas, any thing, but as persons employed by the great Architect to form a building which is to become a habitation of himself through the Spirit; and the design of which is entirely his own.

Verse 10. As a wise master-builder] ὡς σοφὸς ἀρχιτεκτων. The design or plan of the building is from God; all things must be done according to the pattern which he has exhibited: but the execution of this plan was entrusted chiefly to St. Paul; he was the wise or experienced architect, which God used in order to lay the foundation; to ascertain the essential and immutable doctrines of the Gospel:—those alone which came from God, and which alone he would bless to the salvation of mankind.

Let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon] Let him take care that the doctrines which he preaches be answerable to those which I have preached: let him also take heed that he enjoin no other practice than that which is suitable to the doctrine; and in every sense accords with it.

Verse 11. Other foundation can no man lay] I do not speak particularly concerning the foundation of this spiritual building; it can have no other foundation than Jesus Christ: there cannot be two opinions on this subject among the true apostles of our Lord. The only fear is, lest an improper use should be made of this heavenly doctrine; lest a bad superstructure should be raised on this foundation.

Verse 12. If any man build—gold, silver, &c.] Without entering into curious criticisms relative to these different expressions, it may be quite enough for the purpose of edification, to say, that by gold, silver, and precious stones, the apostle certainly means pure and wholesome doctrines; by wood, hay, and stubble, false doctrines; such as at that time prevailed in the Corinthian church; for instance, that there should be no resurrection of the body; that a man may, on his father's death, lawfully marry his step-mother; that it was necessary to incorporate much of the Mosaic law with the Gospel; and perhaps other matters, equally exceptionable, relative to marriage, concubinage, fornication, frequenting heathen festivals, and partaking of the flesh which had been offered in sacrifice to an idol, with many other things; which, with the above, are more or less hinted at by the apostle in these two letters.

Verse 13. The day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire] There is much difference of opinion relative to the meaning of the terms in this and the two following verses. That the apostle refers to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, I think very probable; and when this is considered, all the terms and metaphors will appear clear and consistent.

The day, is the time of punishment coming on this disobedient and rebellious people. And this day being revealed by fire, points out the extreme rigour, and totally destructive nature, of that judgment.

And the fire shall try every man's work] If the apostle refers to the Judaizing teachers, and their insinuations that the law, especially circumcision, was of eternal obligation; then the day of fire, the time of vengeance, which was at hand, would sufficiently disprove such assertions; as, in the judgment of God, the whole temple-service should be destroyed; and the people who fondly presumed on their permanence and stability, should be dispossessed of their land, and scattered over the face of the whole earth. The difference of the Christian and the Jewish systems should then be seen: the latter should be destroyed in that fiery day, and the former prevail more than ever.

Verse 14. If any man's work abide] Perhaps there is here an illusion to the purifying of different sorts of vessels under the law. All that could stand the fire, were to be purified by the fire; and those which could not resist the action of the fire, were to be purified by water. Numb. xxxi. 23. The gold, silver, and precious stones, could stand the fire; but the wood, hay and stubble, must be necessarily consumed. So, in that great and terrible day of the Lord, all false doctrine, as well as the system that was to pass away, should be made sufficiently manifest: and God would then show that the Gospel, and that alone, was that system of doctrine which he would bless and protect, and none other.

He shall receive a reward] He has not only preached the truth, but he has laboured in the word and doctrine. And the reward is to be according to the labour. See on ver. 8.

Verse 15. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss] If he have preached the necessity of incorporating the law with the Gospel, or proclaimed as a doctrine of God, any thing which did not proceed from heaven, he shall suffer loss; all his time and labour will be found to be uselessly employed and spent. Some refer the loss to the work, not to the man; and understand the passage thus: If any man's work be burned, he shall suffer loss; much shall be taken away from it, nothing shall be left but the measure of truth and uprightness which it may have contained.

But he himself shall be saved] If he sincerely and conscientiously have believed what he preached, and yet preached what was wrong, not through malice or opposition to the Gospel, but through mere ignorance, he shall be saved; God, in his mercy, will pass by his errors: and he shall not suffer punishment because he was mistaken. Yet, as in most erroneous teachings, there is generally a portion of wilful and obstinate ignorance, the salvation of such erroneous teachers is very rare; and is expressed here, yet so as by fire, i. e. with great difficulty; a mere escape; a hair's breadth deliverance; he shall be like a brand plucked out of the fire.

The apostle obviously refers to the case of a man, who, having builded a house, and begun to dwell in it, the house happens to be set on fire, and he has warning of it, just in time to escape with his life; losing, at the same time, his house, his goods, his labour, and almost his own life. So he, who, while he holds the doctrine of Christ crucified, as the only foundation on which a soul can rest its hopes of salvation; builds, at the same time, on that foundation, antinomianism, or any other erroneous or destructive doctrine, he shall lose all his labour, and his own soul scarcely escape everlasting perdition; nor even this, unless sheer ignorance and inveterate prejudice, connected with much sincerity, be found in his case.

The popish writers have applied what is here spoken to the fire of purgatory; and they might, with equal propriety, have applied it to the discovery of the longitude, the perpetual motion, or the philosopher's stone; because it speaks just as much of the former as it does of any of the latter. The fire mentioned here is to try the man's work, not to purify his soul; but the dream of purgatory refers to the purging in another state, what left this impure; not the work of the man, but the man himself; but here the fire is said to try the work; ergo, purgatory is not meant, even if such a place as purgatory could be proved to exist; which remains yet to be demonstrated.

Verse 16. Ye are the temple of God] The apostle resumes here what he had asserted in ver. 9.—Ye are God's building. As the whole congregation of Israel were formerly considered as the temple and habitation of God, because God dwelt among them; so here, the whole church at Corinth is called the temple of God, because all genuine believers have the Spirit of God to dwell in them; and Christ has promised to be always in the midst even of two or three, who are gathered together in his name. Therefore, where God is, there is his temple.

Verse 17. If any man defile the temple] This clause is not consistently translated α τις τον ναον του Θεου θυσει, θυσει τωτον ο Θεος: If any man destroy the temple of God, him will God destroy. The verb is the same in both clauses. If any man injure, corrupt, or destroy the church of God by false doctrine, God will destroy him; will take away his part out of the book of life. This refers to him who wilfully opposes the truth; the erring mistaken man shall barely escape: but the obstinate opposer shall be destroyed. The former shall be treated leniently; the latter shall have judgment without mercy.

Verse 18. If any man among you seemeth to be wise] Ει τις δυνασ οσοσ ωνασ, ιφ ανυ πρετανδ, ορ αφεκτ οε ιωσε. This seems to refer to some individual in the church of Corinth, who had been very troublesome to its peace and unity: probably Diotrephes; see on chap. i. 14. or some one of a similar spirit, who wished to have the pre-eminence, and thought himself wiser than seven men that could render a reason. Every Christian church has less or more of these.

Let him become a fool] Let him divest himself of his worldly wisdom, and be contented to be called a fool, and esteemed one, that he may become wise unto salvation; by renouncing his own wisdom, and seeking that which comes from God. But probably the apostle refers to him who, pretending to great wisdom and information, taught doctrines contrary to the Gospel; endeavouring to show reasons for them, and to support his own opinions with arguments which he thought unanswerable. This man brought his worldly wisdom to bear against the doctrines of Christ; and probably through such teaching, many of the scandalous things which the apostle reprehends among the Corinthians, originated.

Verse 19. The wisdom of this world] Whether it be the pretended deep and occult wisdom of the rabbins; or the wire-drawn speculations of the Grecian philosophers; is foolishness with God: for, as folly consists in spending time, strength, and pains, to no purpose; so these may be fitly termed fools who acquire no saving knowledge by their speculations. And is not this the case with the major part of all that is called philosophy, even in the present day? Has one soul been made wise unto salvation through it? Are our most eminent philosophers either pious or useful men? Who of them is meek, gentle, and humble? Who of them directs his researches so as to meliorate the moral condition of his fellow creatures? Pride, insolence, self-conceit, and complacency, with a general forgetfulness of God, contempt for his word, and despite for the poor, are their general characteristics.

He taketh the wise in their own craftiness.] This is a quotation from Job v. 13. and powerfully shows what the wisdom of this world is: it is a sort of craft, a subtle trade, which they carry on to wrong others, and benefit themselves; and they have generally too much cunning to be caught by men; but God often overthrows them with their own devisings. Paganism raised up persecution against the church of Christ in order to destroy it: this became the very means of quickly spreading it over the earth, and of destroying the whole Pagan system. Thus the wise were taken in their own craftiness.

Verse 20. The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise] They are always full of schemes and plans for earthly good; and God knows that all this is vain, empty, and unsatisfactory; and will stand them in no stead when He comes to take away their souls. This is a quotation from Psal. xciv. 11. What is here said of the vanity of human knowledge, is true of every kind of wisdom that leads not immediately to God himself.

Verse 21. Let no man glory in men] Let none suppose that he has any cause of exultation in any thing but God. All are yours; he that has got God for his portion, has every thing that can make him happy and glorious: all are his.

Verse 22. Whether Paul, or Apollos] As if he had said, God designs to help you by all things and persons: every teacher, sent from him, will become a blessing to you, if you abide faithful to your calling. God will press every thing into the service of his followers. The ministers of the church of Christ are appointed for the hearers: not the hearers for the ministers. In like manner, all the ordinances of grace and mercy are appointed for them, not they for the ordinances.

Or the world] The word κοσμος, here means rather the inhabitants of the world, than what we commonly understand by the world itself: and this is its meaning in John iii. 16, 17. vi. 33. xiv. 31. xvii. 21. See particularly John xii. 19. ὁ κοσμος οπισθεν αυτου ἀρραβη: the world is gone after him: the great mass of the people believe on him. The Greek word has the same meaning in a variety of places, both in the sacred and the profane writers, as le monde, the world, literally, has in French: where it signifies not only the system of created things, but by metonymy the people; every body, the mass, the populace. In the same sense it is often found in English. The apostle's meaning evidently is, not only Paul, Apollos, and Cephas, are yours; appointed for, and employed in your service; but every person besides, with whom you may have any intercourse or connexion; whether Jew or Greek, whether enemy or friend. God will cause every person, as well as every thing, to work for your good, while you love, cleave to, and obey Him.

Or life] With all its trials and advantages, every hour of it, every tribulation in it, the whole course of it, as the grand state of your probation, is a general blessing to you: and you have life, and that life preserved, in order to prepare for an eternity of blessedness.

Or death] That solemn hour, so dreadful to the wicked; and so hateful to those who live without God; that is yours. Death is your servant; he comes a special messenger from God for you: he comes to undo a knot that now connects body and soul, which it would be unlawful for yourselves to untie; he comes to take your souls to glory; and he cannot come before his due time to those who are waiting for the salvation of God. A saint wishes to live only to glorify God: and he who wishes to live longer than he can get and do good, is not worthy of life.

Or things present] Every occurrence in Providence, in the present life; for God rules in providence as well as in grace.

Or things to come] The whole order and economy of the eternal world, all in heaven, and all in earth, are even now working together for your good.

Verse 23. And ye are Christ's] You are called by his name; you have embraced his doctrine;

you depend on him for your salvation; he is your foundation stone; he has gathered you out of the world, and acknowledges you as his people and followers. Τιμοι δὲ Χριστου: Ye are of Christ: all the light and life which ye enjoy, ye have received through and from him; and he has bought you with his blood.

And Christ is God's.] Χριστος δὲ Θεου, And Christ is of God. Christ, the Messiah, is the gift of God's eternal love and mercy to mankind: for God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that they who believe in him, should not perish, but have everlasting life. Christ, in his human nature, is as much the property of God, as any other human being. And as mediator between God and man, he must be considered, in a certain way, inferior to God; but in his own essential, eternal nature, there is no inequality; he is God over all. Ye, therefore, do not belong to men.—Why then take Paul, Apollos, Cephas, or any other man for your head? All these are your servants: ye are not their property; ye are Christ's property; and, as he has taken the human nature into heaven, so will he take yours: because, he that sanctifieth, and they that are sanctified, are all of one; ye are his brethren; and as his human nature is eternally safe at the throne of God, so shall your bodies and souls be, if ye cleave to Him, and be faithful unto death.

1. A finer, and more conclusive argument, to correct what was wrong among this people, could not have been used than that with which the apostle closes this chapter. It appears to stand thus, "If you continue in these divisions, and arrange yourselves under different teachers, you will meet with nothing but disappointment, and lose much good. If ye will have Paul, Apollos, &c. on your present plan, you will have them and nothing else, nor can they do you any good, for they are only instruments in God's hand at best, to communicate good, and he will not use them to help you while you act in this unchristian way. On the contrary, if you take God as your portion, you shall get these, and every good besides. Act as you now do, and you get nothing, and lose all! Act as I advise you to do, and you shall not only lose nothing of the good which you now possess, but shall have every possible advantage: the men whom you now wish to make your heads, and who in that capacity cannot profit you, shall become God's instruments of doing you endless good. Leave your dissensions, by which you offend God, and grieve his Christ; and then God, and Christ, and all, will be yours." How agitated, convinced, and humbled, must they have been when they read the masterly conclusion of this chapter!

2. A want of spirituality seems to have been the grand fault of the Corinthians. They regarded outward things chiefly; and were carried away with sounds and show. They lost the treasure, while they eagerly held fast the earthen vessel that contained it. It is a true saying, that he who lends only the ear of his body to the word of God, will follow that man most who pleases the ear; and these are the persons who generally profit the soul least.

3. All the ministers of God should consider themselves as jointly employed by Christ for the salvation of mankind. It is their interest to serve God, and be faithful to his calling; but shall they dare to make his church their interest? This is generally the origin of religious disputes and schisms. Men will have the church of Christ for their own property; and Jesus Christ will not trust it with any man.

4. Every man employed in the work of God, should take that part only upon himself that God has assigned him. The church and the soul, says pious Quemel, are a building of which God is the master and chief architect; JESUS CHRIST the main foundation; the APOSTLES the subordinate architects; the BISHOPS the workmen; the PRIESTS their helpers; GOOD works the main body of the building; FAITH a sort of second foundation; and CHARITY the top and perfection. Happy is that man who is a living stone in this building.

5. He who expects any good out of God, is confounded and disappointed in all things. God alone can content, as he alone can satisfy the soul. All our restlessness and uneasiness, are only proofs that we are endeavouring to live without God in the world. A contented mind is a continual feast; but none can have such a mind who has not taken God for his portion. How is it that Christians are continually forgetting this most plain and obvious truth? and yet wonder how it is that they cannot attain true peace of mind.

NOTES ON CHAP. IV.

Verse 1. Let a man so account of us] This is a continuation of the subject in the preceding chapter; and should not have been divided from it. The fourth chapter would have begun better at ver. 6. and the third should have ended with the fifth verse.

As of the ministers of Christ] ὡς ὑποκόμους Χριστοῦ. The word υποκομος, means an under-rower; or one who in the Tyrieme, Quadrieme, or Quinquereme galleys, rowed in one of the undermost benches: but it means also, as used by the Greek writers, any inferior officer or assistant. By the term here, the apostle shows the Corinthians, that, far from being heads and chiefs, he and his fellow-apostles considered themselves only as inferior officers, employed under Christ; from whom alone they received their appointment, their work, and their recompense.

Stewards of the mysteries of God] καὶ ὡς οἰκονομοὺς μυστηρίων Θεοῦ: economists of the Divine mysteries. See the explanation of the word steward in the note on Matt. xxiv. 45. Luke viii. 3. and xii. 42.

The steward, or oikonomos, was the master's deputy in regulating the concerns of the family, providing food for the household, seeing it served out at the proper times and seasons, and in proper quantities. He received all the cash, expended what was necessary for the support of the family, and kept exact accounts, which he was obliged at certain times to lay before the master. The mysteries, the doctrines of God relative to the salvation of the world, by the passion and death of Christ, and the inspiration, illumination, and purification of the soul by the Spirit of Christ, constituted a principal part of the divine treasure entrusted to the hands of the stewards by their heavenly Master; as the food that was to be dispensed at proper times, seasons, and in proper proportions, to the children and domestics of the church, which is the house of God.

Verse 3. It is a very small thing that I should be judged of you] Those who preferred Apollos or Kephas, before St. Paul, would of course give their reasons for this preference; and these might, in many instances, be very unfavourable to his character as a man, a Christian, or an apostle; of this he was regardless, as he sought

Or of man's judgment] H' iro avpawtms iμapas, literally, or of man's day; but avpawtms iμapas, signifies any day set apart by a judge or magistrate, to try a man on. This is the meaning of iμaπa, Psal. xxxvii. 13. The Lord shall laugh at him, for he seeth that his DAY, i iμaπa avrw, his judgment is coming. Malac. iii. 17.
And they shall be mine in the DAY, us iμaπa, in the judgment, when I make up my jewels. It has the same meaning in 2 Pet. iii. 10. but the DAY, the judgment of the Lord will come. The word avpawtms, (man's) signifies miserable, wretched, woful; so Jerem. xvii. 16. Neither have I desired, ovw tw yom enosh, the day of man, but very properly translated in our version, the woful day, God's DAYS, Job xxiv. 1. certainly signify God's JUDGMENTS. And the DAY of our Lord Jesus, in this epistle, chap. i.
8. and v. 5. signifies the day in which Christ will judge the world; or rather the judgment itself.

I judge not mine own self] I leave myself entirely to God, whose I am, and whom I serve.

Verse 4. For I know nothing by myself] Ovwi γac quawrw ovwida. I am not conscious that I am guilty of any evil; or have neglected to fulfil faithfully the duty of a steward of Jesus Christ. The import of the verb ovwida, is to be conscious of guilt: and ovwida has the same meaning: so in Horace, Nil conscire sibi; to know nothing to one's self: is the same as nulla pallere culpa, not to grow pale at being charged with a crime, through a consciousness of guilt.

Yet am I not hereby justified] I do not pretend to say that, though I am not conscious of any offence towards God, I must, therefore, be pronounced innocent; No—I leave those things to God; he shall pronounce in my favour; not I, myself. By these words, the apostle, in a very gentle, yet effectual manner, censures those rash and precipitate judgments which the Corinthians were in the habit of pronouncing on both men and things: a conduct, than which nothing is more reprehensible and dangerous.

Verse 5. Judge nothing before the time] God, the righteous Judge, will determine every thing shortly; it is His province alone, to search the heart, and bring to light the hidden things of darkness. If you be so pure and upright in your conduct; if what you have been doing in these divisions, &c. be right in his sight; then shall you have praise for the same: if, otherwise, yourselves are most concerned. Some refer the praise to St. Paul, and his companions:

then shall every one of us, apostles, have praise of God.

Verse 6. These things] Which I have written, chap. iii. 5, &c.

I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos] I have written as if myself and Apollos were the authors of the sects which now prevail among you; although others, without either our consent or knowledge, have proclaimed us heads of parties. Bishop Pearce paraphrases the verse thus: "I have made use of my own and Apollos' name, in my arguments against your divisions, because I would spare to name those teachers among you who are guilty of making and heading parties: and because I would have you, by our example, not to value them above what I have said of teachers in general, in this epistle: so that none of you ought to be puffed up for one against another." Doubtless, there were persons at Corinth who, taking advantage of this spirit of innovation among that people, set themselves up also for teachers; and endeavoured to draw disciples after them: And, perhaps, some even of these were more valued by the fickle multitude, than the very apostles, by whom they had been brought out of heathenish darkness into the marvellous light of the Gospel. I have already supposed it possible that Diotrephes was one of the ring-leaders in these schisms at Corinth. See on chap. i. 14.

Verse 7. For who maketh thee to differ] It is likely that the apostle is here addressing himself to some one of those puffed up teachers, who was glorying in his gifts, and in the knowledge he had of the Gospel, &c. As if he had said. If thou hast all that knowledge which thou professest to have, didst thou not receive it from myself, or some other of my fellow-helpers; who first preached the Gospel at Corinth? God never spoke to thee, to make thee an apostle.
Hast thou a particle of light that thou hast not received from our preaching? Why then dost thou glory, boast, and exult, as if God had first spoken by thee, and not by us?

A. M. 4060. from another? and what
 A. D. 56. hast thou that thou didst not
 A. U. C. 809. receive? now, if thou didst An. Imp. Nerois Cæs. 3. receive it, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it?
 8 Now ye are full, now ye are you.

 Ch. 15. 30, 31. 2 Cor. 4. 11. & 6. 9.—• Heb. 10. 33.

This is the most likely meaning of this verse; and a meaning that is suitable to the whole of the context. It has been applied in a more general sense by religious people: and the doctrine they build on it, is true in itself, though it does not appear to me to be any part of the apostle's meaning, in this place. The doctrine I refer to is this: God is the foundation of all good; no man possesses any good but what he has derived from God. If any man possess that grace which saves him from scandalous enormities, let him consider that he has received it as a mere free gift from God's mercy. Let him not despise his neighbour who has it not; there was a time when he himself did not possess it; and a time may come when the man, whom he now affects to despise, and on whose conduct he is unmerciful and severe, may receive it; and probably may make a more evangelical use of it than he is now doing. This caution is necessary to many religious people, who imagine that they have been eternal objects of God's favour; and that others have been eternal objects of his hate, for no reason that they can show for either the one or the other. He can have little acquaintance with his own heart, who is not aware of the possibility of pride lurking under the exclamation, Why me! when comparing his own gracious state, with the unregenerate state of another.

Verse 8. Now ye] Corinthians, are full of secular wisdom; now ye are rich, both in wealth and spiritual gifts, chap. xiv. 26. Ye have reigned as kings, flourishing in the enjoyment of these things, in all tranquillity and honour; without any want of us; and I would to God ye did reign, in deed, and not in conceit only, that we also, poor, persecuted, and despised apostles, might reign with you.—Whitby.

Though this paraphrase appears natural, yet I am of opinion that the apostle here intends a strong irony; and one, which, when taken in conjunction with what he had said before, must have stung them to the heart. It is not an unusual thing for many people to forget, if not despise, the men by whom they were brought to the knowledge of the truth; and take up with others, to whom, in the things of God, they owe nothing. Reader, is this thy case?

Verse 9. God hath set forth us the apostles last] This whole passage is well explained by Dr. Whitby. "Here the apostle seems to allude to

A. M. 4060. 9 For I think that God hath the Roman spectacles, της των θηριομαχων, και μονομαχιας ανδρουν, that of the Bestiarum and the gladiators, where, in the morning, men were brought upon the theatres to fight with wild beasts; and to them was allowed armour to defend themselves, and smite the beasts that assailed them: but in the meridian or noon-day spectacles, the gladiators were brought forth naked, and without any thing to defend themselves from the sword of the assailant; and he that then escaped was only kept for slaughter to another day, so that these men might well be called επιθαντοι, men appointed for death; and this being the last appearance on the theatre, for that day, they are said here to be set forth ωχαροι, the last. Of these two spectacles, Seneca speaks thus: Epist. vii. "In the morning, men are exposed to lions and bears: at mid-day, to their spectators; those that kill, are exposed to one another; the victor is detained for another slaughter: the conclusion of the fight is death. The former fighting, compared to this, was mercy; now, it is mere butchery; they have nothing to cover them, their whole body is exposed to every blow; and every stroke produces a wound, &c."

We are made a spectacle] Οτι θεατρον εσθησωμεν, we are exhibited on the theatre to the world; we are lawful booty to all mankind, and particularly to the men of the world; who have their portion in this life. Angels are astonished at our treatment; and so are the more considerate part of men. Who, at that time, would have coveted the apostolate?

Verse 10. We are fools for Christ's sake] Here he still carries on the allusion to the public spectacles among the Romans; where they were accustomed to hiss, hoot, mock, and variously insult the poor victims. To this, Philo alludes in his embassy to Caius, speaking of the treatment which the Jews received at Rome, ωσπερ γαρ η θεατρον κλωμοσυριγγόντων, καταμαρμαίνων, αμτρα χλωρίζονται. "For, as if exhibited upon a theatre, we are hissed, most outrageously hooted, and insulted beyond all bounds." Thus, says the apostle, we are fools on Christ's account; we walk in a conformity to his will, and we bear his cross: and did we walk according to the course of this world, or according to the man-pleasing conduct of some among you, we should have no such cross to bear.

 pressions are meant ironically; the apostles were neither fools, nor weak, nor contemptible: nor were the Corinthians, morally speaking, wise, and strong, and honourable. Change the persons, and then the epithets will perfectly apply.

Verse 11. We both hunger and thirst, &c.] Who would then have been an apostle of Christ, even with all its spiritual honours and glories, who had not a soul filled with love both to God and man? and the fullest conviction of the reality of the doctrine he preached, and of that spiritual world in which alone he could expect rest? See the Introduction, sect. vi.

Have no certain dwelling.] We are mere itinerant preachers; and when we set out in the morning, know not where, or whether we shall or not, get a night's lodging.

Verse 12. Working with our own hands] They were obliged to labour, in order to supply themselves with the necessaries of life while preaching the Gospel to others. This, no doubt, was the case in every place where no church had been as yet formed: afterwards, the people of God supplied their ministers, according to their power, with food and raiment.

Being reviled, we bless, &c.] What a most amiable picture does this exhibit of the power of the grace of Christ! Man is naturally a proud creature; and his pride prompts him always to avenge himself in whatever manner he can; and repay insult with insult. It is only the grace of Christ that can make a man patient in bearing injuries, and to render blessing for cursing; beneficence for malevolence, &c. The apostles suffered all indignities for Christ's sake; for it was on his account, that they were exposed to persecutions, &c.

Verse 13. Being defamed] Βλασφημῶμενοι, being blasphemed. I have already remarked that βλασφημῶν, signifies to speak injuriously, and may have reference either to God or to man.
 God is blasphemed when his attributes, doctrines, providence, or grace, are treated con-temptuously; or any thing said of Him that is contrary to his holiness, justice, goodness, or truth. Man is blasphemed, when any thing injurious is spoken of his person, character, conduct, &c. Blaspheming against men, is any thing by which they are injured in their persons, characters, or property.

We are made as the filth of the earth, the off-scouring of all things] The Greek word which we render filth, is ἀπκαθάματα, a purgation, or lustrative sacrifice; that which we translate offscouring, is ἀπιψίμα, a redemption sacrifice.

 To understand the full force of these words, as applied by the apostle in this place, we must observe that he alludes to certain customs among the heathens; who, in the time of some public calamity, chose out some unhappy men of the most abject and despicable character, to be a public expiation for them; these they maintained a whole year at the public expense; and then they led them out, crowned with flowers, as was customary in sacrifices: and, having heaped all the curses of the country upon their heads, and whipped them seven times, they burned them alive, and afterwards their ashes were thrown into the sea, while the people said these words, ἀπιψίμα ἡμῶν γίνου; be thou our propitiation. Sometimes the person thus chosen, was thrown into the sea, as a sacrifice to Neptu-tune; the people saying the words as before.
 Hence Origen says that our Lord, in giving up himself as a propitiation for our sins, was much more than his apostles; ἀπκαθάματα τῷ κόσμῳ, πάντων ἀπιψίμα, the lustration of the world, and the peculiar sacrifice for all men. The apostle, therefore, means that he and his fellows were treated like those wretched beings who were judged to be fit for nothing, but to be expiatory victims to the infernal gods, for the safety and redemption of others. Our words, filth and off-scouring, convey no legitimate sense of the original. See several useful remarks upon these terms, in Pearce, Whitby, and Parkhurst.

Verse 14. I write not these things to shame you] It is not by way of finding fault with you, for not providing me with the necessaries of life, that I write thus: but I do it to warn you to act differently for the time to come; and be not so ready to be drawn aside by every pretender to apostleship, to the neglect of those, to whom, under God, you owe your salvation.

Verse 15. For though ye have ten thousand instructors] Μυρίους παιδαγωγῶν, myriads of leaders, that is, an indefinite multitude; for so the word is often used. The παιδαγωγῶν, from which we have our word pedagogue, which we improperly apply to a schoolmaster, was among the Greeks, the person or servant who attended a child, had the general care of him, and who led him to school for the purpose of being instructed by the ιδασκαλος, or teacher. It seems there were many at Corinth who offered their services to instruct this people, and who were not well affected towards the apostle.

Not many fathers] Many offer to instruct you, who have no parental feeling for you; and how can they? you are not their spiritual children; you stand in this relation to me alone: for in Christ Jesus, by the power and unction of his Spirit, I have begotten you, I was the means of bringing you into a state of salvation, so that you have been born again; ye are my children alone in the Gospel. Schoetgen produces a good illustration of this from Shemoth Rabba, sect. 46. fol. 140. "A girl who had lost her parents, was educated by a guardian who was a good and faithful man, and took great care of her: when she was grown up, he purposed to bestow her in marriage: the scribe came, and beginning to write the contract, said, What is thy name? The maid answered, N. The scribe proceeded, What is the name of thy father? The maid was silent. Her guardian said, Why art thou silent? The maid replied, Because I know no other father but thee. For he who educates a child well, is more properly the father, than he who begot it." This is the same kind of sentiment which I have already quoted from Terence, Rom. xvi. 13.

Naturā tu illi pater es; consiliū ego.

ADELPHI. Act. I. scene 2. ver. 47.

Thou art his father by nature; I, by instruction.

Verse 16. Wherefore, I beseech you, be ye followers of me] It should rather be translated, Be ye imitators of me; μιμητας, from which we have our word mimic; which, though now used only in a bad or ludicrous sense, simply signifies an imitator of another person, whether in speech, manner, habit, or otherwise. As children should imitate their parents in preference to all others: he calls on them to imitate him, as he claims them for his children. He lived for God and eternity, seeking not his own glory, emolument, or ease: those sowers of sedition among them were actuated by different motives. Here, then, the apostle compares himself with them; follow and imitate me, as I follow and imitate Christ; do not imitate them who, from their worldly pursuits, show themselves to be actuated with a worldly spirit.

Verse 17. For this cause] That you imitate me, and know in what this consists:

I sent unto you Timotheus] The same person to whom he wrote the two epistles that are still extant under his name: and whom he calls here his beloved son, one of his most intimate disciples; and whom he had been the means of bringing to God through Christ.

My ways which be in Christ] This person will also inform you the manner in which I regulate all the churches; and show to you that what I require of you, is no other than what I require of all the churches of Christ which I have formed; as I follow the same plan of discipline in every place. See the Introduction, sect. iii.

Verse 18. Some are puffed up] Some of your teachers act with great haughtiness, imagining themselves to be safe, because they suppose that I shall not revisit Corinth.

Verse 19. But I will come to you shortly] God being my helper, I fully purpose to visit you: and then I shall put these proud men to the proof, not of their speech, eloquence, or pretensions to great knowledge and influence, but of their power, the authority they profess to have from God, and the evidences of that authority in the works they have performed. See the Introduction, sect. xi.

Verse 20. For the kingdom of God] The religion of the Lord Jesus is not in word, in human eloquence, excellence of speech, or even in doctrines; but in power, ω δυναμει, in the mighty energy of the Holy Spirit; enlightening, quickening, converting, and sanctifying believers: and all his genuine apostles are enabled, on all necessary occasions, to demonstrate the truth of their calling by miracles; for this the original word often means.

Verse 21. Shall I come unto you with a rod, or in love] Here he alludes to the case of the teacher and father, mentioned ver. 15. Shall I come to you with the authority of a teacher, and use the rod of discipline? or shall I come in the tenderness of a father, and entreat you to do what I have authority to enforce? Among the Jews, those who did not amend after being faithfully admonished, were whipped, either publicly or privately, in the synagogue. If this, they did not amend, they were liable to be stoned. We see from the case of Ananias and Sapphira, Elymas the sorcerer, Hymenæus and Alexander, &c. that the apostles had sometimes the power to inflict the most awful punishments on transgressors. The Corinthians must have known this, and consequently have dreaded a visit from him in his apostolic authority. That there were many irregularities in this church, which required both the presence and authority of the apostle, we shall see in the subsequent chapters.

1. In the preceding chapter we find the ministers of God compared to stewards, of whom the strictest fidelity is required. (1.) Fidelity to God, in publishing his truth with zeal, defending it with courage, and recommending it with prudence. (2.) Fidelity to CHRIST, whose representatives they are, in honestly and fully recommending his grace and salvation, on the ground of his passion and death; and preaching his maxims in all their force and purity. (3.) Fidelity to the СВЯТАЯ, in taking heed to keep up a godly discipline, admitting none into it but those who have abandoned their sins; and permitting none to continue in it, that do not continue to adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour. (4.) Fidelity to their own MINISTRY, walking so as to bring no blame on the Gospel: avoiding the extremes of indolent tenderness on one hand, and austere severity on the other. Considering the flock, not as their flock, but the flock of Jesus Christ; watching, ruling, and feeding it according to the order of their Divine Master.

2. A minister of God should act with great caution: every man, properly speaking, is placed between the secret judgment of God, and the public censure of men. He should do nothing rashly, that he may not justly incur the censure of men; and he should do nothing but in the loving fear of God, that he may not incur the censure of his Maker. The man who scarcely ever allows himself to be wrong, is one of whom it may be safely said, he is seldom right. It is possible for a man to mistake his own will for the will of God; and his own obstinacy, for inflexible adherence to his duty. With such persons, it is dangerous to have any commerce.

Reader, pray to God to save thee from an inflated mind.

3. Zeal for God's truth is essentially necessary for every minister; and prudence is not less so. They should be wisely tempered together; but this is not always the case. Zeal, without prudence, is like a flambeau in the hands of a blind man; it may enlighten and warm, but it may also destroy the spiritual building. Human prudence should be avoided as well as intemperate zeal: this kind of prudence consists in a man's being careful not to bring himself into trouble; and not to hazard his reputation, credit, interest, or fortune, in the performance of his duty. Evangelical wisdom consists in our suffering and losing all things, rather than be wanting in the discharge of our obligations.

4. From St. Paul's account of himself, we find him often suffering the severest hardships in the prosecution of his duty. He had for his patrimony, hunger, thirst, nakedness, stripes, &c. and wandering about testifying the Gospel of the grace of God, without even a collage that he could claim as his own. Let those who dwell in their elegant houses, who profess to be apostolic in their order, and evangelic in their doctrines, think of this. In their state of affluence they should have extraordinary degrees of zeal, humility, meekness, and charity, to recommend them to our notice as apostolical men. If God, in the course of his providence, has saved them from an apostle's hardships, let them devote their lives to the service of that church in which they have their emoluments; and labour incessantly to build it up on its most holy faith. Let them not be masters to govern with rigour and imperiousness; but tender fathers, who feel every member in the church as their own child, and labour to feed the heavenly family with the mysteries of God, of which they are stewards.

5. And while the people require much of their spiritual pastors, these pastors have equal right to require much of their people. The obligation is not all on one side; those who watch for our souls have a right not only to their own support, but to our reverence and confidence. Those who despise their ecclesiastical rulers, will soon despise the church of Christ itself, neglect its ordinances, lose sight of its doctrines, and at last neglect their own salvation.

CHAPTER V.

Account of the incestuous person, or of him who had married his father's wife, 1. The apostle reproves the Corinthians for their carelessness in this matter; and orders them to excommunicate the transgressor, 2—5. They are reprehended for their glorying, while such scandals were among them, 6. They must purge out the old leaven, that they may properly celebrate the Christian Pass-over, 7—9. They must not associate with any who, professing the Christian religion, was guilty of any scandalous vice; and must put away from them every evil person, 10—13.

NOTES ON CHAP. V.

Verse 1. There is fornication among you] The word porneia, which we translate fornication in this place, must be understood in its utmost latitude of meaning, as implying all kinds of impurity; for, that the Corinthians were notoriously guilty of every species of irregularity and debauch, we have already seen: and it is not likely that, in speaking on this subject, in reference to a people so very notorious, he would refer to one only species of impurity, and that not the most flagitious.

That one should have his father's wife] Commentators and critics have found great difficulties in this statement. One part of the case is sufficiently clear, that a man who professed Christianity, had illegal connexions with his father's wife: but the principal question is, was his father alive or dead? Most think that the father was alive, and imagine that to this the apostle refers, 2 Cor. vii. 12. where, speaking of the person who did the wrong, he introduces also him who had suffered the wrong; which must mean the father; and the father then alive. After all that has been said on this subject, I think it most natural to conclude that the person in question had married the wife of his deceased father; not his own mother, but step-mother, then widow.

This was a crime which the text says, was not so much as named among the Gentiles: the apostle must only mean that it was not credited by them; for it certainly did often occur: but by their best writers who notice it, it was branded as superlatively infamous. Cicero styles it, scelus incredibile et inauditum; an incredible and unheard of wickedness; but it was heard of and practised: and there are several stories of this kind in heathen authors; but they reprobate, not commend it. The word ονομαζεσθαι, named, is wanted in almost every MS. and version of importance, and certainly makes no part of the text. The words should be read, and such fornication as is not amongst the Gentiles—i. e. not allowed. Some think that this woman might have been a proselyte to the Jewish religion from heathenism: and the Rabbins taught that proselytism annulled all former relationship, and that a woman was at liberty, in such case, to depart from an unbelieving husband, and to marry even with a believing son—i. e. of her husband by some former wife.

Verse 2. Ye are puffed up] Ye are full of strife and contention, relative to your parties and favourite teachers; and neglect the discipline of the church. Had you considered the greatness of this crime, ye would have rather mourned, and have put away this flagrant transgressor from among you.

Taken away from among you] ἵνα ἐκδοθῆτε ἐκ μέσου υμῶν. This is supposed by some to refer to the punishment of death; by others to excommunication. The Christian church was, at this time, too young to have those forms of excommunication which were practised in succeeding centuries. Probably no more is meant than a simple disowning of the person, accompanied with the refusal to admit him to the sacred ordinances; or to have any intercourse or connexion with him.

Verse 3. Absent in body, but present in spirit] Perhaps St. Paul refers to the gift of the discernment of spirits, which it is very likely the apostles in general possessed on extraordinary occasions. He had already seen this matter so clearly, that he had determined on that sort of punishment which should be inflicted for this crime.

Verse 4. In the name of our Lord Jesus] Who is the Head of the church; and under whose authority every act is to be performed.

And my spirit] My apostolical authority derived from Him; with the power, οὐ δύναμις, with the miraculous energy of the Lord Jesus, which is to inflict the punishment that you pronounce:

Verse 5. To deliver such an one unto Satan] There is no evidence that delivering to Satan was any form of excommunication known either among the Jews or the Christians. Lightfoot, Selden, and Schoetgen, who have searched all the Jewish records, have found nothing that answers to this: it was a species of punishment administered in extraordinary cases, in which the body and the mind of an incorrigible transgressor were delivered by the authority of God, into the power of Satan, to be tortured with diseases and terrors, as a warning to all: but, while the body and mind were thus tormented, the immortal spirit was under the influence of the Divine mercy; and the affliction, in all probability, was in general only for a season; though sometimes it was evidently unto death, as the destruction of the flesh seems to imply. But the soul found mercy at the hand of God; for, such a most extraordinary interference of God's power and justice, and of Satan's influence, could not fail to bring the person to a state of the deepest humiliation and contrition: and thus, while the flesh was destroyed, the spirit was saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. No such power as this now remains in the church of God; none such should be assumed, the pretensions to it are as wicked as they are vain. It was the same power by which Ananias and Sapphira were struck dead; and Elymas, the sorcerer, struck blind. Apostles, alone, were entrusted with it.

Verse 6. Your glorying is not good] You are triumphing in your superior knowledge, and busily employed in setting up and supporting your respective teachers, while the church is left under the most scandalous corruptions; corruptions which threaten its very existence, if not purged away.

Know ye not] With all your boasted wisdom, do you not know and acknowledge the truth of a common maxim, a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? If this leaven, the incestuous person, be permitted to remain among you; if his conduct be not exposed by the most formidable censure, the flood-gates of impurity will be opened on the church, and the whole state of Christianity ruined in Corinth.

Verse 7. Purge out therefore the old leaven] As it is the custom of the Jews, previously to the pass-over, to search their houses, in the most diligent manner, for the old leaven, and throw it out, sweeping every part clean; so act with this incestuous person. I have already shown with what care the Jews purged their houses from all leaven, previously to the pass-over. See the note on Exod. xii. 8—19. and on the term pass-over, and Christ as represented by this ancient Jewish sacrifice, see on Exod. xii. 27. and my Discourse on the Nature and Design of the Eucharist.

Verse 8. Therefore let us keep the feast] It is very likely that the time of the pass-over was now approaching; when the church of Christ would be called to extraordinary acts of devotion, in commemorating the passion, death, and resurrection of Christ; and of this circumstance the apostle takes advantage, in his exhortation to the Corinthians. See the Introduction, sect. xii.

Not with old leaven] Under the Christian dispensation, we must be saved, equally from Judaism, Heathenism, and from sin of every kind; malice and wickedness must be destroyed: and sincerity and truth, inward purity and outward holiness, take their place.

The apostle refers here not more to wicked principles than to wicked men: let us keep the feast, not with the old leaven, the impure principles which actuated you while in your heathen state; neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness, κακίας και πορνικίας, wickedness, radical depravity, producing unrighteousness in the life; nor with the persons who are thus influenced, and thus act; but with the unleavened bread, ἀλλ' εν ἀζύμοις, but with upright and godly men, who have sincerity, αληθινούς, such purity of affections and conduct that even the light of God, shining upon them, discovers no flaw; and truth, who have received the testimony of God, and who are inwardly, as well as outwardly, what they profess to be.

The word πορνικίας, which we translate wickedness, is so very like to πορνείας, fornication, that some very ancient MSS. have the latter reading instead of the former; which, indeed, seems most natural in this place; as κακίας, which we translate malice, includes every thing that is implied in πορνικίας, wickedness; whereas, πορνείας, as being the subject in question; see ver. 1. would come more pointedly in here, Not with wickedness and fornication, or rather not with wicked men and fornicators: but I do not contend for this reading.

Verse 9. I wrote unto you in an epistle] The wisest, and best skilled in Biblical criticism, agree that the apostle does not refer to any other epistle than this: and that he speaks here of some general directions which he had given in the foregoing part of it; but which he had now, in some measure, changed and greatly strengthened, as we see from ver. 11. The words ἐγράψα εν τῇ ἐπιστολῃ, may be translated, I HAD written to you in THIS EPISTLE; for there are many instances in the New Testament, where the aorist, which is here used, and which is a sort of indefinite tense, is used for the perfect, and the plusquam perfect. Dr. Whitby produces several proofs of this, and contends that the conclusion drawn by some, viz. that it refers to some epistle that is lost, is not legitimately drawn from any premises which either this text or antiquity affords. The principal evidence against this is 2 Cor. vii. 8. where ἡ τῆς ἐπιστολῆς, the same words as above, appear to refer to this first epistle. Possibly the apostle may refer to an epistle which he had written though not sent; for, on receiving further information from Stephanus, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, relative to the state of the Corinthian church, he suppressed that, and wrote this, in which he considers the subject much more at large. See Dr. Lightfoot.

[Not to company with fornicators] With which, as we have already seen, Corinth abounded. It was not only the grand sin, but staple of the place.

Verse 10. For then must ye needs go out of the world] What an awful picture of the general corruption of manners does this exhibit! The Christians at Corinth could not transact the ordinary affairs of life with any others than with fornicators, covetous persons, extortioners, railers, drunkards, and idolaters because there were none others in the place! How necessary was Christianity in that city!

Verse 11. But now I have written] I not only write this, but I add more, that if any one who is called a brother, i. e. professes the Christian religion, be a fornicator, covetous, idolater, railer, drunkard, or extortioner; not even to eat with such; have no communication with such an one, in things either sacred or civil. You may transact your worldly concerns with a person that knows not God, and makes no profession of Christianity, whatever his moral character may be; but ye must not even thus far acknowledge a man professing Christianity, who is scandalous in his conduct. Let him have this extra mark of your abhorrence of all sin; and let the world see that the church of God does not tolerate iniquity.

Verse 12. For, what have I to do to judge them also that are without] The term without, χωρις, signifies those who were not members of the church, and in this sense its correspondent term חיצוניים ha-chitsonim, those that are without, is generally understood in the Jewish writers, where it frequently occurs. The word καὶ, also, which greatly disturbs the sense here, is wanting in ABCFG, and several others, with the Syriac, or a drunkard, or an extortioner; with such an one, ^e no not to eat.

12 For what have I to do not ye judge ^g them that are within?

13 But them that are without God judgeth. Therefore ^h put away from Coptic, Slavonic, Vulgate, and the Itala; together with several of the Fathers. The sentence, I think, with the omission of καὶ, also, should stand thus: Does it belong to me to pass sentence on those which are without, which are not members of the church? By no means, (οὐχι.) Pass ye sentence on them which are within, which are members of the church—Those which are without, which are not members of the church, God will pass sentence on, in that way in which he generally deals with the heathen world—But put ye away the evil from among yourselves. This is most evidently the apostle's meaning, and renders all comments unnecessary. In the last clause there appears to be an allusion to Deut. xvii. 7. where the like directions are given to the congregation of Israel, relative to a person found guilty of idolatry. Thou shalt put away the evil from among you—where the Version of the Septuagint is almost the same as that of the apostle; καὶ ἐξαρῖς τῶν πορνῶν ἐξ ὑμῶν αὐτοῦ.

There are several important subjects in this chapter which intimately concern the Christian church in general.

1. If evil be tolerated in religious societies, the work of God cannot prosper there. If one scandal appear, it should be the cause of general humiliation and mourning to the followers of God where it occurs; because the soul of a brother is on the road to perdition: the cause of God so far betrayed and injured; and Christ re-crucified in the house of his friends. Pity should fill every heart towards the transgressor, and prayer for the backslider occupy all the members of the church.

2. Discipline must be exercised in the Christian church; without this, it will soon differ but little from the wilderness of this world. But what judgment, prudence, piety, and caution, are requisite in the execution of this most important branch of a minister's duty! he may be too easy and tender, and permit the gangrene to remain till the flock be infected with it. Or he may be rigid and severe, and destroy parts that are vital, while only professing to take away what is vitiated. A backslider is one who once knew less or more of the salvation of God. Hear what God says concerning such, Turn, ye backsliders, for I am married unto you. See how unwilling He is to give them up! He suffers long, and is kind; do thou likewise; and when thou art obliged to out of the offender from the church of Christ, follow him still with thy best advice and heartiest prayers.

3. A soul cut off from the flock of God is in an awful state! his outward defence is departed from him; and being no longer accountable to any for his conduct, he generally plunges into unprecedented depths of iniquity; and the last state of that man becomes worse than the first. Reader, art thou without the pale of God's church? remember it is here written, them that are without, God judgeth, ver. 13.

4. Christians who wish to retain the spirituality of their religion, should be very careful how they mingle with the world. He who is pleased with the company of ungodly men, no matter howsoever witty or learned, is either himself one with them, or is drinking into their spirit. It is impossible to associate with such by choice, without receiving a portion of their contagion. A man may be amused or delighted with such people, but he will return even from the festival of wit, with a lean soul. Howsoever contiguous they may be, yet the church and the world are separated by an impassable gulf.

5. If all the fornicators, adulterers, drunkards, extortioners, and covetous persons which bear the Christian name, were to be publicly excommunicated from the Christian church, how many, and how awful would the examples be! If, however, the discipline of the visible church be so lax, that such characters are tolerated in it, they should consider that this is no passport to heaven. In the sight of God they are not members of his church: their citizenship is not in heaven, and therefore they have no right to expect the heavenly inheritance. It is not under names, creeds, or professions, that men shall be saved at the last day—those alone who were holy; who were here conformed to the image of Christ, shall inherit the kingdom of God. Those who expect it in any other way, or on any other account, will be sadly deceived.

CHAPTER VI.

The Corinthians are reproved for their litigious disposition; brother going to law with brother, and that before the heathen, 1—6. They should suffer wrong, rather than do any, 7, 8. No unrighteous person can enter into the glory of God, 9, 10. Some of the Corinthians had been grievous sinners, but God had saved them, 11. Many things may be lawful, which are not at all times expedient, 12. Meats are for the belly, and the belly for meats; but the body is not for uncleanness, 13. Christ's resurrection a pledge of ours, 14. The bodies of Christians are members of Christ, and must not be defiled, 15—17. He that commits fornication sins against his own body, 18. NOTES ON CHAP. VI.

Verse 1. Dare any of you, &c.] From the many things that are here reprehended by the apostle, we learn that the Christian church at Corinth, was in a state of great imperfection; notwithstanding there were very many eminent characters among them. Divided as they were among themselves, there was no one person who possessed any public authority to settle differences between man and man; therefore, as one party would not submit to the decisions of another, they were obliged to carry their contentions before heathen magistrates; and probably these very subjects of litigation arose out of their ecclesiastical divisions. The thing, and this issue of it, the apostle strongly reprehends.

Before the unjust, and not before the saints?] The heathen judges were termed ἀδίκους, from their presumed righteousness in the administration of justice: here the apostle, by a paronomasia, calls them ἀδίκαι, unrighteous persons— and it is very likely that at Corinth, where such corruption of manners reigned, there was a great perversion of public justice: and it is not to be supposed that matters relative to the Christians, were fairly decided. The Christians the apostle terms ἅγιοι, saints, which they were all, by profession; and doubtless many were so in spirit and in truth.

Verse 2. The saints shall judge the world] Nothing can be more evident than that the writers of the New Testament often use κόσμος, the world, to signify the Jewish people; and sometimes the Roman empire, and the Jewish state; and in the former sense it is often used by our Lord. When, says he, the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory, then shall ye sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, Matt. xix. 28. It is supposed that he refers to the same subject as that mentioned here, the saints judging the world; and that St. Paul has his words in view, in what he says here to the Corinthians. By judging the twelve tribes of Israel, some have imagined, that having authority in the church, is merely intended; but Dr. Lightfoot contends that the words refer to the coming of our Lord to execute judgment on the Jews, and to destroy their state; and that the doctrine of the apostles, not themselves, was to judge and condemn that most disobedient people. The place before us is generally understood to imply that the redeemed of the Lord shall be, on the great day, assessors with him in judgment; and shall give their award in the determinations of his justice. On reviewing this subject, I am fully of opinion that this cannot be the meaning of the words; and that no such assessors, as is contended for, ever will take place; and that the interpretation is clogged with a multitude of absurdities.

1. The saints themselves are to appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, and shall be judged by him, after which they shall reign with him; but it is never said in Scripture that they shall judge with him.

2. It would be absurd to suppose that thrones should be erected, for the purpose of saints sitting on them to give their approbation in the condemnation of the wicked; of what use can such approbation be? is it necessary to the validity of Christ's decision? and will not even the damned themselves, without this, acknowledge the justice of their doom? I therefore think, with Dr. Lightfoot, that these words of the apostle refer to the prediction of Daniel, chap. vii. 18, 27, and such like prophecies, where the kingdoms of the earth are promised to the saints of the Most High; that is, that a time shall come when Christianity shall so far prevail, that the civil government of the world shall be administered by Christians, which, at that time, was administered by Heathens. And this is even now true of all those parts of the earth, which may be considered of the greatest political consequence. They profess Christianity, and the kings and other governors are Christians in this general sense of the term.

Verse 3. Know ye not that we shall judge angels? Dr. Lightfoot observes that "the apostle does not say here, as he said before, the saints shall judge angels; but we shall judge them. By angels all confess that demons are intended; but certainly all saints, according to the latitude with which that word is understood; i. e. all who profess Christianity, shall not judge angels. Nor is this judging of angels to be understood of the last day; but the apostle speaks of the ministers of the Gospel, himself and others, who, by the preaching of the Gospel, through the power of Christ, should spoil the devils of their oracles and their idols: should deprive them of their worship: should drive them out of their seats, and strip them of their dominion. Thus would God subdue the whole world under the Christian power, so that Christian magistrates should judge men, and Christian ministers judge devils."

Verse 4. Things pertaining to this life] They could examine all civil cases among themselves, which they were permitted to determine without any hindrance from the heathen governments under which they lived.

Who are least esteemed in the church] τοις ἐσθρατατοις, those who were in the lowest order of Judges; for the apostle may refer here to the order in the Jewish benches, as Dr. Lightfoot conjectures; of which there were five, viz.

1. The great Sanhedrin, consisting of 72 elders, which presided in Jerusalem.

2. The little Sanhedrin of 25, in large cities, out of Jerusalem.

3. The bench of Three in every synagogue.

4. The Authorized, or authentic Bench.

5. The bench not authorized, ἑσθρατατος. This latter Bench was so called, because it received not its authority immediately from the Sanhedrin; but was chosen by the parties between whom the controversy depended. The apostle certainly does not mean persons of no repute; but such as these arbitrators, who were chosen for the purpose of settling private differences, and preventing them from going before the regular magistrates. The following verse makes it pretty evident that the apostle refers to this lower kind of tribunal; and hence he says;

Verse 5. Is it so, that there is not a wise man among you? Have you none among yourselves that can be arbitrators of the differences which arise, that you go to the heathen tribunals!

Verse 6. Brother goeth to law with brother] One Christian sues another at law! This is almost as great a scandal as can exist in a Christian society. Those in a religious community who will not submit to a proper arbitration, made by persons among themselves, should be expelled from the church of God.

Verse 7. There is utterly a fault among you] There is a most manifest defect among you—1. Of peaceableness—2. Of brotherly love—3. Of mutual confidence, and, 4. Of reverence for God, and concern for the honour of his cause.

dressing yourselves, which must injure your own peace, and greatly dishonour the cause of God.

Verse 8. Nay, ye do wrong] Far from suffering, ye are the aggressors, and defraud your pious, long-suffering brethren, who submit to this wrong, rather than take those methods of redressing their grievances which the spirit of Christianity forbids. Probably the apostle refers to him who had taken his father's wife.

Verse 9. The unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom] The unrighteous, adunoi, those who act contrary to right; cannot inherit, for the inheritance is by right. He who is not a child of God, has no right to the family inheritance; for that inheritance is for the children. If children, then heirs, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ, Gal. iv. 5, 6. There are ten classes of transgressors which the apostle excludes from the kingdom of God: and any man who is guilty of any one of the evils mentioned above, is thereby excluded from this kingdom, whether it imply the church of Christ here below, or the state of glory hereafter.

Several of the evils here enumerated will not bear to be particularly explained: they are, however, sufficiently plain of themselves, and show us what abominations were commonly practised among the Corinthians.

Verse 11. And such were some of you] It was not with the prospect of collecting saints, that the apostles went about preaching the Gospel of the kingdom. None but sinners were to be found over the face of the earth; they preached, that sinners might be converted unto God, made saints, and constituted into a church; and this was the effect, as well as the object of their preaching.

But ye are washed] Several suppose that the order in which the operations of the grace of God take place in the soul, is here inverted; but I am of a different mind. Every thing will appear here in its order, when we understand the terms used by the apostle.

Ye are washed, arnouarabte; ye have been baptized into the Christian faith: and ye have promised in this baptism to put off all filthiness of the flesh and spirit; and the washing of your bodies is emblematical of the purification of your souls.

10 Nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God.

11 And such were some of you: * but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God.

12 * All things are lawful unto me, but all things are not * expedient: all things are lawful for me, but I

Ye are sanctified] Hylasabris; from a privative, and ya, the earth; ye are separated from earthly things, to be connected with spiritual. Ye are separated from time, to be connected with eternity. Ye are separated from idols, to be joined to the living God. Separation from common, earthly, or sinful uses, to be wholly employed in the service of the true God, is the ideal meaning of this word, both in the Old and New Testaments. It was in consequence of their being separated from the world that they became a church of God. Ye were formerly workers of iniquity, and associated with workers of iniquity; but now ye are separated from them, and united together to work out your salvation with fear and trembling before God.

Ye are justified] Edianabris: Ye have been brought into a state of favour with God, your sins having been blotted out through Christ Jesus; the Spirit of God witnessing the same to your conscience, and carrying on, by his energy, the great work of regeneration in your hearts. The process here is plain and simple:—1. Paul and his brother-apostles preached the Gospel at Corinth, and besought the people to turn from darkness to light: from idle vanities to the living God: and to believe in the Lord Jesus for the remission of sins. 2. The people who heard were convinced of the divine truths delivered by the apostle: and flocked to baptism. 3. They were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, and thus took upon them the public profession of the Gospel. 4. Being now baptized into the Christian faith, they were separated from idols and idolaters, and became incorporated with the church of God. 5. As penitents they were led to the Lord Jesus, for justification; which they received through faith in his blood. 6. Being justified freely, having their sins forgiven, through the redemption that is in Jesus; they received the Spirit of God, to attest this glorious work of grace to their consciences; and thus became possessed of that principle of righteousness, that true leaven which was to leaven the whole lump; producing that universal holiness, without which none can see the Lord.

Verse 12. All things are lawful unto me] It is likely that some of the Corinthians had pleaded that the offence of the man who had his father's wife, as well as the eating of the things offered to idols, was not contrary to the law as it then stood. To this the apostle answers, though such a thing be lawful, yet the case of fornication, mentioned chap. v. 1. is not expedient, en expeditis, it is not agreeable to propriety, decency, order, and purity. It is contrary to the established usages of the best and most enlightened nations: and should not be tolerated in the church of Christ.

They might also be led to argue in favour of their eating things offered to idols, and attending idol feasts thus: that an idol was nothing in the world: and as food was provided by the bounty of God, a man might partake of it any where without defiling his conscience, or committing sin against the Creator: this excuse also the apostle refers to. All these things are lawful, taken up merely in the light that none of your laws is against the first; and that, on the ground that an idol is nothing in the world, there can be no reason against the last.

But I will not be brought under the power of any] Allowing that they are all lawful, or at least that there is no law against them, yet they are not expedient; there is no necessity for them; and some of them are abominable and forbidden by the law of God and nature, whether forbidden by your's or not: whilst others, such as eating meats offered to idols, which almost necessarily lead to bad moral consequences: and who, that is a Christian, would obey his appetite so far, as to do these things for the sake of gratification? A man is brought under the power of any thing which he cannot give up. He is the slave of that thing, whatsoever it be, which he cannot relinquish; and then, to him, it is sin.

Verses 13, Meats for the belly] I suppose that carne means the animal appetite, or propensity to food, &c. and we may conceive the apostle to reason thus: I acknowledge that God has provided different kinds of aliments for the appetite of man: and, among others, those which are generally offered to idols; and he has adapted the appetite to these aliments, and the aliments to the appetite; but God shall destroy both it and them; none of these is eternal; all these lower appetites and sensations will be destroyed by death, and have no existence in the resurrection body; and the earth and its productions shall be burnt up.

Now the body is not for fornication] Though God made an appetite, for food, and provided food for that appetite; yet he has not made the body for any uncleanness, nor indulgence in sensuality; but he has made it for Christ; and Christ was prepared to be a sacrifice for this body as well as for the soul, by taking our nature upon him; so that now, as human beings, we have an intimate relationship to the Lord: and our bodies are made not only for his service, but to be his temples.

Verses 14. And God hath both raised up the Lord] He has raised up the human nature of Christ from the grave, as a pledge of our resurrection; and will also raise us up by his own power, that we may dwell with him in glory for ever.

Verses 15. Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ] Because he has taken your nature upon him; and thus, as believers in him, ye are the members of Christ.

Shall I then take, &c.] Shall we, who profess to be members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones, connect ourselves with harlots, and thus dishonour and pollute the bodies which are members of Christ? God forbid! These passages admit of a more literal interpretation. This, if given at all, I must give in a strange language.

Verses 17. Is one spirit] He who is united to God, by faith in Christ Jesus, receives his Spirit, and becomes a partaker of the Divine nature.—Who can change such a relationship for communion with a harlot; or for any kind of sensual gratification? He who can, must be far and deeply fallen!

Some sins, or solicitations to sin, may be reasoned with; in the above cases, if you parley, you are undone; reason not, but FLY!

Sinneth against his own body] Though sin of every species has a tendency to destroy life; yet none are so mortal as those to which the apostle refers; they strike immediately at the basis of the constitution. By the just judgment of God, all these irregular and sinful connexions are married to death. Neither prostitutes, whore-mongers, nor unclean persons of any description, can live out half their days. It would be easy to show, and prove also, how the end of these things, even with respect to the body, is death: but I forbear, and shall finish the subject with the words of the prophet. The show of their countenance doth witness against them: and they declare their sin as Sodom, they hide it not: wo unto their soul, for they have rewarded evil unto themselves.

Verse 19. Your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost] What an astonishing saying is this! As truly as the living God dwelt in the Mosaic tabernacle, and in the temple of Solomon, so truly does the Holy Ghost dwell in the souls of genuine Christians; and as the temple, and all its utensils, were holy, separated, from all common and profane uses, and dedicated alone to the service of God: so the bodies of genuine Christians are holy, and all their members should be employed in the service of God alone.

And ye are not your own] Ye have no right over yourselves, to dispose either of your body, or any of its members, as you may think proper or lawful; you are bound to God, and to him you are accountable.

Verse 20. Ye are bought with a price] As the slave who is purchased by his master for a sum of money, is the sole property of that master; so ye, being bought with the price of the blood of Christ, are not your own: you are his property. As the slave is bound to use all his skill and diligence for the emolument of his master; so you should employ body, soul, and spirit, in the service of your Lord; promoting, by every means in your power, the honour and glory of your God, whom you must also consider as your Lord and Master.

There are strange discordances in MSS. Versions, and Fathers, on the conclusion of this verse; and the clause, καὶ ἡ τὴν πνεύματι ὑμῶν, ἀναστὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, and in your spirit, which is God's, is wanting in ABC*D*EFG. some others, Coptic, Æthiopic, Vulgate, and Itala, and in several of the primitive Fathers. Almost every critic of note considers them to be spurious. Whether retained or expunged, the sense is the same. Instead of price, simply, the Vulgate, and some of the Latin Fathers, read pretio magno, with a great price; and, instead of glorify simply, they read glorificate et portate, glorify and carry God in your bodies.— These readings appear to be glosses, intended to explain the text. Litigious Christians, who will have recourse to law for every little difference, as well as the impure, may read this chapter either to their conviction or confusion.

NOTES ON CHAP. VII.

Verse 1. The things whereof ye wrote unto me] It is sufficiently evident that the principal part of this epistle was written in answer to some questions which had been sent to the apostle, in a letter from the Corinthian church; and the first question seems to be this, "Is it proper for a man to marry in the present circumstances of the church?"

The question concerning the expediency or in expediency of marriage, was often agitated among the ancient philosophers; and many, though inclined to decide against it, because of the troubles and cares connected with it, tolerated it in their opinions; because, though an evil, it was judged to be a necessary evil. The words of Menander are full to this effect. Γαμνεν τις την αλλοθεν σκολην, καλον μιν εστι, αλλ' αναγκαιον καλον. "If a man consider marriage in a proper point of view, it is an evil; but then it is a necessary evil." Metellus Numidicus spoke of it nearly in the same way.—Si sine uxore possemus, Quirites, esse, omnes eâ molestiâ careremus; sed quoniam ita natura tradidit, ut nec cum illis satis commode nec sine illis ullo modo vixi possit, saluti perpetuæ potius quam brevi voluptati consulendum. "If, O ye Romans, we could live unmarried, we should be saved from a great deal of trouble; but, seeing that nature has so ordered it, that we cannot live very comfortably with wives, and without them, cannot live at all, marriage should be adopted, not for the sake of the short-lived pleasure, but rather for perpetual safety." But this was not the common opinion: the Jews absolutely required that every man should marry, and reputed those as murderers who did not.—See on ver. 6. By the laws of Lycurgus, unmarried persons were prohibited from seeing the public games. By the laws of the Spartans, bachelors were punished. And Plato declares all such unworthy of any honour. And to this the Commentator says Amen.

Not to touch a woman] Γυναικος μη απτοειν. The learned reader need not be informed in what sense απτοειν is used among the Greeks, and tangere among the Latins. For examples, Wetstein may be consulted.

Verse 2. To avoid fornication] Δια τας πορνικας; verito, propter exercendam libidinem, vel ut libidinem licitè exercere liceat. Probo hanc notionem ex Hebræo, ibi nû zanah, est libidinem exercere; Hos. iv. 10. For they shall eat and not have enough: they shall commit whoredom, um libidinem exercebunt; and shall not increase. Here the prophet certainly does not speak of whoredom, in our sense of the word; for the persons he mentions, expected to have children, which cannot be said of those who are addicted to improper connexions: the prophet speaks concerning married persons, whom he threatens with a privation of children, notwithstanding libidinem exercebant, in order to have numerous families. See Schoeegen. The following verse shows that this is the apostle's meaning.

Let every man have his own wife] Let every man have one woman, his own; and every woman one man, her own. Here, plurality of wives and husbands is most strictly forbidden: and they are commanded to marry for the purpose of procreating children.

In the Jewish constitutions, there are some things not only curious but useful, respecting marriage. "There are four causes which induce men to marry: 1. Impure desire: 2. To get riches: 3. To become honourable: 4. For the glory of God. Those who marry through the first motive, beget wicked and rebellious children. Those who marry for the sake of riches, have the curse of leaving them to others. Those who marry for the sake of aggrandizing their family, their families shall be diminished. Those who marry to promote the glory of God, their children shall be holy, and by them shall the true church be increased."

Verse 3. Let the husband render unto the wife due benevolence] Την οφειλομενην αρωγαν: though our version is no translation of the original, yet few persons are at a loss for the meaning; and the context is sufficiently plain. Some have rendered the words, not unaptly, the matrimonial debt, or conjugal duty; that which a wife owes to her husband, and the husband to his wife: and which they must take care mutually to render, else alienation of affection will be the infallible consequence; and this, in numberless instances, has led to adulterous connexions. In such cases, the wife has to blame herself for the infidelity of her husband; and the husband for that of his wife. What miserable work has been made in the peace of families, by a wife or a husband pretending to be wiser than the apostle, and too holy and spiritual to keep the commandments of God!

Verse 4. The wife hath not power, &c.] Her person belongs to her husband; her husband's person belongs to her; neither of them has any authority to refuse what the other has a matrimonial right to demand. The woman that would act so, is either a knave or a fool. It would be trifling to attribute her conduct to any other cause than weakness or folly. She does not love her husband; or she loves some one else better than her husband; or she makes pretensions to a fancied sanctity unsupported by Scripture or common sense.

Verse 5. Defraud ye not one the other] What ye owe thus to each other, never refuse paying: unless by mutual consent; and let that be only for a certain time, when prudence dictates the temporary separation: or when some extraordinary spiritual occasion may render it mutually agreeable; in order that ye may fast and pray, and derive the greatest possible benefit from these duties, by being enabled to wait on the Lord without distraction.

That Satan tempt you not for your incontinency] It is most evident that the separations permitted by the apostle, for he enjoins none, are only for a season; on extraordinary occasions: and, that the persons may come together again, lest Satan taking advantage of their matrimonial abstinence, might tempt either party to illicit commerce.

There are a multitude of rules prescribed in such cases by the rabbins, and indeed even by heathen writers; for this was a matter in which common sense could always judge; and under the direction of experience, heathens, as well as those favoured with Divine Revelation, could see what was proper in all such cases.

Incontinence, asparia, want of strength to regulate one's desires or appetites; from a, negative, and aspar, strength. It is remarkable, that the apostle supposes that even this temporary continence might produce incontinence; and universal observation confirms the supposition.

Verse 6. I speak this by permission, &c.] It was a constant custom of the more conscientious rabbins, to make a difference between the things which they enjoined on their own judgment; and those which they built on the authority of the law. Thus Rabbi Tancum, "The washing of hands before meat, is in our own power: washing after meat, is commanded." In relation to this point, Dr. Lightfoot produces some examples from the Jewish writers: "The man is commanded concerning begetting and multiplying, but not the woman. And when does the man come under this command? From the age of sixteen or seventeen years: but if he exceeds twenty years without marrying, behold he violates, and renders an affirmative precept vain. The Gemara says, It is forbidden a man to be without a wife; because it is written, It is not good for man to be alone. And whosoever gives not himself to generation and multiplying, is all one with a murderer: he is as though he diminished from the image of God," &c. We may understand the apostle here as saying that the directions already given were from his own judgment, and not from any divine inspiration; and we may take it for granted that where he does not make this observation, he is writing under the immediate afflatus of the Holy Spirit.

Verse 7. For, I would that all men, &c.] He wished that all that were then in the church, were like himself, unmarried: but this was in reference to the necessities of the church, or what he calls, ver. 26. the present distress: for, it could never be his wish that marriage should cease among men; and that human beings should no longer be propagated upon earth: nor could he wish that the church of Christ should always be composed of single persons; this would have been equally absurd. But as the church was then in straits and difficulties, it was much better for its single members, not to encumber themselves with domestic embarrassments.

Every man hath his proper gift of God] Continence is a state that cannot be acquired by human art or industry; a man has it from God, or not at all: and if he have it from God, he has it from him as the author of his nature: for where it does not exist naturally, it never can exist but either by miraculous interference, which should never be expected; or by surgical operation, which is a shocking abomination in the sight of God. See the note on Matt. xix. 12.

Verse 8. The unmarried and widows] It is supposed that the apostle speaks here of men who had been married, in the word ἀγαπῶν, but were now widowers, as he does of women who had been married, in the word χήραι, but were now widows. And when he says ἐν αὐτῷ, even as I, he means that he himself was a widower; for several of the ancients rank Paul among the married apostles.

Verse 9. But if they cannot contain] If they find it inconvenient and uncomfortable to continue as widowers and widows, let them remarry.

It is better to marry than to burn] Bishop Pearce translates the original thus, for it is better to marry than to be made uneasy. Ἰνπονοῦντας, says he, "signifies primarily to burn, but in a metaphorical sense, to be troubled, vexed, or made uneasy. So in 2 Cor. xi. 29. who is offended and I burn not, καὶ οὐκ ἔστιν ἰνπονοῦμαι, and I am not troubled. So in Terence, Uro hominem, is I vex him." It would be well to soften the sense of this word, in reference to the subject of which the apostle speaks. He cannot mean burning with lust, no more than Virgil means so, when he says, Æn. iv. ver. 68. Uritur infelix Dido, the unfortunate Dido is tormented; and in Ecl. ii. 68. Me tamen urit amor; love torments me. All this may be said with the strictest truth in such cases, where the impure fire, referred to above, has no existence.

A curious story, which certainly casts light on the phrasology of this place, is related by Dr. Lightfoot, from the tract Kiddushin, fol. 81. "Some captive women were brought to Nehardea, and disposed in the house, and the upper room of Rabbi Amram. They took away the ladder [that the women might not get down, but stay there till they were ransomed.] As one of these captives passed by the window, the light of her great beauty shined into the house. Amram, [captivated] set up the ladder; and, when he was got to the middle of the steps; [checked by his conscience] he stopped short, and with a loud voice cried out FIRE! FIRE! in the house of Amram! [This he did that the neighbours flocking in, he might be obliged to desist from the evil affection which now prevailed in him.] The rabbins ran to him, [and seeing no fire] they said, Thou hast disgraced us. To which he replied, It is better that ye be disgraced in the house of Amram in this world, than that ye be disgraced by me in the world to come. He then adjured that evil affection to go out of him; and it went out as a pillar of fire. Amram said, Thou art FIRE, and I am FLESH; yet for all that I have prevailed against thee." From this story much instruction may be derived.

Verse 10. I command, yet not I, but the Lord I do not give my own private opinion or judgment in this case; for the Lord Jesus commands that man shall not put asunder them whom God hath joined, Mat. v. 32. xix. 6. And God has said the same, Gen. ii. 24. The following extracts will prove that the law among the Jews was very loose relative to the firmness of the marriage bond:

A woman might put away or depart from her husband by giving this simple reason to the elders, who would give the following certificate. "In—day of—week of—year, A. daughter of B. put away before us, and said: My mother, or my brethren, deceived me, and wedded me, or betrothed me, when I was a very young maid, to C. son of D. but I now reveal my mind before you, that I will not have him."

Sometimes they parted with mutual consent, and this also was considered legal, as was also the marriage of the separated parties to others; witness the following story: "A good man had a good wife; but because they had no children, they mutually put away each other. The good man married a bad (a heathen) wife, and she made him bad (a heathen); the good woman married a bad (a heathen) husband, and she made him good."

Divorces were easily obtained among them, and they considered them the dissolving of the marriage bond: and, in consequence of these, the parties might re-marry with others. This was contrary to the original institution of marriage; and is opposed both by our Lord and the apostle.

Verse 11. But, and if she depart] He puts the case as probable, because it was frequent; but lays it under restrictions.

Let her remain unmarried] She departs at her own peril; but she must not marry another: she must either continue unmarried, or be reconciled to her husband.

And let not the husband put away his wife] Divorces cannot be allowed but in the case of fornication; an act of this kind dissolves the marriage vow; but nothing else can. It is a fact, that among the Jews, the wife had just as much right to put away her husband, as the husband had to put away his wife. As divorces were granted, it was right that each should have an equal power; for this served as a mutual check.

Verse 12. But to the rest speak I, not the Lord] As if he had said, for what I have already spoken, I have the testimony of the Lord by Moses: and of my own Lord and Master Christ. But for the directions which I am now about to give, there is no written testimony; and I deliver them now for the first time. These words do not intimate that the apostle was not now under the influences of the Divine Spirit; but, that there was nothing in the sacred writings which bore directly on this point.

If any brother] A Christian man, have a wife that believeth not, i. e. who is a heathen; not yet converted to the Christian faith: and she be pleased to dwell with him, notwithstanding his turning Christian since their marriage; let him not put her away, because she still continues in her heathen superstition.

husband, who still abides in heathenism; if he be pleased to dwell with her, notwithstanding she has become a Christian since their marriage, let her not leave him because he still continues a heathen.

Verse 14. The unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife] Or rather is to be reputed as sanctified, on account of his wife: she being a Christian woman, and he, though a heathen, being by marriage, one flesh with her; her sanctity, as far as it refers to outward things, may be considered as imputed to him, so as to render their connexion not unlawful. The case is the same when the wife is a heathen, and the husband a Christian. The word sanctification here, is to be applied much more to the Christian state than to any moral change in the persons: for Agni, sancti, is a common term for Christians, those who were baptized into the faith of Christ; and as its corresponding term ovvyp keduahim, signified all the Jews, who were in the covenant of God by circumcision. The heathens in question were considered to be in this holy state by means of their connexion with those who were by their Christian profession sancti.

Else were your children unclean] If this kind of relative sanctification were not allowed, the children of these persons could not be received into the Christian church, nor enjoy any rights or privileges as Christians; but the church of God never scrupled to admit such children as members, just as well as she did those who had sprung from parents, both of whom were Christians.

The Jews considered a child as born out of holiness, whose parents were not proselytes at the time of the birth, though afterward they became proselytes. On the other hand, they considered the children of heathens born in holiness, provided the parents became proselytes before the birth. All the children of the heathens were reputed unclean by the Jews; and all their own children holy.—See Dr. Lightfoot. This shows clearly what the apostle's meaning is.

If we consider the apostle as speaking of the children of heathens, we shall get a remarkable comment on this passage from Tertullian, who, in his treatise De Carne Christi, chaps. 37, 39, gives us a melancholy account of the height to which superstition and idolatry had arrived in his time, among the Romans. "A child," says he, "from its very conception, was dedicated to the idols and daemons they worshipped. While pregnant, the mother had her body swathed round with bandages, prepared with idolatrous rites. The embryo they conceived to be under the inspection of the goddess Alemona, who nourished it in the womb. Nona and Decima took care that it should be born in the ninth or tenth month. Partula adjusted every thing relative to the labour; and Lucina ushered it into the light. During the week preceding the birth, a table was spread for Juno; and on the last day, certain persons were called together to mark the moment on which the parca or fates had fixed its destiny. The first step the child set on the earth was consecrated to the goddess Statina; and, finally, some of the hair was cut off, or the whole head shaven, and the hair offered to some god or goddess, through some public or private motive of devotion." He adds, that "no child among the heathens was born in a state of purity; and it is not to be wondered at," says he, "that daemons possess them from their youth, seeing they were thus early dedicated to their service." In reference to this, he thinks St. Paul speaks in the verse before us, The unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife—else were your children unclean; but now are they holy: i. e. "As the parents were converted to the Christian faith, the child comes into the world without these impure and unhallowed rites; and is, from its infancy, consecrated to the true God."

15 But if the unbelieving depart, let him depart. A brother or a sister is not under bondage in such cases: but God hath called us to peace.

Verse 15. But if the unbelieving depart] Whether husband or wife: if such obstinately depart, and utterly refuse all cohabitation; a brother or a sister, a Christian man or woman, is not under bondage to any particular laws, so as to be prevented from remarriage; such, probably, the law stood then; but it is not so now; for the marriage can only be dissolved by death, or by the ecclesiastical court. Even fornication, or adultery, does not dissolve the marriage contract; nor will the obstinate separation of any of the parties, however long continued, give the party abandoned, authority to remarry: If the person have been beyond sea, and not heard of for seven years, it is presumed he may be dead, and marriage has been connived at in such cases. If there be no person to complain, it may be presumed that there is none injured. But I have known instances where even a marriage after seven years' absence, has been very unfortunate; the husband returning at the end of ten or twelve years, and to his utter distress finding his wife married to another man, and with issue of that marriage! There can be no safety in this case, unless there be absolute certainty of the death of the party in question.

God hath called us to peace] The refractory and disagreeing party should not be compelled to fulfil such matrimonial engagements, as would produce continual jarring and discord. At the same time, each should take care that he give no cause for disagreements and separations: for the Author of the Christian religion is the Author of peace, and has called us to it.

partners, do not give them up because they are such; for you may become the means of saving them unto eternal life. Bear your cross, and look up to God, and he may give your unbelieving husband or wife to your prayers.

Verse 17. But as God hath distributed to every man, &c.] Let every man fulfil the duties of the state to which God, in the course of his providence, has called him.

So ordain I in all churches.] I do not lay on you a burden which others are not called to bear: this is the general rule which, by the authority of God, I impose on every Christian society.

Verse 18. Is any man called being circumcised?] Is any man who was formerly a Jew, converted to Christianity.

Let him not become uncircumcised] Let him not endeavour to abolish the sign of the old covenant, which he bears in his flesh. The Greek words μη σκιαρθετε, let him not draw over, is evidently an elliptical expression; the word, την ακροβυστιαν, the foreskin, being understood; which, indeed, is added by the Armenian, and the Itala, and several of the Latin Fathers. It is a fact, that it was possible, by the assistance of art, to do this; and Celsus himself prescribes the mode, De Medic. vii. 25. by frequent stretching, the circumcised skin could be again so drawn over, as to prevent the ancient sign of circumcision from appearing. Some, in their zeal against Judaism, endeavoured to abolish this sign of it in their flesh: it is most evidently against this, that the apostle speaks. Many false Jews made use of this practice, that they might pass through heathen countries unobserved; otherwise, in frequenting the baths, they would have been detected.

Let him not be circumcised] Let no man who, being a Gentile, has been converted to the Christian faith, submit to circumcision, as something necessary to his salvation.

Verse 19. Circumcision is nothing] Circumcision itself, though commanded of God, is nothing of itself, it being only a sign of the justification, which should be afterward received by faith. At present neither it, nor its opposite, keeping of the commandments of God.

20 Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called.

21 Art thou called being a servant? care not for it: but if thou mayest be made free, use it rather.

22 For he that is called in the Lord, being a servant, is ^b the Lord's ⁱ freeman: likewise also he that is called; being free, is ^k Christ's servant.

either hinder or further the work of grace: and keeping the commandments of God, from his love shed abroad in a believing heart, is the sum and substance of religion.

Verse 20. Let every man abide in the same calling] As both the circumcised and uncircumcised, in Christ have the same advantages, and to their believing, the same facilities; so any situation of life is equally friendly to the salvation of the soul, if a man be faithful to the grace he has received. Therefore, in all situations, a Christian should be content: for all things work together for good to him who loves God.

Verse 21. Art thou called being a servant?] Δουλος κληθετε; art thou converted to Christ, while thou art a slave? the property of another person, and bought with his money: care not for it: this will not injure thy Christian condition: but, if thou canst obtain thy liberty, use it rather; prefer this state for the sake of freedom, and the temporal advantages connected with it.

Verse 22. For he that is called] The man who, being a slave, is converted to the Christian faith, is the Lord's freeman; his condition as a slave does not vitiate any of the privileges to which he is entitled as a Christian: on the other hand, all free men, who receive the grace of Christ, must consider themselves the slaves of the Lord, i. e. his real property, to be employed and disposed of according to his godly wisdom; who, notwithstanding his state of subjection, will find the service of his Master to be perfect freedom.

Verse 23. Ye are bought with a price] As truly as your bodies have become the property of your masters, in consequence of his paying down a price for you; so sure you are now the Lord's property, in consequence of your being purchased by the blood of Christ.

Some render this verse interrogatively, Are ye bought with a price from your slavery? Do not again become slaves of men. Never sell yourselves; prefer and retain your liberty, now that ye have acquired it.

In these verses the apostle shows that the Christian religion does not abolish our civil comnexions:—in reference to them, where it finds us, there it leaves us. In whatever relation we stood before our embracing Christianity, there we stand still: our secular condition being no further changed, than as it may be affected by the amelioration of our moral character.

Verse 24. Let every man—abide with God.] Let him live to God in whatsoever station he is placed by Providence. If he be a slave, God will be with him even in his slavery; if he be faithful to the grace which he has received. It is very likely that some of the slaves at Corinth, who had been converted to Christianity, had been led to think that their Christian privileges absolved them from the necessity of continuing slaves; or, at least, brought them on a level with their Christian masters. A spirit of this kind might have soon led to confusion and insubordination, and brought scandals into the church. It was therefore a very proper subject for the apostle to interfere in; and to his authority, the persons concerned would, doubtless, respectfully bow.

Verse 25. Now concerning virgins] This was another subject on which the church at Corinth had asked the advice of the apostle. The word παρθένος, virgin, we take to signify a pure, unmarried young woman; but it is evident that the word, in this place, means young unmarried persons of either sex, as appears from verses 26, 27, 32—34. and from Rev. xiv. 4. The word παρθένος, virgin, is frequently applied to men as well as to women. See Suidas under the word Ἀβελ· ἄνθρωπος παρθένος καὶ δίκαιος ἄνθρωπος, He (Abel) was a virgin, and a righteous man. In ver. 36. the word is supposed to mean the state of virginity or celibacy—and very probable reasons are assigned for it; and it is evident that persons of either sex in a state of celibacy are the persons intended.

I have no commandment of the Lord] There is nothing in the Sacred Writings that directly touches this point.

Yet I give my judgment] As every way equal to such commandments, had there been any; seeing I have received the teaching of his own Spirit, and have obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful to this heavenly gift, so that it abides with me to lead me into all truth. In this way I think the apostle's words may be safely understood.

Verse 26. This is good for the present distress]

There was no period in the heathen times, when the church was not under persecutions and afflictions; on some occasions, these were more oppressive than at others.

The word ἀνάγκη signifies necessity, distress, tribulation, and calamity, as it does in Luke xxi. 23. 2 Cor. vi. 4. and xii. 10. In such times when the people of God had no certain dwelling-place; when they were lying at the mercy of their enemies, without any protection from the state; the state itself often among the persecutors; he who had a family to care for, would find himself in very embarrassed circumstances, as it would be much more easy to provide for his personal safety, than to have the care of a wife and children. On this account it was much better for unmarried persons to continue, for the present, in their celibacy.

Verse 27. Art thou bound unto a wife?] i. e. married; for the marriage contract was considered in the light of a bond.

Seek not to be loosed] Neither regret your circumstances, notwithstanding the present distress; nor seek, on this account, for a dissolution of the marriage contract. But if thou art under no matrimonial engagements, do not, for the present, enter into any.

Verse 28. But, and if thou marry] As there is no law against this, even in the present distress, thou hast not sinned, because there is no law against this; and it is only on account of prudential reasons, that I give this advice.

And, if a virgin marry] Both the man and the woman have equal privileges in this case; either of them may marry without sin. It is probable, as there were many sects and parties in Corinth, that there were among them those who forbade to marry, 1 Tim. iv. 3. and who might have maintained other doctrines of devils besides. These persons, or such doctrines, the apostle had in view when he says, they may marry, and yet not sin.

Trouble in the flesh] From the simple circumstance of the encumbrance of a family, while under persecution; because of the difficulty of providing for its comfort and safety, while flying before the face of persecution.

But I spare you] The evil is coming; but I will not press upon you the observance of a prudential caution, which you might deem too heavy a cross.

Verse 29. The time is short] These persecutions and distresses are at the door, and life itself will soon be run out. Even then, Nero was plotting those grievous persecutions with which he not only afflicted, but devastated the church of Christ.

They that have wives] Let none begin to think of any comfortable settlement for his family; let him sit loose to all earthly concerns, and stand ready prepared to escape for his life, or meet death, as the Providence of God may permit. The husband will be dragged from the side of his wife, to appear before the magistrates, and be required either to abjure Christ or die.

Poor Heathenism! thou couldest give but cold comfort in such circumstances as these: and infidelity, thy younger brother, is no better provided than thou.

Verse 30. They that weep, &c.] There will shortly be such a complete system of distress and confusion, that private sorrows and private joys will be absorbed in the weightier and more oppressive public evils—yet, let every man still continue in his calling; let him buy, and sell, and traffic, as usual; though in a short time, either by the coming persecution, or the leveling hand of death, he that had earthly property, will be brought into the same circumstances with him who had none.

Verse 31. And they that use this world] Let them who have earthly property or employments, discharge conscientiously their duties from a conviction of the instability of earthly things. Make a right use of every thing, and pervert nothing from its use. To use a thing, is to employ it properly, in order to accomplish the end to which it refers. To abuse a thing, signifies to pervert it from that use. Pass through things temporal, so as not to lose those which are eternal.

For the fashion of this world] Το σχημα του κοσμου τουτου, signifies properly the present state or constitution of things; the frame of the world; that is, the world itself. But often the term κοσμος; world, is taken to signify the Jewish state and polity; the destruction of this was then at hand; and this the Holy Spirit might then signify to the apostle.

Verse 32. Without carefulness] Though all these things will shortly come to pass, yet do not be anxious about them. Every occurrence is under the direction and management of God. The wrath of man shall praise him, and the remainder of it he shall restrain, and none can harm you if ye be followers of that which is good. We should all take the advice of the poet:

“With patient mind thy course of duty run;
 God nothing does, nor suffers to be done,
 But thou would’st do thyself, could’st thou but see
 The end of all events as well as He.”

He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord] He has nothing to do with a family, and therefore can give his whole time to the service of his Maker; having him alone to please.

Verse 33. But he that is married] He has a family to provide for, and his wife to please, as well as to fulfil his duty to God, and attend to the concerns of his own soul. The single man has nothing to attend to but what concerns his own salvation; the married man has all this to attend to, and besides, to provide for his wife and family, and take care of their eternal interests also. The single man has very little trouble comparatively; the married man has a great deal. The single man is an atom in society: the married man is a small community in himself. The former is the centre of his own existence, and lives for himself alone. The latter is diffused abroad, makes a much more important part of the body social, and provides both for its support and continuance. The single man lives for, and does good to himself only; the married man lives both for himself and the public. Both the state and the church of Christ are dependent on the married man; as from him, under God, the one has subjects, the other members; while the single man is but an individual in either; and by and by will cease from both, and having no posterity, is wife and a virgin. The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit: but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband.

lost to the public for ever. The married man, therefore, far from being in a state of inferiority to the single man, is beyond him out of the limits of comparison. He can do all the good the other can do, though perhaps sometimes in a different way, and he can do ten thousand goods that the other cannot possibly do. And therefore both himself and his state are to be preferred infinitely before those of the other. Nor could the apostle have meant any thing less; only for the present distress he gave his opinion that it was best for those who were single to continue so. And who does not see the propriety of the advice!

Verse 34. There is a difference also between a wife and a virgin] That is, there is this difference between a married and an unmarried woman. The unmarried careth (only) for the things of the Lord, having no domestic duties to perform. That she may be holy; separated to divine employments both in body and spirit. Whereas, she that is married, careth (also) for the things of the world, how she may please her husband, having many domestic duties to fulfil; her husband being obliged to leave to her the care of the family, and all other domestic concerns.

On this verse there is a profusion of various readings in MSS. Versions, and Fathers, for which I must refer to Griesbach, as it would be impossible to introduce them here, so as to make them look like sense.

Verse 35. This I speak for your own profit] The advices belong to yourselves alone, because of the peculiar circumstances in which you are placed. Nothing spoken here was ever designed to be of general application; it concerned the church at Corinth alone; or churches in similar circumstances.

Not that I may cast a snare upon you] Ουχ να βλησιν υπαν επιβλημα—Here is a manifest allusion to the Retiarius among the Romans, who carried a small casting net, which he endeavoured to throw over the head of his adversary, and thus entangle him. Or to a similar custom among the Persians, who made use of a noose called the каманд, which they employed in the same way. One of these lies before me; it is a strong silken cord, one end of which is a loop to be held in the hand; and the rest is in the form of a common snare or noose, which, catching hold of any thing, tightens in proportion as it is pulled by the hand that holds the loop.

The apostle therefore intimates that what he says was not intended absolutely to bind them, upon you, but for that which is comely, and that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction.

but to show them the propriety of following an advice which, in the present case, would be helpful to them in their religious connexions, that they might attend upon the Lord without distraction, which they could not do in times of persecution, when, in addition to their own personal safety, they had a wife and children to care for.

For that which is comely, and that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction.] The original αλλα προς το ωραμιον, και υποσφοδρον τη Κυρη απροσπασις, of which our version is only a paraphrase, is thus translated by Bishop Pearson, But for the sake of decency, and of attending more easily upon the Lord without distraction. This is much more literal than ours.

Verse 36. Uncomely towards his virgin] Different meanings have been assigned to this verse. I shall mention three of the principal. 1. "In those early times, both among the Hebrews and Christians, the daughters were wholly in the power of the father, so that he might give or not give them in marriage as he chose; and might bind them to perpetual celibacy if he thought proper; and to this case the apostle alludes. If the father had devoted his daughter to perpetual virginity; and he afterward found that she had fixed her affections upon a person whom she was strongly inclined to marry, and was now getting past the prime of life, he, seeing from his daughter's circumstances, that it would be wrong to force her to continue in her state of celibacy; though he had determined before to keep her single, yet he might, in this case, alter his purpose without sin, and let her, and her suitor, marry."

2. "The whole verse and its context speaks of young women dedicated to the service of God, who were called παρθεναι, virgins, in the primitive church. And a case is put here, "that circumstances might occur to render the breach of even a vow of this kind necessary, and so no sin be committed."

3. "The apostle by παρθεναι, does not mean a virgin, but the state of virginity, or celibacy, whether in man or woman." Both Mr. Locke and Dr. Whitby are of this opinion, and the latter reasons on it thus:

It is generally supposed that these three verses relate to virgins under the power of parents and guardians, and the usual inference is, that children are to be disposed of in marriage by the parents, guardians, &c. Now this may be true, but it has no foundation in the text, for την εν τη αυτου παρθεναι, is not to keep his daughter's, but his own virginity, or rather his purpose of virginity; for, as Phavorinus says, He is called a virgin, who freely gives himself up to the Lord, renouncing matrimony, and preferring a life spent in continency. And, that this must be the true import of these words, appears from this consideration; that this depends upon the purpose of his own heart, and the power he has over his own will, and the no necessity arising from himself to change this purpose. Whereas the keeping a daughter unmarried depends not on these conditions on her father's part, but on her own: for, let her have a necessity, surely the apostle would not advise the father to keep her a virgin, because he had determined so to do; nor could there be any doubt whether the father had power over his own will or not, when no necessity lay upon him to betroth his virgin. The Greek runs to this sense: if he had stood already firm in his heart, finding no necessity, viz. to change his purpose; and hath power over his own will, not to marry; finding himself able to persist in the resolution he had made to keep his virginity; he does well to continue a virgin: and then the phrase, if any man thinks he behaves himself unseemly towards his virgin, if it be over-aged, and thinks he ought rather to join in marriage; refers to the opinions both of Jews and Gentiles that all ought to marry. The Jews say, that the time of marriage is from 16 or 17, to 20; while some of the Gentiles specify from 30 to 35. If any think thus, says the apostle, let them do what they will, they sin not: let them marry. And then he concludes with those words applied to both cases: so then, both he that marries, doeth well; and he that marries not, doeth better.

This last opinion seems to be the true sense of the apostle.

It may be necessary to make a few general observations on these verses, summing up what has been said.

1. Παῖδες, here, should be considered as implying not a virgin, but the state of virginity or celibacy.

2. Ἐργασίαι, over-aged: must refer to the passing of that time in which both the laws and customs of Jews and Gentiles required men to marry. See above, and see the note on ver. 6.

3. Καὶ ὅταν ἴσῃαι γυνῆαι, and need so require; or if there appear to be a necessity; is to be understood of any particular change in his circumstances, or in his feelings; or, that he finds, from the law and custom in the case, that it is a scandal for him not to marry; then let him do what he wills or purposes.

4. Instead of γαμύσῃαι, let THEM marry, I think γαμύσῃαι, let HIM marry, is the true reading, and agrees best with the context. This reading is supported by D*EFG. Syriac, all the Arabic, Slavonic, one of the Itala; and St. Augustin. Si nubat, if he marry, is the reading of the Vulgate, several copies of the Itala, Ambrose, Jerom, Ambrosiaster, Sedulius, and Bede. This reading is nearly of the same import with the other; let him do what he willeth, he sinneth not, let him marry; or, he sinneth not, if he marry.

5. The whole of the 37th verse relates to the purpose that the man has formed; and the strength that he has to keep his purpose of perpetual celibacy, being under no necessity to change that purpose.

6. Instead of ὁ γαμύσων, he who giveth her in marriage, I propose to read ὁ γαμύων, he who marrieth, which is the reading of the Codex Alexandrinus, the Codex Vaticanus, No. 1209, and of some others: with Clemens, Methodius, and Basil. Τοῦ ἑαυτοῦ γαμῶν, his own virgin, is added after the above by several very ancient and reputable MSS. as also by the Syriac, Armenian, Vulgate, Æthiopic, Clement, Basil, Optatus, and others; but it seems so much like a gloss, that Griesbach has not made it even a candidate for a place in the text. He then who marrieth, though previously intending perpetual virginity, doeth well; as this is agreeable to laws both divine and human: and he who marrieth not, doeth better; because of the present distress: see ver. 26.

Verse 39. The wife is bound by the law] This seems to be spoken in answer to some other question of the Corinthians to this effect: "May a woman remarry whose husband is dead, or who has abandoned her?" To which he replies, in general, That as long as her husband is living, the law binds her to him alone; but, if the husband die, she is free to remarry; but only in the Lord: that is, she must not marry a heathen, nor an irreligious man: and she should not only marry a genuine Christian, but one of her own religious sentiments; for, in reference to domestic peace, much depends on this.

Verse 40. But she is happier if she so abide] If she continue in her widowhood, because of the present distress, for this must always be taken in, that consistency in the apostle's reasoning may be preserved. If this were not understood, how could St. Paul tell the widow that it would be more happy for her to continue in her widowhood than to remarry? She who had tried both the state of celibacy and the state of marriage, could certainly best tell which was most for her comfort: and he could not tell any thing but by an express revelation from heaven, relative to the future state of any widow; it is certain that he can never be understood as speaking in general; as there are multitudes of persons abundantly more happy in their married than in their single state: and there are many widows also much more happy in their second marriage than they have been in their first.

After my judgment] According to the view I have of the subject, which view I take by the light of the Divine Spirit, who shows me the tribulations which are coming on the church. But, says he, ver. 8. I spare you, I will not be more explicit concerning coming evils, as I wish to save you from all forebodings which bring torment.

I think—I have the Spirit of God.] ὁμοῦ δὲ 22^ο γὰρ πνεῦμα ὁμοῦ ἔχον, might be translated I am certain that I have the Spirit of God. This sense of ὁμοῦ, (which we translate seem, to think, to appear, &c.) I have noticed in another part of this work. Ulpian on Demosthenes Olynth. 1. says, Τὸ ὁμοῦ οὐ πάντως ἐστὶ ἀκριβὲς: τὰτοιούτῃ οὐ πάλαισι, ἀλλὰ πολλοῖσι καὶ ἐν τῷ αἰσθητῷ. The word ὁμοῦ is used by the ancients, not always to express what is DOUBTFUL, but often to express what is TRUE and CERTAIN.—See Bp. Pearce. The apostle cannot be understood as expressing any doubt of his being under the inspiration of the Divine Spirit; as this would have defeated his object, in giving the above advices; for, if they were not dictated by the Spirit of God, can it be supposed that, in the face of apparent self-interest, and the prevalence of strong passions, they could have been expected to have become rules of conduct to this people? They must have understood him as asserting that he had the direction of the Spirit of God in giving those opinions, else they could not be expected to obey.

1. In the preceding chapter we have met with subjects both of difficulty and importance. As to the difficulties, it is hoped that they have been so generally considered in the notes, that few or none of them remain: and, on the subjects of peculiar importance, much time has been spent, in order to impress them on the mind of the reader. The delicacy of some of them would not admit of greater plainness; and in a few instances I have been obliged to wrap the meaning in a foreign language.

2. On the important subject of marriage, I have said what I believe to be true; and scruple not to say, that it is the most useful state in which the human being can be placed; and consequently, that in which most honour may be brought to God. I have listened with much attention, for the better part of half a century, to the arguments against marriage, and in favour of celibacy: and I have had the opportunity of being acquainted with many who endeavoured to exemplify their own doctrine: but, I have seen an end of all their perfection; neither the world, nor the church, are under any obligations to them: they either married when they could do it to their mind and convenience, or, continuing in their celibacy, they lived a comparatively useless life; and died, as they should, unregretted. The doctrine is not only dangerous, but anti-scriptural; and, I hope, I have sufficiently vindicated Paul from being its patron or supporter.

3. While I contend for the superior excellence of the marriage state, I hope I shall not be understood to be the apologist of indiscriminate marriages—No, many of them are blameable in a very high degree. Instead of consulting common sense and propriety; childish affections, brutish passions, or the love of money, are the motives on which many of them have been contracted. Such marriages are miserable, must be so, and should not be otherwise: and superficial people, looking at these, form an estimate of the state itself; and then indulge themselves in exclaiming against an ordinance of God; either perverted by themselves, or the equally foolish persons who are the subjects of their animadversion. That genuine Christians can never be so useful in any state as that of marriage, I am fully convinced; but, to be happy, the marriage must be in the Lord. When believers match with unbelievers, generally per se sincere trahitur, the good becomes perverted; and Satan has his triumph when he has got an immortal soul out of the church of Christ into his own synagogue. But who, among young people, will lay this to heart! And how few, among young men and young women, will not sell their Saviour and his people, for a husband or a wife!

4. The doctrine of second marriages has been long a subject of controversy in the church. The Scriptures, properly understood, have not only nothing against them, but much for them. And, in this chapter, St. Paul, in the most pointed manner, admits of them. A widow may marry again; only, let it be in the Lord. And a widower has certainly the same privilege.

5. The conversion which the Scripture requires, though it makes a most essential change in our souls, in reference to God; and in our works, in reference both to God and man makes none in our civil state: even if a man is called, i. e. converted in a state of slavery, he does not gain his manumission in consequence of his conversion; he stands in the same relation both to the state and to his fellows, that he stood in before: and is not to assume any civil rights or privileges in consequence of the conversion of his soul to God. The apostle decides the matter in this chapter, and orders that every man should abide in the calling wherein he is called.

6. From the 20th to the 23d verse, the apostle refers to the state of slavery among the Greeks: and, from what he says, we find that even among the slaves there were Christian converts; to whom, though he recommends submission and contentment, yet he intimates that if they could get their freedom, that they should prefer it; and he strongly charges those that were free, not to become again the slaves of men, ver. 23. from which we learn, that a man might dispose of his own liberty, which, in a Christian, would be a disgrace to his redemption by Christ. The word σλεύθερος, which we translate freeman, means properly freedman; one who had been a slave, but had regained his liberty. It is the same as libertus among the Romans, one who was manumitted. The manumission was performed three several ways—1. The consent of the master, that the slave should have his name entered in the census, or public register of the citizens—2. The slave was led before the prætor, and the magistrate laid his wand, called vindicta, on his head, and declared him free—3. By testament or will, the master bequeathing to the slave his freedom.

The manner in which the second mode of manumission was performed is curious. The prætor, having laid the rod vindicta upon the slave's head, pronounced these words, Dico eum liberum esse more Quiritum, "I pronounce him free, according to the custom of the Romans." This done, he gave the rod to the licitor, or serjeant, who struck the slave with it upon the head, and afterward, with the hand, upon the face and back. The head also of the slave was shaven, and a cup given him by his master, as a token of freedom; and the notary entered the name of the new freedman in the public register, with the reasons of his manumission: it was customary also to give him another surname.

7. Among our Saxon ancestors, and also after the conquest, there was a species of slavery: all the villani were slaves to their respective lords; and each was bound to serve him in a great variety of ways. There is a profusion of curious examples of this in that ancient record, preserved in the bishop's auditors' office in the cathedral of Durham, commonly known by the name of the Baldon Book. This record is now printing, under the direction of his Majesty's commissioners on the public records of the kingdom.

8. Among our Saxon ancestors, manumissions were granted on various accounts—1. A person might, if able, purchase his own freedom—2. One man might purchase the freedom of another—3. Manumissions were granted to procure, by their merit, the salvation of departed souls—4. Persons were manumitted also, in order to be consecrated to the service of God. These manumissions were usually recorded in some holy book, especially in copies of the four Evangelists, which, being preserved in the libraries of abbies, &c. were a continual record; and might, at all convenient times, be consulted. Several entries of these manumissions exist in a MS. of the four Evangelists, a. 4. 14. in the library of Corpus Christi, or Bennet college, Cambridge.

I shall produce a specimen of one of the several kinds mentioned above, giving the original only of the first; and, of the others, verbal translations.

pound. And this is witnessed by the whole convent of Bath.

May Christ strike him blind,
 Who this writing perverts."

This is a usual execration at the end of these forms: and is in rhyme in the original.

2. Certificate of one having purchased the liberty of another.

"Here is witnessed in this book of Christ, that Ædric Atford has redeemed Sagyfa, his daughter, from the Abbot Ælfrig, and from the convent of Bath, to be for ever free, and all her posterity."

3. Certificate of redemption, in behalf of one departed.

"Here is witnessed in this book of Christ, that Ælfric Scot, and Ægelric Scot, are manumitted for the soul of abbot Ælfrig, to perpetual liberty. This was done with the testimony of the whole convent."

4. Certificate of persons manumitted to be devoted to the service of God.

"Here is witnessed in this book of Christ, that John bought Gunnilda, the daughter of Thurkill, from Goda, widow of Leafenath, with half a pound. With the testimony of the whole convent.

May Christ strike him blind,
 Who this writing perverts.

And he has dedicated her to Christ and St. Peter, in behalf of his mother's soul."

9. When a man was made free, it was either in the church, or at some public meeting; the sheriff of the county took him by the right hand, and proclaimed him a freeman; and showed him the open door, and the public highway; intimating that he was free to go whithersoever he pleased, and then gave him the arms of a freeman, viz. a spear and a sword. In some cases the man was to pay thirty pence to his master, of hide money; intimating that he was no longer under restraint, chastisement, or correction. From which it appears, that our ancestors were in the habit of flogging their slaves. See the laws of Ina, c. 24. 39. of Wm. the Conqueror, c. 65. and of Hen. I. c. 78.

10. Among the *Gentoo*s, the manumission of a slave was as follows:—The slave took a pitcher, filled it with water, and put therein berenge-ârook, (rice that had been cleaned without boiling,) and flowers of doob, (a kind of small salad,) and taking the pitcher on his shoulder, he stands near his master; the master then puts the pitcher on the slave's head, breaks it so that the water, rice, flowers and doob, that were in the pitcher, may fall on the slave's body: when this is done, the master thrice pronounces, I have made thee free: then the slave steps forward a few paces towards the east, and then the manumission is complete. See Code of Gentoo Laws, chap. viii. sec. 2. pag. 160. It is evident that the whole of this ceremony is emblematical.—1. The pitcher represents the confined servile state of the slave—2. The articles contained in it, his exclusion while in a state of slavery, from the grand benefits and comforts of life—3. The water contained in the pitcher, his exclusion from the refreshing influences of heaven; for slaves were not permitted to take part in the ordinances of religion—4. The clean, unboiled rice; his incapacity to have secular possessions; for slaves were not permitted to possess lands either by inheritance or purchase; a slave could sow no seed for himself, and consequently have no legal claim on support from this staff of life—5. The doob or salad shut up, his being without relish for that state of being, which was rendered insupportable to him by his thralldom—6. The breaking of the pitcher, his manumission and enjoyment of liberty: being as free to go whithersoever he would, as the water was to run, being now disengaged from the pitcher—7. The shedding of the water, rice, flowers, &c. over his body, his privilege of enjoying and possessing every heavenly and earthly good—8. His stepping towards the east, his acknowledgment to the Supreme Being, the fountain of light and life, (of whom the sun was the emblem,) for his enlargement; and his eagerness to possess the light and comfort of that new state of happiness into which he was now brought, in consequence of his manumission.

11. The description that Dr. John Taylor gives, in his Elements of Civil Law, of the state of slaves among the ancients, will nearly suit with their state among our ancestors; though scarcely as bad as their state in the West Indies. "They were held among the Romans—pro nullis—pro mortuis—pro quadrupedibus—for no men—for dead men—for beasts: nay, were in a much worse state than any cattle whatever. They had no head in the state, no name, no tribe or register. They were not capable of being injured; nor could they take by purchase or descent: had no heirs, and could make no will. Exclusive of what was called their peculium, whatever they acquired was their master's: they could neither plead nor be pleaded; but were entirely excluded from all civil concerns: were not entitled to the rights of matrimony, and therefore had no relief in case of adultery: nor were they proper objects of cognition or affinity. They might be sold, transferred, or pawned, like other goods or personal estate; for goods they were, and such were they esteemed. They might be tortured for evidence, punished at the discretion of their lord, and even put to death by his authority. They were laid under several other civil incapacities, too tedious to mention."

When all this is considered, we may at once see the horrible evil of slavery; and wonder at the grace which could render them happy and contented in this situation: see the preceding chapter, verses 20, 21, and 22. And yet we need not be surprised that the apostle should say to those who were free, or freed, Ye are bought with a price; do not become slaves of men.

12. I have entered the more particularly into this subject, because it, or allusions to it, are frequently occurring in the New Testament; and I speak of it here once for all. And to conclude, I here register my testimony against the unprincipled, inhuman, anti-christian, and diabolic Slave Trade, with all its authors, promoters, abettors, and sacrilegious gains; as well as against the Great Devil, the father of it and them.

NOTES ON CHAP. VIII.

Verse 1. As touching things offered unto idols] This was another subject on which the Corinthians had asked the apostle's advice: and we shall understand the whole of this chapter the better, when we consider one fact, viz. That there had long subsisted a controversy between the Karaites and the Traditionists, how far it was lawful to derive any benefit or advantage from things used by the Gentiles. The Karaites were a sect of the Jews who scrupulously held to the letter of the Sacred Writings; taking this alone for their directory. The Traditionists were those who followed the voice of the elders; interpreting the Divine Testimonies by their decisions. From a work of the Karaites, entitled Addereth Eliyahu, Triglandus has extracted the following decisions, which will throw light upon this subject. "It is unlawful to receive any benefit from any kind of heathen worship; or from any thing that has been offered to an idol."—"It is unlawful to buy or sell an idol; and if, by accident, any such thing shall come into thy power, thou shalt derive no emolument from it.”—“The animals that are destined and prepared for the worship of idols, are universally prohibited; and particularly those which bear the mark of the idol. This should be maintained against the opinion of the Traditionists, who think they may lawfully use these kinds of animals, provided they be not marked with the sign of the idols.” Thus far the Karaites; and here we see one strong point of difference between these two sects. The Karaites totally objected to every thing used in idolatrous services: the Traditionists, as the Talmud shows, did generally the same; but it seems that they scrupled not to use any animal employed in idolatrous worship, provided they did not see the sign of the idol on it. Now, the sign of the idol must be that placed on the animal previously to its being sacrificed; such as gilded horns and hoofs, consecrated filets, garlands, &c. And, as after it had been sacrificed, and its flesh exposed for sale in the shambles, it could bear none of these signs, we may take it for granted that the Jews might think it lawful to buy and eat this flesh: this the Karaites would most solemnly scruple. It may be just necessary to state here, that it was customary, after the blood and life of an animal had been offered in sacrifice to an idol, to sell the flesh in the market indiscriminately, with that of other animals, which had not been sacrificed; but merely killed for common use. Even the less scrupulous Jews, knowing that any particular flesh had been thus offered, would abhor the use of it: and as those who lived among the Gentiles, as the Jews at Corinth, must know that this was a common case; hence they would be generally scrupulous; and those of them that were converted to Christianity, would have their scruples increased, and be as rigid on this point as the Karaites themselves. On the other hand, those of the Gentiles, who had received the faith of Christ, knowing that an idol was nothing in the world, nor was even a representation of any thing, (for the beings represented by idol images were purely imaginary,) made no scruple to buy and eat the flesh as they used to do, though not with the same intention: for, when in their heathen state, they ate the flesh offered to idols, they ate it as a feast with the idol, and were thus supposed to have communion with the idol; which was the grossest idolatry.

From these observations, it will at once appear, that much misunderstanding and offence must have existed in the Corinthian church; the converted Jews abominating every thing that they knew had been used in the heathen worship; while the converted Gentiles, for the reasons above assigned, would feel no scruple on the account.

of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one.

Eph. 4. 6. 1 Tim. 2. 5.

We know that we all have knowledge] I am inclined to think that these are not St. Paul's words; but a quotation from the letter of the Corinthians to him; and a proof of what the apostle says below, knowledge puffeth up: but, however the words may be understood as to their origin, they contain a general truth, as they relate to Christians of those times; and may be thus paraphrased: “All we who are converted to God, by Christ, have sufficient knowledge concerning idols and idol worship: and we know also the liberty which we have through the Gospel, not being bound by Jewish laws, rites, ceremonies, &c. but many carry their knowledge in this liberty too far, and do what is neither seemly nor convenient, and thus give offence to others.”

Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth.] This knowledge is very nearly allied to pride; it puffeth up the mind with vain conceit, makes those who have it bold and rash, and renders them careless of the consciences of others. And this knowledge boasted of by the Corinthians, led them to contemn others; for so the word pernit is understood by some eminent critics.

Verse 2. He knoweth nothing yet, &c.] The person who acts in this rash unfeeling way, from the general knowledge which he has of the vanity of idolatry, and the liberty which the Gospel affords from Jewish rites; with all his knowledge, does not know this, that though the first and greatest commandment says, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, &c. yet the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. He then that can torment his neighbour's weak or tender conscience, with his food or his conduct, does not love him as himself; and therefore knows nothing as he ought to know.

Verse 3. But if any man love God] In that way which the commandment requires, which will necessarily beget love to his neighbour, the same is known of him, is approved of God, and acknowledged as his genuine follower.

Verse 4. The things that are offered in sacrifice] See on the first verse.

An idol is nothing in the world] Dr. Lightfoot translates this, we know that there is no idol in the world; which he explains thus—Εἰδωλον, idol, is ομοιωμα, ιματι, ομιμου, χαρακτηρι, σκιαυδου; a likeness, an image, a sign, a character, a shadow: now ουδεν εἰδωλον, signifies there is no idol, no representation of God in the world. Images there are of stone, wood, and metal, but none of these is any representation of the Infinite Spirit. But I prefer the meaning given in the note on verse 1. As the expression, an idol is nothing in the world, was common in the Old Testament, and among the Jews; and was understood by them in this way: they are not

Verse 5. There be that are called gods] There are many images that are supposed to be representations of divinities; but these divinities are nothing; the figments of mere fancy; and these images have no corresponding realities.

Whether in heaven or in earth] As the sun, moon, planets, stars; the ocean, rivers, trees, &c. And thus there are, nominally, gods many, and lords many.

Verse 6. But, to us there is but one God, the Father] Who produced all things, himself uncreated, and un-originated. And we in him, was spiritus us, avros, and we for him; all intelligent beings having been created for the purpose of manifesting his glory, by receiving and reflecting his wisdom, goodness, and truth.

And one Lord Jesus] Only one visible governor of the world and the church; by whom are all things: who was the Creator, as he is the upholder of the universe. And we by him, being brought to the knowledge of the true God, by the revelation of Jesus Christ; for, it is the only begotten Son alone that can reveal the Father. The gods of whom the apostle speaks, were their divinities, or objects of religious worship; the lords were the rulers of the world, such as emperors, who were considered next to gods, and some of them were deified. In opposition to those gods he places God the Father, the fountain of plenitude and being: and in opposition to the lords, he places Jesus Christ, who made and who governs all things. We, as creatures, live in reference, us avros, to him, God the Father, who is the fountain of our being: and, as Christians, we live δι' avros, by or through him, Jesus Christ; by whom we are bought, enlightened, pardoned, and saved.

Verse 7. There is not in every man that knowledge] This is spoken in reference to what is said, ver. 4. We know that an idol is nothing in the world; for some with a conscience of the idol, viz. that it is something, eat it; the flesh that was offered to the idol as a thing thus offered, considering the feast as a sacred banquet, by which they have fellowship with the idol.

And their conscience being weak, not properly instructed in divine things, is defiled: he performs what he does as an act of religious worship, and thus his conscience contracts guilt through this idolatry.

As in the commencement of Christianity among the Jews that were converted, there were many found who incorporated the rites of the law with the principles of the Gospel; so, doubtless, among the Gentiles there were several who did not at once throw aside all their idolatry or idolatrous notions, but preserved some of its more spiritual and imposing parts, and might think it necessary to mingle idolatrous feasts with the rites of Christianity—as the sacrament of the Lord's supper was certainly considered as a feast upon a sacrifice, as I have proved in my Discourse on the Nature and Design of the Eucharist: as the minds of many of these young Gentile converts could not, as yet, have been deeply endued with spiritual knowledge, they might incorporate these feasts, and confound their nature and properties.

Verse 8. Meat commendeth us not to God] No such feasts as these can be a recommendation of our souls or persons to the Supreme Being. As to the thing, considered in itself, the eating gives us no spiritual advantage; and the eating not, is no spiritual loss.

Verse 9. But take heed] Lest by frequenting such feasts, and eating things offered to idols, under the conviction that an idol is nothing, and that you may eat those things innocently; lest this liberty of yours should become a means of grievously offending a weak brother, who has not your knowledge; or inducing one, who respects you for your superior knowledge, to partake of these things with the conscience, the persuasion and belief that an idol is something, and you partake of such things; so he may also, and with safety. He is not possessed of your superior information on this point, and he eats to the idol, what you take as a common meal.

Verse 10. If any man see thee which hast knowledge] Of the true God, and who art reputed for thy skill in divine things.

Sit at meat in the idol's temple] Is it not strange that any, professing the knowledge of the true idol's temple, shall not ^a the conscience of him which is weak be ^b emboldened to eat those things which are offered to idols;

God, should even enter one of those temples! And is it not more surprising that any Christian should be found to feast there? But by all this we may see, that the boasted knowledge of the Corinthians had very little depth in things purely spiritual.

There are many curious, thin-spun theories in the Rabbinical writings, concerning entering idol-temples, and eating there, and even worshipping there; provided the mind be towards the true God. Dr. Lightfoot produces several quotations to prove this. Perhaps the man of knowledge mentioned by the apostle, was one of those who, possessing a convenient conscience, could accommodate himself to all circumstances: be a heathen without, and a Christian within, and vice versa, as circumstances might require.

Be emboldened to eat] Ουδ' ομνισθησεται, be built up, be confirmed and established in that opinion which before he doubtfully held, that on seeing you eat, he may be led to think there is no harm in feasting in an idol temple, nor in eating things offered to idols.

Verse 11. Shall the weak brother perish] Being first taught by thy conduct that there was no harm in thus eating, grieves the Spirit of God, becomes again darkened and hardened; and sliding back into idolatry, dies in it, and so finally perishes.

For whom Christ died] So we learn that a man may perish for whom Christ died—This admits of no quibble. If a man for whom Christ died, apostatizing from Christianity, for he is called a brother, though weak, return again to and die in idolatry, cannot go to heaven; then a man for whom Christ died, may perish everlastingly.

And if it were possible for a believer, whether strong or weak, to retrace his steps back to idolatry and die in it, surely it is possible for a man who had escaped the pollutions that are in the world to return to it, live and die in its spirit, and perish everlastingly also. Let him that readeth understand.

Verse 12. But, when ye sin so against the brethren] Against Christians, who are called by the gospel to abhor and detest all such abominations.

Ye sin against Christ.] By sending to perdition, through your bad example, a soul for whom he shed his blood; and so far defeating the gracious intentions of his sacrificial death. This is a further intimation, that a person for whom Christ died, may perish; and this is the drift of the apostle's argument.

Verse 13. Wherefore, &c.] Rather than give any occasion to a Christian to sin against, 12 But, ^d when ye sin so against the brethren, and wound their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ.

13 Wherefore, ^e if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend.

and so to harden his conscience that he should return to idolatry and perish; I would not only abstain from all meats offered to idols, but I would eat no flesh, should I exist through the whole course of time, but live on the herbs of the field, rather than cause my brother to stumble, and thus fall into idolatry and final ruin.

The following words of Origen contain a very solemn lesson and warning—"If we did more diligently attend to these things, we should avoid sinning against our brethren, and wounding their weak conscience, that we might not sin against Christ; our brethren that are among us, for whom Christ died, often perishing, not only by our knowledge, but by many other ways, and things, in which things, we sinning against Christ, shall suffer punishment: the souls of them that perish by us, being required of, and avenged upon us." See Whitby on this place.

1. The greater our reputation for knowledge and sanctity, the greater mischief we shall do by our influence and example, if we turn aside from the holy commandment delivered unto us. Every man should walk so as either to light or lead his brother to heaven.

2. It is the duty of every Christian to watch against apostacy in his own case, and to prevent it as much as possible in that of others. That a person for whom Christ died may finally perish, is strongly argued, says Dr. Whitby, from this place, and Rom. xiv. 15. for here the apostle dissuades the Corinthians from scandalizing their weak brethren, by an argument taken from the irreparable mischiefs they may do them, the eternal ruin they may bring upon them by this scandal; whereas, if it be, as some assert, that all things, even the sins of the elect, shall work together for their good; and that they shall never perish; if the apostle knew, and taught this doctrine to them, why does he endeavour to fright them from this scandal, by telling them that it might have that effect, which he had before told them was impossible? If you interpret his words thus, so shall he perish, for whom in charity, ye ought to judge Christ died. It is certain from this doctrine, that they must be assured that this judgment of charity must be false; or that their brother could not perish. In the first place, they could not be obliged to act by it: and in the second, they could not rationally be moved by it to abstain from giving scandal on that impossible supposition.

If you interpret the apostle thus, So shall those do that which, in its nature, tends to make thy brother perish; and might have that effect, had not God determined to preserve all from perish- ing, for whom Christ died. Since this determination renders it sure to me, who know it, that they cannot actually perish, it must assure me that there can be no cause of abstinency from this scandal, lest they should perish by it.

Moreover, by thus offending, saith the apostle, ye sin against Christ; viz. by sinning against him whom he has purchased by his blood; and destroying them for whose salvation he has suffered. If this intent of Christ's death be denied, how can we show in what Christ has demonstrated his great love to them that perish? Is it possible that they can sin against redeeming love? and how, by thus offending them who neither do nor can belong to him as members of his mystical body, are we injurious to Christ? See Whitby on this place.

3. It is natural for man to wish and affect to be wise; and when this desire is cultivated in reference to lawful objects, it will be an indescribable good: but when, like Eve, we see in a prohibition, something to be desired to make one wise, we are then, like her, on the verge of our fall. Though extensive knowledge is not given to all, yet it is given for all; and is the public property of the church. He who does not use it for general edification, robs the public of its right. For the misuse and misapplication of this talent, we shall give account to God, as well as of other gifts and graces.

4. Persons of an over-tender and scrupulous conscience, may be very troublesome in a Christian society; but as this excessive scrupulosity comes from want of more light, more experience, or more judgment, we should bear with them. Though such should often run into ridiculous extremes, yet we must take care that we do not attempt to cure them either with ridicule or wrath. Extremes generally beget extremes; and such persons require the most judicious treatment, else they will soon be stumbled and turned out of the way. We should be very careful lest in using what is called Christian liberty, we occasion their fall; and for our own sake, we must take heed that we do not denominate sinful indulgences, Christian liberties.

5. Though we are bound to take heed that we put not a stumblingblock in the way of a weak brother; yet if such a brother be stumbled at any part of our conduct which is not blameable in itself; but of which he may have taken a wrong view; we are not answerable for the consequences. We are called to walk by the testimony of God; not according to the measure of any man's conscience, how sincere soever he may be.

6. Many persons cover a spirit of envy and uncharitableness, with the name of godly zeal, and tender concern for the salvation of others; they find fault with all; their spirit is a spirit of universal censoriousness; none can please them; and every one suffers by them. These destroy more souls by tything mint, and cummin, than others do by neglecting the weightier matters of the law. Such persons have what is termed, and very properly too, sour godliness. Both are extremes, and he who would avoid perdition must avoid them.

CHAPTER IX.

St. Paul vindicates his apostleship, and shows that he has equal rights and privileges with Peter and the brethren of our Lord; and that he is not bound, while doing the work of an apostle, to labour with his hands for his own support, 1—6. He who labours should live by the fruit of his own industry, 7. For the law will not allow even the ox to be muzzled which treads out the corn, 8—10. Those who minister in spiritual things, have a right to a secular support for their work, 11—14. He shows the disinterested manner in which he has preached the Gospel, 15—18. How he accommodated himself to the prejudices of men, in order to bring about their salvation, 19—23. The way to heaven compared to a race, 24. The qualifications of those who may expect success in the games celebrated at Corinth, and what that success implies, 25. The apostle applies these things spiritually to himself; and states the necessity of keeping his body in subjection, lest after having proclaimed salvation to others, he should become a cast-away, 26, 27.

NOTES ON CHAP. IX.

Verse 1. Am I not an apostle?] It is sufficiently evident that there were persons at Corinth, who questioned the apostleship of St. Paul, and he was obliged to walk very circumspectly, that they might not find any occasion against him. It appears also that he had given them all his apostolical labours gratis; and even this, which was the highest proof of his disinterested benevolence, was produced by his opposers, as an argument against him. "Prophets, and all divinely commissioned men, have a right to their secular support; you take nothing;—is this not from a conviction that you have no apostolical right ?^m On this point the apostle immediately enters on his own defence.

Am I not an apostle? Am I not free? These questions are all designed as assertions of the affirmative: I am an apostle, and I am free, possessed of all the rights and privileges of an apostle.

Have I not seen Jesus Christ? From whom, in his personal appearance to me, I have received my apostolic commission. This was judged essentially necessary to constitute an apostle. See Acts xxiii. 14, 15. xxvi. 16.

Are ye not my work? Your conversion from heathenism is a proof that I have preached with the divine unction and authority.

Several good MSS. and Versions transpose the two first questions in this verse, thus; Am I not free? Am I not an apostle? But I cannot see that either perspicuity of sense gains any thing by this arrangement. On the contrary, it appears to me that his being an apostle gave him the freedom or rights to which he refers, and therefore the common arrangement I judge to be the best.

Verse 2. If I be not an apostle unto others? If there be other churches which have been founded by other apostles; yet it is not so with you.

The seal of mine apostleship are ye? Your conversion to Christianity, is God's seal to my apostleship. Had not God sent me, I could not have profited your souls.

The σφραγις, or seal, was a figure cut in a stone, and that set in a ring, by which letters of credence and authority were stamped. The ancients, particularly the Greeks, excelled in this kind of engraving. The cabinets of the curious give ample proof of this; and the moderns contend in vain to rival the perfection of those ancient masters.

In the Lord? The apostle shows that it was by the grace and influence of God alone, that he was an apostle; and that they were converted to Christianity.

Verse 3. Mine answer to them? Η μιν ἀπελόγηται τοις μοι ἀναρνύσθω. This is my defence against those who examine me. The words are forensic; and the apostle considers himself as brought before a legal tribunal; and questioned so, as to be obliged to answer as upon oath. His defence, therefore, was this, that they were converted to God by his means. This verse belongs to the two preceding verses.

Verse 4. Have we not power to eat and to drink? Have we not authority or right, ἐουσις, to expect sustenance, while we are labouring for your salvation? Meat and drink, the necessities, not the superfluities, of life were what those primitive messengers of Christ required; it was just that they who laboured in the Gospel, should live by the Gospel; they did not wish to make a fortune, or accumulate wealth; a living was all they desired. It was probably in reference to the same moderate and reasonable desire that the provision made for the clergy in this country, was called a living; and their work for which they got this living, was called the cure of souls. Whether we derive the word cure from cura, care, as signifying that the care of all the souls in a particular parish or place, devolves on the minister, who is to instruct them in the things of salvation, and lead them to heaven: or whether we consider the term as implying that the souls in that district are in a state of spiritual disease, and the minister is a spiritual physician, to whom the cure of these souls is entrusted, still we must consider that such a labourer is worthy of his hire; and he that preaches the Gospel, should live by the Gospel.

Verse 5. Have we not power to lead about a sister, a wife? The word ἀδελφίστρα, is to be understood here as above in ver. 4. as implying authority or right; and authority not merely derived from their offices, but from him who gave them that office: from the constitution of nature, and from universal propriety or the fitness of things.

When the apostle speaks of leading about a sister, a wife, he means first that he and all other apostles, and consequently all ministers of the Gospel, had a right to marry. For it appears that our Lord's brethren, James and Jude, were married; and we have infallible evidence that Peter was a married man, not only from this verse, but from Matt. viii. 14. where his mother-in-law is mentioned as being cured by our Lord of a fever.

And, secondly, we find that their wives were persons of the same faith; for less can never be implied in the word sister. This is a decisive proof against the papistical celibacy of the clergy; and as to their attempts to evade the force of this text by saying that the apostles had holy women who attended them, and ministered to them in their peregrinations, there is no proof of it; nor could they have suffered either young women, or other men's wives, to have accompanied them in this way, without giving the most palpable occasion of scandal. And Clemens Alexandrinus has particularly remarked that the apostles carried their wives about with them "not as wives, but as sisters, that they might minister to those who were mistresses of families; that so the doctrine of the Lord might, without reprehension or evil suspicion, enter into the apartments of the women." And in giving his finished picture of his Gnostic, or perfect Christian, he says; ὁμοῦ καὶ γυναῖκα, καὶ

Verse 6. Or I only and Barnabas] Have we alone, of all the apostles, no right to be supported by our converts? It appears from this,
 1. That the apostles did not generally support themselves by their own labour. 2. That Paul and Barnabas did thus support themselves.
 Some of the others probably had not a business at which they could conveniently work;
 But Paul and Barnabas had a trade at which they could conveniently labour wherever they came.

Verse 7. Who goeth a warfare—at his own charges?] These questions, which are all supposed, from the necessity and propriety of the cases, to be answered in the affirmative, tend more forcibly to point out that the common sense of man joins with the providence of God, in showing the propriety of every man living by the fruits of his labour. The first question applies particularly to the case of the apostle, τὸ σπασσας σικνας αλωνισ. Does a soldier provide his own victuals?—Ολωνισ, is used to express the military pay or wages, by the Greek writers; for the Roman soldiers were paid not only in money but in victuals; and hence corn was usually distributed among them. See on Luke iii. 14.

Verse 8. Say I these things as a man?] Is this only human reasoning? or does not God say in effect the same things? See note on Rom. vi. 19.

Verse 9. Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox] See this largely explained in the note on Deut. xxv. 4.

Doth God take care for oxen?] This question is to be understood thus: Is it likely that God should be solicitous for the comfort of oxen, and be regardless of the welfare of man? In this divine precept, the kindness and providential care of God are very forcibly pointed out. He takes care of oxen: he wills them all that happiness of which their nature is susceptible; and can we suppose that he is unwilling that the human soul shall have that happiness which is suited to its spiritual and eternal nature? He 10 Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written: that he that plough-eth should plough in hope; and that he that thresheth in hope should be part-taker of his hope.

could not reprobate an ox, because, the Lord careth for oxen; and surely he cannot reprobate a man. It may be said, the man has sinned, but the ox cannot. I answer, the decree of reprobation is supposed to be from all eternity; and certainly a man can no more sin before he exists, than an ox can when he exists.

Verse 10. And he that thresheth in hope, should be partaker of his hope.] Instead of ελων τις σπιδος αυτου μετιχων, εσ' ωπιδι, many of the best MSS. and Versions read the passage thus, ελων εσ' ωπιδι του μετιχων. And he who thresheth in hope of partaking. "The words τις σπιδος, which are omitted by the above, are," says Bishop Pearce, "superfluous, if not wrong; for men do not live in hope to partake of their hope, but to partake of what was the object and end of their hope. When these words are left out, the former and latter sentence will be both of a piece, and more resembling each other; for μετιχων, may be understood after the first εσ' ωπιδι, as well as after the last." Griesbach has left the words in question out of the text.

Verse 11. If we have sown unto you spiritual things] If we have been the means of bringing you into a state of salvation, by the divine doctrines which we have preached unto you: is it too much for us to expect a temporal support, when we give ourselves up entirely to this work?
 Every man who preaches the Gospel, has a right to his own support and that of his family, while thus employed.

Verse 12. If others be partakers of this power] If those who in any matter serve you, have a right to a recompense for that service; surely we, who have served you in the most essential matters, have a right to our support while thus employed in your service.

We have not used this power] Though we had this right, we have not availed ourselves of it; but have worked with our hands to bear our own charges, lest any of you should think that we preached the Gospel merely to procure a temporal support, and so be prejudiced against us; and thus prevent our success in the salvation of your souls.

Verse 13. They which minister about holy things] All the officers about the temple, whether priests, Levites, Nethinim, &c. had a right to their support while employed in its service. The 12 Nevertheless we have not used this power; but suffer all things,^b lest we should hinder the Gospel of Christ.

13 ^c Do ye not know that they which minister about holy things,^d live of the things of the temple? and they which wait at the altar, are partakers with the altar?

14 Even so ^e hath the Lord ordained that they which preach the Gospel should live of the Gospel.

15 But ^f I have used none of these things; neither have I written these things, that it should be so done unto me: for ^g it were better for me to die,

^a Acts 20. 33. Ver. 15. 18. 2 Cor. 11. 7. 9. & 12. 13. 1 Thess. 2. 6.—^b 2 Cor. 11. 12.—^c Lev. 6. 16. 26. & 7. 6. &c. Numb. 5. 9. 10. & 18. 8.—^d Deut. 10. 9. & 18. 1.—^e Or. fiat.—^f Matt. 10. 10. Luke 10. 7.—^g Gal. 6. 6. 1 Tim. 5. 17.

priests partook of the sacrifices; the others had their maintenance from tithes, first-fruits, and offerings made to the temple; for it was not lawful for them to live on the sacrifices. Hence the apostle makes the distinction between those who minister about holy things, and those who wait at the altar.

Verse 14. Even so hath the Lord ordained] This is evidently a reference to our Lord's ordination, Matt. x. 10. The workman is worthy of his meat. And Luke x. 7. For the labourer is worthy of his hire. And in both places it is the preacher of the Gospel, of whom he is speaking. It was a maxim among the Jews, "that the inhabitants of a town where a wise man had made his abode, should support him; because he had forsaken the world and its pleasures, to study those things by which he might please God, and be useful to men." See an ordinance to this effect, in the tract Shabbath, fol. 114.

Verse 15. Neither have I written, &c.] Though I might plead the authority of God in the law, of Christ in the Gospel, the common consent of our own doctors, and the usages of civil society, yet I have not availed myself of my privileges; nor do I now write with the intention to lay in my claims.

Verse 16. For though I preach the Gospel] I have cause of glorying that I preach the Gospel free of all charges to you; but I cannot glory in being a preacher of the Gospel; because I am not such either by my own skill or power: I have received both the office, and the grace by which I execute the office, from God. I have not only his authority to preach, but that authority obliges me to preach; and if I did not, I should endanger my salvation: yea, wo is unto me, if I preach not the Gospel. As every genuine preacher receives his commission from God alone; it is God alone who can take it away. Wo to that man who runs when God has not sent him; and wo to him who refuses than that any man should make my glorying void.

16 For though I preach the Gospel, I have nothing to glory of: for ^h necessity is laid upon me: yea, wo is unto me, if I preach not the Gospel!

17 For if I do this thing willingly, ⁱ I have a reward; but if against my will, ^j a dispensation of the Gospel is committed unto me.

18 What is my reward then? Verily that, ^k when I preach the Gospel, I may make the Gospel of Christ without charge, that I ^l abuse not my power in the Gospel.

^e Ver. 12. Acts 18. 3. & 20. 34. Ch. 4. 12. 1 Thess. 2. 9. 2 Thess. 3. 8.—^f 2 Cor. 11. 10.—^g Rom. 1. 14.—^h Ch. 3. 8. 14.—ⁱ Ch. 4. 1. Gal. 2. 7. Phil. 1. 17. Col. 1. 25.—^j Ch. 10. 33. 2 Cor. 4. 5. & 11. 7.—^k Ch. 7. 31.

to run, or who ceases to run, when God has sent him.

Verse 17. For if I do this thing willingly] If I be a cordial co-operator with God, I have a reward, an incorruptible crown, ver. 25. Or, if I freely preach this Gospel without being burdensome to any, I have a special reward; but, if I do not, I have simply an office to fulfil, into which God has put me; and may fulfil it conscientiously, and claim my privileges at the same time; but then I lose that special reward, which I have in view by preaching the Gospel without charge to any.

This, and the 18th verse, have been variously translated: Sir Norton Knatchbull, and after him Mr. Wakefield, translate the two passages thus: For, if I do this willingly, I have a reward; but if I am entrusted with an office without my consent, what is my reward? to make the Gospel of Christ, whilst I preach it, without charge, in not using to the utmost, my privileges in the Gospel.

Others render the passage thus: But if I do it merely because I am obliged to it, I only discharge an office that is committed to me, ver. 18. For what then shall be my reward? It is for this, that preaching the Gospel of Christ, I preach it freely, and do not insist on a claim which the Gospel itself gives me

Verse 18. That I abuse not my power] I am inclined to think that καταχρησάμενος is to be understood here, not in the sense of abusing, but of using to the uttermost; exacting every thing that a man can claim by law. How many proofs have we of this in preachers of different denominations, who insist so strongly, and so frequently, on their privileges, as they term them; that the people are tempted to believe they seek not their souls' interests, but their secular goods. Such preachers can do the people no good. But the people who are most liable to think thus of their ministers, are those who are unwilling to grant the common necessities of life to those who watch over them in the Lord. For there are such people even in the Christian church! If the preachers of the Gospel were as parsimonious of the bread of life, as some congregations and Christian societies are of the bread that perisheth; and if the preacher gave them a spiritual nourishment, as base, as mean, and as scanty as the temporal support which they afford him, their souls must, without doubt, have nearly a famine of the bread of life.

Verse 19. For though I be free] Although I am under no obligation to any man; yet I act as if every individual had a particular property in me; and as if I were the slave of the public.

Verse 20. Unto the Jews I became as a Jew] In Acts xvi. 3. we find that, for the sake of the unconverted Jews, he circumcised Timothy. See the note there.

To them that are under the law] To those who considered themselves still under obligation to observe its rites and ceremonies, though they had, in the main, embraced the Gospel, he became as if under the same obligations; and therefore purified himself in the temple, as we find related, Acts xx. 21—26. where, also, see the notes.

After the first clause, To them that are under the law, as under the law; the following words as if I were under the law, not being myself under the law, are added by ABCDEFG. several others; the latter Syriac, Sahidic, Armenian, Vulgate, and all the Itala: Cyril, Chrysostom, Damascenus, and others; and on this evidence Griesbach has received them into the text.

Verse 21. To them that are without law] The Gentiles who had no written law; though they had the law written in their hearts: see on Rom. ii. 15.

Being not without law to God] Instead of Θεω, το God, and Χριστω, το Christ; the most important MSS. and Versions have Θεω, or God, and Χριστω, of Christ: being not without the law of God, but under the law of Christ.

Them that are without law] Dr. Lightfoot thinks the Sadducees may be meant; and that, in certain cases, as far as the rites and ceremonies of the Jewish religion were concerned, he might conform himself to them, not observing such rites and ceremonies, as it is well known that they disregarded them: for the Dr. cannot see how the apostle could conform himself in any thing to them that were without law, i. e. the Heathen. But, 1st, it is not likely that the ap- tle would conform himself to the Sadducees: for, what success could he expect among a people who denied the resurrection; and, consequently, a future world, a day of judgment, and all rewards and punishments? 2. He might, among the heathen, appear as if he were not a Jew, and discourse with them on the great principles of that eternal law, the outlines of which had been written in their hearts: in order to show them the necessity of embracing that Gospel, which was the power of God unto salvation, to every one that believed.

Verse 22. To the weak became I as weak] Those who were conscientiously scrupulous, even in respect to lawful things.

I am made all things to all men] I assumed every shape and form consistent with innocency and perfect integrity; giving up my own will, my own way, my own ease, my own pleasure, and my own profit, that I might save the souls of all. Let those who plead for the system of accommodation, on the example of St. Paul, attend to the end he had in view; and the manner in which he pursued that end. It was not to get money, influence, or honour, but to save souls! It was not to get ease, but to increase his labours. It was not to save his life, but rather that it should be a sacrifice for the good of immortal souls!

A parallel saying to this of St. Paul, has been quoted from Achilles Tattius, lib. v. cap. xix. where Clitophon says, on having received a letter from Leucippe, Τουτοις εντυχα, παντα εγινον μνη, ομοσ, απολεγεμνη, οχρμω, θαυμαστον, πιστευω, εχαμω, ηχθουμνη. "When I read the contents, I became all things at once: I was inflamed; I grew pale; I was struck with wonder; I doubted; I rejoiced; I became sad." The same form of speech is frequent among Greek writers. I think this casts some light on the apostle's meaning.

That I might by all means save some] On this clause there are some very important readings found in the MSS. and Versions. Instead of παντας εναν σωσω, that I might by all means save some; παντας σωσω, that I might save all, is the reading of DEFG. Syriac, Vulgate, Ethiopic, all the Itala, and several of the Fathers. This reading Bishop Pearce prefers, because it is more agreeable to St. Paul's meaning here, and exactly agrees with what he says, chap. x. 33. and makes his design more extensive and noble. Wakefield also prefers this reading.

A. M. 4060. 23 And this I do for the Gospel's sake, that I might be partaker thereof with you.

Verse 23. And this I do for the Gospel's sake] Instead of τοῦτο, this, πάντα, all things, (I do all things for the Gospel's sake,) is the reading of ABCDEFG. several others, the Coptic, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Itala, Armenian, and Sahidic: the two latter reading πάντα πάντα, all these things. Several of the Fathers have the same reading: and there is much reason to believe it to be genuine.

That I might be partaker thereof with you.] That I might attain to the reward of eternal life, which it sets before me; and this is in all probability the meaning of το ἀγῶνιστος, which we translate the Gospel; and which should be rendered here, prize or reward: this is a frequent meaning of the original word, as may be seen in my preface to St. Matthew: I do all this for the sake of the prize, that I may partake of it with you.

Verse 24. They which run in a race, run all] It is sufficiently evident that the apostle alludes to the athletic exercises in the games, which were celebrated every fifth year on the isthmus, or narrow neck of land, which joins the Peloponnesus, or Morea, to the main land; and were thence termed the Isthmian games. The exercises were running, wrestling, boxing, throwing the discus, or quoit, &c. to the three first of these the apostle especially alludes.

But one receiveth the prize?] The apostle places the Christian race in contrast to the Isthmian games; in them, only one received the prize, though all ran: in this, if all run, all will receive the prize: therefore, he says, so run, that ye may obtain. Be as much in earnest to get to heaven as the others are to gain their prize: and, although only one of them can win, all of you may obtain.

Verse 25. Is temperate in all things] All those who contended in these exercises, went through a long state and series of painful preparations. To this exact discipline Epictetus refers, cap. 35. Θέλεις Ολυμπιακὸν βίβλος; Δι' ὅ' ὑπάρχει, ἀνελευτέροφι, ἀπυξοῦσαι πνεύματος, γυμναζοῦσθαι πρὸς ἀνάγειν ἢ πρὸς τεταρῆσαι, ἢ καυμάτι, ἢ ψυχῇ μὴ ψυχῇ πίνει, μὴ οἶνον ἢ στυχῶν ἀλάς, ἢ ἰατρῶν, περιδιδάσκουσαι σκευτὸν τῶ ἀγῶνι; ἢ αὐτὸ ἀγῶνι παρηγοροῦσαι; &c. &c. "Do you wish to gain the prize at the Olympic games?—Consider the requisite preparations, and the consequences: You must observe a strict regimen; must live on food which you dislike; you must abstain from all delicacies; must exercise yourself at the necessary and prescribed times both in heat and in cold; you must drink nothing cooling; take no wine as formerly: in a word, you must the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible.

26 I therefore so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateeth the air:

2 Tim. 2. 5. & 4. 7.—> 2 Tim. 4. 8. James 1. 12. 1 Pet. 1. 4. & 5. 4. Rev. 2. 10. & 3. 11.—> 2 Tim. 2. 5.

put yourself under the directions of a pugilist, as you would under those of a physician; and afterward enter the lists. Here you may get your arm broken, your foot put out of joint, be obliged to swallow mouthfuls of dust, to receive many stripes; and, after all, be conquered." Thus we find, that these suffered much hardships in order to conquer; and yet were uncrtain of the victory.

Horace speaks of it in nearly the same way—

Qui studet optatum curam contingere metum, Multa tulit fecitque puer: sudavit et alsit, Abstulit Venere et Baccho.

De Arte Poet. ver. 412.

A youth who hopes the Olympic prize to gain, All arts must try, and every toil sustain; Th' extremes of heat and cold must often prove;

And shun the weakening joys of wine and love.

Francis.

These quotations show the propriety of the apostle's words: Every man that striveth for the mastery, πάντα ὑπερβύσσει, is temperate, or continent, in all things.

They do it to obtain a corruptible crown] The crown won by the victor in the Olympian games, was made of the wild olive; in the Pythian games, of laurel; in the Nemean games, of parsley; and in the Isthmian games, of the pine. These were all corruptible, for they began to wither as soon as they were separated from the trees, or plucked out of the earth. In opposition to these, the apostle says, he contended for an incorruptible crown; the heavenly inheritance. He sought not worldly honour; but that honour which comes from God.

Verse 26. I therefore so run, not as uncertainly] In the foot-course in those games, how many soever ran, only one could have the prize, however strenuously they might exert themselves; therefore all ran uncertainly; but it was widely different in the Christian course; if every one ran as he ought, each would receive the prize.

The word ἀβλῶς, which we translate uncertainly, has other meanings. 1. It signifies ignorantly; I do not run like one ignorant of what he is about; or of the laws of the course: I know that there is an eternal life: I know the way that leads to it; and I know and feel the power of it. 2. It signifies without observation; the eyes of all the spectators were fixed on those who ran in these races; and to gain the applause of the multitude, they stretched every nerve: the apostle knew that the eyes of all were fixed upon him—1. His false brethren waited for his halting—2. The persecuting Jews and Gentiles longed for his downfall—3. The church of Christ looked on him with anxiety—4. And he acted in all things as under the immediate eye of God.

Not as one that beateth the air] Kypke observes that there are three ways in which persons were said apud Deos, to beat the air. 1. When in practising for the combat, they threw their arms and legs about in different ways, thus practising the attitudes of offence and defence. This was termed εὐαμαχία, fighting with a shadow. To this Virgil alludes when representing Dares swinging his arms about, when he rose to challenge a competitor in the boxing match:—

*Talis prima Dares caput altum in praelia tollit, Ostenditque humeros latos, alternaque jactat
Brachia protendens, et verberat ictibus auras.*

Æn. v. ver. 375.

Thus, glorying in his strength, in open view His arms around the towering Dares threw;
Stalk'd high, and laid his brawny shoulders bare,
And dealt his whistling blows in empty air.

Pitt.

2. Sometimes boxers were to aim blows at their adversaries which they did not intend to take place; and which the others were obliged to exert themselves to prevent as much as if they had been really intended; and, by these means, some dexterous pugilists vanquished their adversaries by mere fatigue, without giving them a single blow. 3. Pugilists were said to beat the air when having to contend with a nimble adversary, who, by running from side to side, stooping, and various contortions of the body, eluded the blows of his antagonist; who spent his strength on the air, frequently missing his aim, and sometimes overturning himself, in attempting to hit his adversary, when this, by his agility, had been able to elude the blow. We have an example of this in Virgil's account of the boxing match between Entellus and Dares, so well told, Æneid. v. verse 426, &c. and which will give us a proper view of the subject to which the apostle alludes:—viz. boxing at the Isthmian games.

Both on the tiptoe stand, at full extent;
Their arms aloft, their bodies inly bent;
Their heads from aiming blows, they bear afar,
With clashing gauntlets then provoke the war.
One [Dares] on his youth and pliant limbs relies;

One [Entellus] on his sinews, and his giant size.
The last is stiff with age, his motions slow;
He heaves for breath, he staggers to and fro.—
Yet equal in success, they ward, they strike;
Their ways are different, but their art alike.
Before, behind, the blows are dealt; around
Their hollow sides the rattling thumps resound.
A storm of strokes well meant, with fury flies,
And errs about their temples, ears, and eyes:
Nor always errs; for oft the gauntlet draws
A sweeping stroke along the crackling jaws;

Hoary with age, Entellus stands his ground;
But with his warping body wards the wound;
His head and watchful eye keep even pace,
While Dares traverses, and shifts his place;
And like a captain who beleaguers round
Some strong built castle, on a rising ground;
Views all th' approaches, with observing eyes,
This and that other part, in vain he tries;
And more on industry than force relies.

With hands on high, Entellus threatens the foe:
But Dares watch'd the motion from below,
And slipp'd aside, and shunn'd the long descending blow.

Entellus wastes his forces on the wind;
And thus deluded of the stroke designed,
Headlong and heavy fell: his ample breast,
And weighty limbs, his ancient mother press'd.
So falls a hollow pine, that long had stood On Ida's height, or Erymanthus' wood.—

Dauntless he rose, and to the fight returned,
With shame his cheeks, his eyes with fury burn'd:
Disdain and conscious virtue fir'd his breast,
And with redoubled force, his foe he press'd;
He lays on loads with either hand amain;
And headlong drives the Trojan o'er the plain,
Nor stops, nor stays; nor rest nor breath allows;
But storms of strokes descend about his brows;
A rattling tempest, and a hail of blows.

Dryden.

To such a combat as this the apostle most manifestly alludes: and, in the above description, the reader will see the full force and meaning of the words, so fight I, not as one that beateh the air: I have a real and a deadly foe; and, as I fight not only for my honour but for my life, I aim every blow well, and do execution with each.

No man, who had not seen such a fight, could have given such a description as that above: and we may fairly presume that when Virgil was in Greece, he saw such a contest at the Isthmian games; and therefore was enabled to paint from nature.

Homer has the same image of missing the foe, and beating the air, when describing Achilles attempting to kill Hector; who by his agility and skill, (Poeticâ by Apollo,) eluded the blow:—

Τῆς μὴ ὄντι' ἐπορεύετο ποδάρκῃς διὸς Ἀχιλλεύου Ἐρχοι χελεύων, τρις δ' ἄρα τυλάεσθε βαθείαν.

ILIAD. lib. xx. ver. 445.

Thrice struck Pelides with indignant heart, Thrice, in impassive air, he plunged the dart.

Pope.

Verse 27. But I keep under my body, &c.] This is an allusion not only to boxers, but also to wrestlers in the same games; as we may learn from the word υπνεύω, which signifies to hit in the eyes; and δουλεῖω, which signifies to trip, and give the antagonist a fall, and then keep him down when he was down; and, having obliged him to acknowledge himself conquered, make him a slave. The apostle considers his body as an enemy with which he must contend; he must mortify it by self-denial, abstinence, and severe labour; it must be the slave of his soul, and not the soul the slave of the body; which, in all unregenerate men, is the case.

Let—having preached to others] The word κηρύξας, which we translate having preached, refers to the office of the κηρξ, or herald at these games, whose business it was to proclaim the conditions of the games, display the prizes, exhort the combatants, excite the emulation of those who were to contend, declare the terms of each contest, pronounce the names of the victors, and put the crown on their heads. See my observations on this office in the notes at the end of Matt. iii.

Should be a cast-away] The word ἀδοκίμος, signifies such a person as the ἀρκευται, or judges of the games, reject as not having deserved the prize. So Paul himself might be rejected by the Great Judge; and to prevent this, he ran, he contended, he denied himself, and brought his body into subjection to his spirit, and had his spirit governed by the Spirit of God. Had this heavenly man lived in our days, he would, by a certain class of people, have been deemed a legalist; a people who widely differ from the practice of the apostle; for they are conformed to the world, and they feed themselves without fear.

On the various important subjects in this chapter I have already spoken in great detail; not, indeed, all that might be said, but as much as is necessary. A few general observations will serve to recapitulate and impress what has been already said.

1. St. Paul contends that a preacher of the Gospel has a right to his support: and he has proved this from the law, from the Gospel, and from the common sense and consent of men. If a man who does not labour, takes his maintenance from the church of God, it is not only a domestic theft, but a sacrilege: He that gives up his time to this labour, has a right to the support of himself and family: he who takes more than is sufficient for this purpose, is a covetous hireling. He who does nothing for the cause of God and religion, and yet obliges the church to support him, and minister to his idleness, irregularities, luxury, avarice, and ambition, is a monster, for whom human language has not yet got a name.

2. Those who refuse the labourer his hire, are condemned by God, and by God men. How liberal are many to public places of amusement, or to some popular charity, where their names are sure to be published abroad; while the man who watches over their souls, is fed with the most parsimonious hand! Will not God abate this pride, and reprove this hard-heartedness?

3. As the husbandman ploughs and sows in hope, and the God of Providence makes him a partaker of his hope; let the upright preachers of God's word take example and encouragement by him. Let them labour in hope; God will not permit them to spend their strength for nought. Though much of their seed; through the fault of the bad ground, may be unfruitful; yet some will spring up unto eternal life.

4. St. Paul became all things to all men, that he might gain all. This was not the effect of a fickle or man-pleasing disposition; no man was ever a more firm or decided character than St. Paul: but, whenever he could, with a good conscience, yield so as to please his neighbour, for his good to edification, he did so; and his yielding disposition was a proof of the greatness of his soul. The unyielding and obstinate mind, is always a little mind: a want of true greatness always produces obstinacy and peevishness. Such a person as St. Paul is a blessing wherever he goes: on the contrary, the obstinate hogish man, is either a general curse, or a general cross: and if a preacher of the Gospel, his is a burdensome ministry. Reader, let me ask thee a question: If there be no gentleness in thy manners, is there any in thy heart? If there be little of Christ without, can there be much of Christ within?

5. A few general observations on the Grecian games may serve to recapitulate the subject in the four last verses.

1. The Isthmian games were celebrated among the Corinthians; and therefore the apostle addresses them, ver. 24. know ye not, &c.

2. Of the five games there used, the apostle speaks only of three, RUNNING, ver. 23. they which run in a race; and ver. 26. I therefore so run, not as uncertainly. WRESTLING, ver. 25. every man that striveth; ἰσχυρίζομαι, he who wrestleth. BOXING, ver. 26, 27. so fight I, not as one that beateth the air; ὡς τὰ πικτῶα, so fist I, so I hit; but I keep my body under; ντρανίζω, I hit in the eye, I make the face black and blue.

3. He who won the race by running, was to observe the laws of racing: keeping within the white line, which marked out the path or compass in which they ran; and he was also to outrun the rest, and to come first to the goal: otherwise, he ran uncertainly, ver. 24, 26. and was ἀδοκιμος, one to whom the prize could not be adjudged by the judges of the games.

4. The athletic combatants, or wrestlers, observed a set diet: see the quotation from Epicteetus, under ver. 25. And this was a regimen both for quantity and quality: and they carefully abstained from all things that might render them less able for the combat: whence the apostle says they were temperate in all things, ver. 25.

5. No person who was not of respectable family and connexions was permitted to be a competitor at the Olympic games. St. Chrysostom, in whose time these games were still celebrated, assures us that no man was suffered to enter the lists, who was either a servant or a slave, οὐδὲς ἀγορίζεται δούλος, οὐδὲς στρατιώτης οἰκίτης. And if any such was found who had got himself inserted on the military list, his name was erased, and he was expelled, and punished. Αἶψά ἐξ ἄλλο δούλος σὲ, μὴτα τιμαρίας ἐκβάλλεται τοῦ τῶν στρατιωτῶν καταλόγου. To prevent any person of bad character from entering the lists at the Olympic games, the kerux, or herald, was accustomed to proclaim aloud in the theatre, when the combatant was brought forth, Μὴ τις τοῦτου κτήτορι; ἢ ἐστὶν ἀποσκευασμένος τῆς δουλίας, τῆς ντροφῆς ὡς αὐτὸς τοῦ ἀγῶνα μίλωναι: Who can accuse this man? For which he gives this reason; "that, being free from all suspicion of being in a state of slavery, (and elsewhere he says of being a thief, or of corrupt morals,) he might enter the lists with credit." Chrysost. Homil. in Inscript. Altaris, &c. vol. iii. pag. 59. Edit. Benedict.

6. The boxers used to prepare themselves by a sort of εὐμομαχία, or going through all their postures of defence and attack, when no adversary was before them. This was termed beating the air, ver. 26. but when such came to the combat, they endeavoured to blind their adversaries by hitting them in the eye, which is the meaning of ντρανίζω, as we have seen under ver. 27.

7. The rewards of all these exercises were only a crown made of the leaves of some plant, or the bough of some tree, the olive, bay, laurel, parsley, &c. called here by the apostle θάβρον, στέφανον, a corruptible, withering, and fading crown, while he and his fellow Christians expected a crown incorruptible and immortal, and that could not fade away.

8. On the subject of the possibility of St. Paul becoming a cast-away, much has been said in contradiction to his own words; He most absolutely states the possibility of the case: and who has a right to call this in question? The ancient Greek commentators, as Whitby has remarked, have made a good use of the apostle's saying, Εἰς δὲ Παῦλος τούτω δάδαις, ὁ τασοῦτος δίδαξαι, τί αὐτὸν ὑπομῖν ἡμῖς; "If Paul, so great a man, one who had preached and laboured so much, dreaded this, what cause have we to fear lest this should befall us!"

9. On the necessity of being workers together with God, in order to avoid apostasy, Clemens Alexandrinus has some useful observations in his Stromata, lib. vii. pag. 448. Edit. Oberthur—Ὡς δὲ, says he, ὁ ἰατρός, ὕμῶν παρῆρται τοῖς συνεργῶσι πρὸς ὑμᾶς, οὕτως καὶ ὁ Θεὸς τῶν αἰδίων σωτηρίας τοῖς συνεργῶσι πρὸς ἡμᾶς τὴν καὶ ὑπερῶν. "As a physician gives health to those who cooperate with him in their cure; so God also gives eternal salvation to them who are workers together with him in knowledge and a godly life." "Therefore," says he, "it is well said among the Greeks, that when a certain wrestler, who had long injured his body to many exercises, was going to the Olympic games, as he was passing by the statue of Jupiter, he offered up this prayer, Εἰ πάντα, ὦ Ζεῦ, δοῦτος μοι τα πρὸς τοῦ ἀγῶνα παρῆρταις, ἀπὸς φερον δίκαιος τῶν ἡμῶν ἡμῶν. 'Ο Jupiter, if I have performed every thing as I ought, in reference to this contest, grant me the victory!'"—May we not feel something of this spirit in seeking the kingdom of God? And can any thing of this kind be supposed to derogate from the glory of Christ? St. Paul himself says, if a man contend for the mastery, yet is he not crowned except he strive lawfully. Shall we pretend to be wiser than the apostle, and say, that we may gain the crown, though we neither fight the good fight, nor finish the course?

CHAPTER X.

Peculiar circumstances in the Jewish history were typical of the greatest mysteries of the Gospel; particularly their passing through the Red Sea, and being overshadowed with the miraculous cloud, 1, 2. The manna with which they were fed, 3. And rock out of which they drank, 4. The punishments inflicted on them for their disobedience, are warnings to us, 5. We should not lust as they did, 6. Nor commit idolatry, 7. Nor fornication as they did; in consequence of which twenty-three thousand of them were destroyed, 8. Nor tempt Christ as they did, 9. Nor murmur, 10. All these transgressions, and their punishments, are recorded as warnings to us, that we may not fall away from the grace of God, 11, 12. God never suffers any to be tempted above their strength, 13. Idolatry must be detested, 14. And the sacrament of the Lord's Supper properly considered and taken, that God may not be provoked to punish us, 15—22. There are some things which may be legally done which are not expedient; and we should endeavour so to act as to edify each other, 23, 24. The question concerning eating things offered to idols, considered, and finally settled, 25—30. We should do all things to the glory of God, avoid whatsoever might be the means of stumbling another, and seek the profit of others in spiritual matters, rather than our own gratification, 31—33.

NOTES ON CHAP. X.

Verse 1. I would not that ye should be ignorant] It seems as if the Corinthians had supposed that their being made partakers of the ordinances of the Gospel, such as baptism and the Lord's supper, would secure their salvation; notwithstanding they might be found partaking of idolatrous feasts; as long, at least, as they considered an idol to be nothing in the world. To remove this destructive supposition, which would have led them to endless errors, both in principle and practice; the apostle shows that the Jews had sacramental ordinances in the wilderness, similar to those of the Christians; and that notwithstanding they had the typical baptism from the cloud, and the typical eucharist from the paschal lamb, and the manna that came down from heaven; yet when they joined with idolaters, and partook of idolatrous feasts, God was not only displeased with them, but signified this displeasure by pouring out his judgments upon them; so that in one day 23,000 of them were destroyed.

Under the cloud] It is manifest from Scripture that the miraculous cloud in the wilderness performed a three-fold office to the Israelites. 1. It was a cloud in the form of a pillar to direct their journeyings by day. 2. It was a pillar of fire to give light to the camp by night. 3. It was a covering for them during the day, and preserved them from the scorching rays of the sun, and supplied them with a sufficiency of aqueous particles, not only to cool that burning atmosphere, but to give refreshment to themselves and their cattle; and its humidity was so abundant, that the apostle here represents the people as thoroughly sprinkled and enveloped in its aqueous vapour. See note on Exodus xiii. 21.

Verse 2. And were all baptized unto Moses] Rather INTO Moses, into the covenant of which Moses was the mediator; and by this typical baptism, they were brought under the obligation of acting according to the Mosaic precepts, as Christians receiving Christian baptism, are said to be baptized INTO Christ, and are thereby brought under obligation to keep the precepts of the Gospel.

Verse 3. Spiritual meat] The manna which is here called spiritual. 1. Because it was provided supernaturally; and, 2. Because it was a type of Christ Jesus, who speaking of it, John vi. 31, &c. tells us that it was a type of that true bread which came down from heaven, which gives life to the world, v. 33. and that himself was the bread of life, v. 48.

8 And did all eat the same ^a spiritual meat;

4 And did all drink the same ^d spiritual drink: (for they drank of that spiritual rock that ^e followed them: and that rock was Christ.)

5 But with many of them God was

Verse 4. Spiritual drink] By the βρωμα πνευματικον, spiritual meat, and πομα πνευματικον, spiritual drink; the apostle certainly means both meat and drink, which were furnished to the Israelitish assembly miraculously, as well as typically: and he appears to borrow his expressions from the Jews themselves, who expressly say, הלחם הרוחני הולך עמנו halechem halax, rucheneni, that bread was spiritual, and מים רוחניים meyim rucheniyim haiu, the waters were spiritual. Alshech in legem, fol. 238. to which opinion the apostle seems particularly to refer. See Schoetgen.

The spiritual rock that followed them] There is some difficulty in this verse. How could the rock follow them? it does not appear that the rock ever moved from the place where Moses struck it. But to solve this difficulty, it is said, that rock here is put by metonymy, for the water of the rock; and that this water did follow them through the wilderness. This is more likely; but we have not direct proof of it. The ancient Jews, however, were of this opinion, and state that the streams followed them in all their journeyings, up the mountains, down the valleys, &c. &c. and that when they came to encamp, the waters formed themselves into cisterns, and pools, and that the rulers of the people guided them by their staves in rivulets to the different tribes and families; and this is the sense they give to Num. xxi. 16. Spring up, O well, &c. See the place in Schoetgen.

Others contend that by the rock following them, we are to understand their having carried of its waters with them, on their journeyings. — This we know is a common custom in these deserts to the present day; and that the Greek verb ακολουθεω, to follow, has this sense, Bishop Pearce has amply proved in his note on this place. The Jews suppose that the rock itself went with the Israelites, and was present with them in their thirty-eight stations, for only so many are mentioned. See Alshech in legem, fol. 236. And see Schoetgen.

Now, though of all the senses already given, that of Bishop Pearce is the best; yet it does appear that the apostle does not speak about the rock itself; but of him whom it represented, namely Christ: this was the rock that followed them, and ministered to them; and this view of the subject is rendered more probable by what is said ver. 9. that they tempted Christ, and were destroyed by serpents.

Verse 5. They were overthrown in the wilderness] And yet ALL these persons were under the cloud—ALL passed through the sea—ALL were baptized into Moses in the cloud, and in the sea—

ALL ate the same spiritual meat—ALL drank the same spiritual drink, for they were made partakers of the spiritual rock CHRIST. Nothing can be a more decisive proof than this, that people who have every outward ordinance, and are made partakers of the grace of our Lord Jesus, may so abuse their privileges and grieve the Spirit of God, as to fall from their state of grace, and perish everlastingly. Let those who are continually asserting that this is impossible, beware lest they themselves, if in a state of grace, become not, through their overmuch security, proofs in point of the possibility of ending in the flesh, though they began in the spirit—Reader, remember who said, Ye shall not surely die;
and remember the mischiefs produced by a belief of his doctrine.

Verse 6. These things were our examples] The punishments which God inflicted on them, furnish us with evidences of what God will inflict upon us, if we sin after the similitude of those transgressors.

We should not lust after evil things] It is most evident that the apostle refers here to the history in Num. xi. 4, &c. and the mixed multitude fell a lusting, and said, Who shall give us flesh to eat. Into the same spirit the Corinthians had most evidently fallen; they lusted after the flesh in the idol feasts, and therefore frequented them to the great scandal of Christianity. The apostle shows them that their sin was of the same nature as that of the murmuring rebellious Israelites, whom God so severely punished; and if he did not spare the natural branches, there was no likelihood that he should spare them.

Verse 7. Neither be ye idolaters] The apostle considers partaking of the idolatrous feasts, as being real acts of idolatry; because those who offered the flesh to their gods, considered them as feeding invisibly with them, on the flesh thus offered; and that every one that partook of the feast, was a real participator with the god to whom the flesh or animal had been offered in sacrifice. See ver. 21.

Rose up to play] See the note on Exod. xxxii. 6. The Jews generally explain this word, as implying idolatrous acts only—I have considered it as implying acts of impurity, with which idolatrous acts were often accompanied. It also means those dances which were practised in honour of their gods. That this is one meaning of the verb παίζω, Kypke has largely proved.

The whole idolatrous process was as follows. 1. The proper victim was prepared and set apart. 2. It was slain, and its blood poured out at the altar of the deity. 3. The flesh was dressed, and the priests and offerers feasted on it, and thus endeavoured to establish a communion between themselves and the object of their worship. 4. After eating, they had idolatrous dances in honour of their god: and, 5. As might be expected, impure mixtures, in consequence of those dances. The people sat down to eat and to drink, and rose up to play; and it is in reference to this issue of idolatrous feasts and dancings, that the apostle immediately subjoins, Neither let us commit FORNICATION, &c.

Verse 8. Fell in one day three and twenty thousand] In Num. xxv. 9. the number is 24,000; and, allowing this to be the genuine reading, and none of the Hebrew MSS. exhibit any various reading in the place, Moses and the apostle may be thus reconciled: in Num. xxv. 4. God commands Moses to take all the heads, (the rulers) of the people, and hang them up before the Lord against the sun; these possibly amounted to 1000; and those who fell by the plague were 23,000, so that the whole amounted to 24,000. Instead of αποκρίθη χιλιάδης, 23,000, two MSS. with the latter Syriac and the Armenian, have αποκρίθησαν χιλιάδης, 24,000; but this authority is too slender to establish a various reading, which recedes so much from the received text. I think the discordance may be best accounted for, by supposing, as above, that Phineas and his companions, might have slain 1000 men, who were heads of the people, and chief in this idolatry, and that the plague sent from the Lord destroyed 23,000 more; so an equal number to the whole tribe of Levi perished in one day; who were just 23,000. See Num. xxvi. 62. and see Lightfoot.

Verse 9. Neither let us tempt Christ] I have already supposed, in the note on ver. 4. that Christ is intended by the spiritual Rock that followed them; and that it was He, not the rock, that did follow or accompany the Israelites in the wilderness. This was the Angel of God's presence who was with the church in the wilderness, to whom our fathers would not obey, as St. Stephen says, Acts vii. 38, and 40. Instead of Χριστοῦ, Christ; several MSS. and a few Versions, have Κυρίου, the Lord, and some few Θεοῦ, God. But though some respectable MSS. have the Lord, instead of Christ; yet this latter has the greatest proportion of authority on its side. And this affords no mean proof that the person who is called יהוה Yehovah, in the Old Testament, is called Christ in the New. By tempting Christ, is meant disbelieving the providence and goodness of God; and presuming to prescribe to Him how he should send them the necessary supplies; and of what kind they should be, &c.

Verse 10. Neither murmur ye] How the Israelites murmured because of the manna, which their souls despised as a light bread, something incapable of affording them nourishment, &c. and because they had been brought out of Egypt into the wilderness, and pretended that the promises of God had failed; and how they were destroyed by serpents, and by the destroyer or plague, may be seen at large in the texts referred to in the margin, on this and the preceding verses. It appears, from what the apostle says here, that the Corinthians were murmuring against God and his apostle, for prohibiting them from partaking of the idolatrous feasts; just as the Israelites did in the wilderness, in reference to a similar subject. See the history of Phineas, with Zimri and Cosbi, and the rebellion of Corah and his company, &c.

Destroyed of the destroyer.] The Jews suppose that God employed destroying angels to punish those rebellious Israelites; they were five in number, and one of them they call משיח Meshachith, the destroyer; which appears to be another name for Samael, the angel of death; to whose influence they attribute all deaths which are not uncommon or violent. Those who die violent deaths, or deaths that are not in the common manner of men, are considered as perishing by immediate judgments from God.

Verse 11. Upon whom the ends of the world are come.] Τα τελευτα των αιωνων, the end of the times included within the whole duration of the Mosaic economy. For, although the word αιων means, in its primary sense, endless being, or duration; yet in its accommodated sense, it is applied to any round or duration, that is complete in itself. And here it evidently means the whole duration of the Mosaic economy. "Thus therefore," says Dr. Lightfoot, "the apostle speaks in this place that those things which were transacted in the beginning of the Jewish ages, are written for an example to you, upon whom the ends of those ages are come: and the beginning is like to the end; and the end to the beginning. Both was forty years; both consisted of temptation and unbelief; and both ended in the destruction of the unbelievers. That, in the destruction of those who perished in the wilderness; this, in the destruction of those that believed not: viz. the destruction of their city and nation." The phrase יסוף אסופה yomiah, the end of days, says the Targum of Jerusalem, Gen. iii. 15. mean יסוף אסופה ימי משיח beyomai dematac Mashicha, in the days of the king Messiah. We are to consider the apostle's words as referring to the end of the Jewish dispensation, and the commencement of the Christian; which is the last dispensation which God will vouchsafe to man in the state of probation.

Verse 12. Let him that thinketh he standeth] O δυναστας: Let him who most confidently standeth; him who has the fullest conviction in his own conscience, that his heart is right with God, and that his mind is right in the truth, take heed lest he fall from his faith and from the state of holiness in which the grace of God has placed him. I have already shown, that the verb στας, which we render to seem, to think, to suppose, is used by the best Greek writers not to lessen or weaken the sense, but to render it stronger, and more emphatic. See the note on Luke viii. 18.

In a state of probation, every thing may change; while we are in this life, we may stand or fall: our standing in the faith depends on our union with God; and that depends on our watching unto prayer, and continuing to possess that faith that worketh by love. The highest saint under heaven can stand no longer than he depends upon God, and continues in the obedience of faith. He that ceases to do so, will fall into sin, and get a darkened understanding and a hardened heart: and he may continue in this state till God come to take away his soul. Therefore, let him who most assuredly standeth, take heed lest he fall; not only partially, but finally.

comes, he will provide you with sufficient strength to resist it: as the trial comes in, he will make your way out. The words are very remarkable, κατασται οτις τον παρανομον και τον υβριστον, "he will, with the temptation, make the deliverance, or way out." Satan is never permitted to block up our way, without the providence of God making a way through the wall. God ever makes a breach in his otherwise impregnable fortification. Should an upright soul get into difficulties and straits, he may rest assured that there is a way out, as there was a way in; and that the trial shall never be above the strength that God shall give him to bear it.

Verse 14. Wherefore—flee from idolatry.] This is a trial of no great magnitude; to escape from so gross a temptation requires but a moderate portion of grace and circumspection.

Verse 15. I speak as to wise men.] The Corinthians valued themselves not a little on their wisdom and various gifts; the apostle admits this, and draws an argument from it against themselves. As ye are so wise, surely ye can see the propriety of abominating idolatry of every kind: for an idol is nothing in the world; and can do nothing for you, and nothing against you.

Verse 16. The cup of blessing.] The apostle speaks here of the eucharist, which he illustrates by the כוס הברכת kos habaracah, cup of blessing, over which thanks were expressed at the conclusion of the pass-over. See this largely explained at the conclusion of the notes on Matt. xxvi. and in my Discourse upon the Eucharist. 8vo. 2d edit. 1814.

The communion of the blood of Christ.] We who partake of this sacred cup, in commemoration of the death of Christ, are made partakers of his body and blood, and thus have fellowship with him; as those who partake of an idol feast, thereby, as much as they can, participate with the idol, to whom the sacrifice was offered. This I have proved at large in the above tract, to which I must refer the reader; as the subject is too voluminous to be inserted here.

Verse 17. For, we being many, are one bread.] The original would be better translated thus: because there is one bread or loaf, we, who are many, are one body. As only one loaf was used at the pass-over, and those who partook of it were considered to be one religious body; so we, who partake of the eucharistical bread and wine, in commemoration of the sacrificial death of Christ, are one spiritual society, because we are all made partakers of that one Christ, whose blood was shed for us, to make an atonement for our sins; as the blood of the paschal lamb was shed and sprinkled in reference to this, of which it was the type.

Verse 18. Behold Israel after the flesh.] The Jews not yet converted to Christianity: the latter being Israel after the Spirit. As the design of the apostle was to withdraw his converts at Corinth from all temptation to idolatry, he produces two examples, to show the propriety of his endeavours. 1. All who join together in celebrating the Lord's supper, and are partakers of that one bread, give proof by this that they are Christians, and have fellowship with Christ. 2. All the Israelites who offer sacrifice, and partake of those sacrifices, give proof thereby that they are Jews, and are in fellowship with the object of their worship: so they who join in idol festivals, and eat things which have been offered to idols, give proof that they are in communion with those idolaters, and that they have fellowship with the demons they worship.

Verse 19. What say I then?] A Jewish phrase; for I conclude: and this is his conclusion, that, although an idol is nothing, has neither power nor influence; nor are things offered to idols any thing the worse for being thus offered; yet, as the things sacrificed by the Gentiles are sacrificed to demons, and not to God, those who partake of them have fellowship with demons; those who profess Christianity, cannot have fellowship both with Christ and the devil.

Verse 21. Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord.] It is in vain that you, who frequent these idol festivals, profess the religion of Christ, and commemorate his death and passion in the Holy Eucharist; for you cannot have that fellowship with Christ which this ordinance implies, while you are partakers of the table of demons. That the Gentiles, in their sacrifices, fed on the slain beasts, and ate bread and drank wine in honour of their gods, is sufficiently clear, from various accounts. The loaves were served in cannisters; the wine in bowls; the priest renewed the rites divine: Broiled entrails are their food, and beef's continued chine.

Ye warlike youths, your heads with garlands crown,
Fill high the goblets with a sparkling flood,
And with deep draughts invoke our common god.

Verse 22. Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? All idolatry is represented as a sort of spiritual adultery; it is giving that heart to Satan that should be devoted to God: and he is represented as being jealous, because of the infidelity of those who have covenanted to give their hearts to him.

Are we stronger than he? As he has threatened to punish such transgressors, and will infallibly do it, can we resist his Omnipotence? A sinner should consider, while he is in rebellion against God, whether he be able to resist that power whereby God will inflict vengeance.

Verse 23. All things are lawful for me? I may lawfully eat all kinds of food; but all are not expedient, ὡς πάντα συμπερι. It would not be becoming in me to eat of all; because I should, by this, offend and grieve many weak minds. See the notes on chap. vi. 12, &c.

Verse 25. Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat] The case to which the apostle refers is simply this: it was customary to bring the flesh of the animal to market, the blood of which had been poured out in sacrifice to an idol: or, taken more particularly, the case was this; one part of the sacrifice was consumed on the altar of the idol; a second part was dressed and eaten by the sacrificer; and a third belonged to the priest, and was often sold in the shambles. To partake of the second share, or to feast upon the sacrifice, St. Paul absolutely forbids; because this was one part of the religious worship, which was paid to the idol: it was sitting down as guests at his table, in token that they were in fellowship with him. This was utterly incompatible with receiving the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, which was the communion of the body and blood of Christ. But, as to the third share, the apostle leaves them at liberty either to eat of it or forbear; except that, by eating, their weak brethren should be offended: in that case, though the thing was lawful, it was their duty to abstain. See the notes on chap. viii. 1, &c.

Asking no question for conscience sake] Dr. Lightfoot observes that, "the Jews were vexed with innumerable scruples in their feasts, as to the eating of the thing, as well as to the company with which they ate; and even the manner of their eating. Of fruits and herbs brought to the table, they were to inquire whether they were tithed according to custom? whether they were consecrated by the Truma? or whether they were profane? whether they were clean, or touched with some pollution, &c. And concerning flesh set on the table, they were to inquire whether it was of that which had been offered to idols? whether it were the flesh of an animal that had been torn by wild beasts? or, of that which had been strangled, or not killed according to the canons? &c. &c. All which doubts the liberty of the Gospel abolished as to one's own conscience, with this proviso, that no scandal or offence be cast before another man's weak or scrupulous conscience."

From this, it is evident, that the apostle had the case of the Jewish converts in view, and not the Gentiles. The latter were not troubled with such extraordinary scrupulousness.

Verse 26. For the earth is the Lord's] And because God made the earth and its fulness, all animals, plants, and vegetables; there can be nothing in it, or them, impure or unholy; because all are the creatures of God.

Verse 27. If any—bid you to a feast] The apostle means any common meal, not an idol festival: for to such no Christian could lawfully go

Whatsoever is set before you, eat] Do not act as the Jews generally do, torturing both them- selves and others, with questions, such as those mentioned on ver. 25.

Verse 28. This is offered in sacrifice unto idols] While they were not apprized of this circumstance, they might lawfully eat; but when told that the flesh set before them had been offered to an idol, then they were not to eat, for the sake of his weak conscience, who pointed out the circumstance.—For the apostle still takes for granted, that even the flesh offered in sacrifice to an idol might be eaten innocently at any private table; as in that case they were no longer in danger of being partakers with devils, as this was no idol festival.

several others; the Syriac, Erpen, Coptic, Sa-hadic, Æthiopic, Armenian, Vulgate, Itala, and in several of the Fathers. Griesbach has left it out of the text; and professor White says, "cer- tissimè deletum;" it should most undoubtedly be erased. It has scarcely any authority to support it.

Verses 29, 30. For why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience, &c.] Though in the case of flesh offered to idols, and other matters connected with idolatry, (on which it appears there was much of a tender conscience among some of the Corinthians,) it was necessary to sacrifice something to an over scrupulous conscience: yet the Gospel of Christ did not lay any man under this general burden, that he must do nothing at which any weak brother might feel hurt, or be stumbled: for the liberty of the Gospel must not take for its rule the scrupulosity of any conscience: for, if a man, by grace, by the allowance or authority of the Gospel, partake of any thing that God's bounty has sent, and which the Gospel has not forbidden, and give thanks to God for the blessing; no man has right or authority to condemn such a person. This seems to be the meaning of these two verses; and they read a lesson of caution to rash judges; and to those who are apt to take offence.

Verse 31. Whether therefore ye eat, or drink]

As no general rule can be laid down in reference to the above particulars, there is one maxim, of which no Christian must lose sight:
that, whether he eats or drinks of this, or the other kind of aliments, or whatever else he may do, he must do it so as to bring glory to God.
This is a sufficient rule to regulate every man's conscience and practice in all indifferent things, where there are no express commands or prohibitions.

Verse 32. Give none offence, &c.] Scrupulously avoid giving any cause of offence either to the unconverted Jews, or the unconverted Gentiles, so as to prejudice them against Christianity: nor to the church of God, made up of converts from the above parties.

Verse 33. Even as I please all men] Act as I do; forgetting myself, my own interests, con-veniencies, ease, and comfort, I labour for the welfare of others; and particularly that they may be saved. How blessed and amiable was the spirit and conduct of this holy man!

This chapter has already presented the serious reader with a variety of maxims for his regulation—1. As to his own private walk—2.
His domestic duties—And, 3. his connexion with the church of God. Let us review some of the principal parts.

1. We should be on our guard against what are called little sins; and all occasions and ex- citements to sin. Take heed what company you frequent. One thing, apparently harmless, may lead, by almost imperceptible links, to sins of the deepest die. See the example in this chapter—1. The people sat down to eat and to drink.
2. They rose up to play, dance, and sing: and,
3. They committed fornication, and brought upon themselves swift destruction.

2. However conscious we may be of our own sincerity and uprightness, we should ever distrust ourselves. God has made nothing inde- pendent of himself; the soul has no principle of self-dependence, either in itself or in its attainments: it is wise, powerful, and happy, only while it is depending on infinite wisdom, unlimited power, and endless mercy.

3. The Gentiles were in communion with demons, by their idolatrous services. In what communion are those who feed themselves without fear; who eat with the glutton and drink with the drunkard? Do they partake of the Lord Jesus who are under the influence of pride, self-will, hatred, censoriousness, &c. and who carry their self-importance, and worldly spirit, even into the house and worship of God?

Important directions given I. CORINTHIANS. to the church at Corinth.

4. A spirit of curiosity, too much indulged, may, in an irreligious man, lead to covetousness and theft: in a godly man, to a troublesome and unscriptural scrupulosity of conscience; productive of nothing but uneasiness to itself, and disturbance to others. Simplicity of heart saves from this, and is an excellent gift.

5. In many actions we have a two-fold rule: the testimony of God and charity: and, in many things, charity is the best interpreter of the testimony. The testimony often permits what charity forbids, because circumstances, in time, place, &c. may render a thing improper on one occasion that might be proper on another.

6. Pious Quesnel has well said, Every thing honours God when it is done for his sake; every thing dishonours him when any ultimate end is proposed besides his glory. It is an unchangeable principle of the Christian morality, That all comes from God by his love; and all should be returned to him by ours. This rule we should keep inviolate.

7. Though many of the advices given in this chapter, appear to respect the Corinthians alone, yet there is none of them that is not applicable to Christians in general, in certain circumstances. God has given no portion of his word to any people or age exclusively; the whole is given to the church universal in all ages of the world. In reading this epistle let us seriously consider what parts of it apply to ourselves; and if we are disposed to appropriate its promises, let us act conscientiously, and inquire how many of its reprehensions we may fairly appropriate also.

CHAPTER XI.

The apostle reprehends the Corinthians for several irregularities in their manner of conducting public worship; the men praying or prophesying with their heads covered; and the women with their heads uncovered; contrary to custom, propriety, and decency, 1—6. Reasons why they should act differently, 7—16. They are also reproved for their divisions and heresies, 17—19. And for the irregular manner in which they celebrated the Lord's Supper, 20—22. The proper manner of celebrating this holy rite, laid down by the apostle, 23—26. Directions for a profitable receiving of the Lord's Supper, and avoiding the dangerous consequences of communicating unworthily, 27—34.

NOTES ON CHAP. XI.

Verse 1. Be ye followers of me] This verse certainly belongs to the preceding chapter, and is here out of all proper place and connexion.

Verse 2. That ye remember me in all things] It appears that the apostle had previously given them a variety of directions relative to the matters mentioned here; that some had paid strict attention to them, and that others had not; and that contentions and divisions were the consequences, which he here reproves and endeavours to rectify. While Paul and Apollos had preached among them, they had undoubtedly prescribed every thing that was necessary to be observed in the Christian worship: but it is likely that those who joined in idol festivals, wished also to introduce something relative to the mode of conducting the idol worship into the Christian assembly; which they might think was an improvement on the apostle's plan.

Verse 3. The head of every man is Christ] The apostle is speaking particularly of Christianity and its ordinances: Christ is the head, or author of this religion; and is the Creator, Preserver, and Lord of every man. The man also is the lord or head of the woman; and the head or Lord of Christ, as mediator between God and man, is God the Father. Here is the order—God sends his Son Jesus Christ to redeem man; Christ comes and lays down his life for the world; every man who receives Christianity, confesses that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father: and every believing woman will acknowledge, according to Genesis iii. 16. that God has placed her in a dependence on, and subjection to, the man. So far, there is no difficulty in this passage.

let her also be shorn: but if it be ^c a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be covered.

7 For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as ^d he is Deut. 22. 5.—d Gen. 1. 26, 27. & 5. 1. & 9. 6.

Verse 4. Praying or prophesying] Any person who engages in public acts in the worship of God, whether prayer, singing, or exhortation; for we learn from the apostle himself, that προφητεύων, to prophesy, signifies to speake unto men to edification, exhortation, and comfort, chap. xiv. 3. And this comprehends all that we understand by exhortation, or even preaching.

Having his head covered] With his cap or turban on, dishonoureth his head; because the head being covered, was a sign of subjection; and while he was employed in the public ministration of the word, he was to be considered as a representative of Christ: and, on this account, his being veiled or covered, would be improper. The decision of the apostle was in point blank hostility to the canons of the Jews, for they would not suffer a man to pray unless he was veiled; for which they give this reason: "He should veil himself to show that he is ashamed before God; and unworthy, with open face, to behold him." See much in Lightfoot on this point.

Verse 5. But every woman that prayeth, &c.] Whatever may be the meaning of praying and prophesying, in respect to the man, they have precisely the same meaning in respect to the woman. So that some women, at least, as well as some men, might speak to others to edification, and exhortation, and comfort. And this kind of prophesying, or teaching, was predicted by Joel, ii. 28. and referred to by Peter, Acts ii. 17. And had there not been such gifts bestowed on women, the prophecy could not have had its fulfilment. The only difference marked by the apostle was, the man had his head uncovered, because he was the representative of Christ: the woman had her's covered, because she was placed by the order of God, in a state of subjection to the man; and because it was a custom, both among the Greeks and Romans, and among the Jews an express law, that no woman should be seen abroad without a veil. This was, and is, a common custom through all the East; and none but public prostitutes go without veils. And, if a woman should appear in public without a veil, she would dishonour her head, her husband. And she must appear like to those women who had their hair shorn off as the punishment of whoredom, or adultery.

Tacitus informs us, Germ. 19. that, considering the greatness of the population, adulteries were very rare among the Germans; and, when any woman was found guilty, she was punished in the following way: accius crinibus, nudatam coram propinquis expellit domo maritus: "having cut off her hair, and stripped her before her relatives, her husband turned her out of doors." And we know that the woman suspected of adultery, was ordered, by the law of Moses, to be stripped of her veil, Numb. v. 18. Women reduced to a state of servitude, or slavery, had their hair cut off: so we learn from Achilles Tatius. Clitophon says, concerning Leucippe, who was reduced to a state of slavery, πετραται, δεδουλευσεν, γαρ σκαπισσιν, στυλαται, τας κεφαλαις το καλλος, ταις κουραν ορας: lib. viii. cap. 5. "she was sold for a slave, she dug in the ground, and her hair being shorn off, her head was deprived of its ornament," &c. It was also the custom among the Greeks to cut off their hair in time of mourning: See Euripides in Alcest. ver. 426. Admetus, ordering a common mourning for his wife Alcestis, says, πυθος γυναικος τας κοινουσθαι λεγω, κυρα ξυρκα και μετακπιτω τολα: "I order a general mourning for this woman; let the hair be shorn off, and a black garment put on." Propriety, and decency of conduct, are the points which the apostle seems to have more especially in view. As a woman who dresses loosely or fantastically, even in the present day, is considered a disgrace to her husband, because suspected to be not very sound in her morals; so in those ancient times, a woman appearing without a veil, would be considered in the same light.

Verse 6. For if the woman be not covered] If she will not wear a veil in the public assemblies, let her be shorn; let her carry a public badge of infamy: but if it be a shame; if, to be shorn or shaven would appear, as it must, a badge of infamy, then let her be covered; let her by all means wear her veil. Even in mourning it was considered disgraceful to be obliged to shear off the hair; and, lest they should lose this ornament of their heads, the women contrived to evade the custom, by cutting off the ends of it only. Euripides, in Orest. ver. 128. speaking of Helen, who should have shaved her head on account of the death of her sister Clytemnestra, says, υδρι παρ, ακρας ως αποβυσσιν τριχας σαζουσα καλλος, οει δε η κεφαλη γυνη: "see how she cuts off only the very points of her hair, that she may preserve her beauty; and is just the same woman as before." See the note on the preceding verse.

Verse 7. A man indeed ought not to cover his head] He should not wear his cap or turban in the public congregation, for this is a badge of servitude; or an indication that he has a conscience overwhelmed with guilt: and besides, it was contrary to the custom that prevailed both among the Greeks and Romans.

tive of the glory and perfections of God; so that the fear of him, and the dread of him, are on every beast of the field, &c. so the woman is in the house and family, the representative of the power and authority of the man. I believe this to be the meaning of the apostle; and, that he is speaking here principally concerning power and authority; and skill to use them. It is certainly not the moral image of God, nor his celestial glory, of which he speaks in this verse.

Verse 8. For the man is not of the woman] Bp. Pearce translates, ου γαρ εστι αυη εκ γυναικος, αλλα γυνη εκ ανδρος: thus—“For, the man doth not BELONG to the woman, but the woman to the man.” And vindicates this sense of εκ, by its use in chap. xii. 15. If the foot shall say, ουκ εμι εκ του σωματος, I am not of the body; i. e. I do not belong to the body. He observes, that, as the verb εστι is in the present tense, and will not allow that we should understand this verse of something that is past, γαρ, for, in the following verse, which is unnoticed by our translators, will have its full propriety and meaning, because it introduces a reason why the woman belongs to the man, and not the man to the woman. His meaning is, that the man does not belong to the woman, as if she was the principal; but the woman belongs to the man in that view.

Verse 9. Neither was the man created, &c.] Και γαρ ουκ ακτιθη: for the man was not created upon the woman's account. The reason is plain from what is mentioned above; and from the original creation of woman, she was made for the man, to be his proper or suitable helper.

Verse 10. For this cause ought the woman to have power on her head because of the angels.] There are few portions in the sacred writings that have given rise to such a variety of conjectures and explanations, and is less understood than this verse; and ver. 29. of chap. xv. Our translators were puzzled with it; and have inserted here one of the largest marginal readings found any where in their work; but this is only the words power on her head, which they interpret thus: that is, a covering, in sign that she is under the power of her husband. But, admitting this marginal reading to be a satisfactory solution so far as it goes, it by no means removes all the difficulty. Mr. Locke ingeniously acknowledged that he did not understand the meaning of the words; and almost every critic and learned man has a different explanation. Some have endeavoured to force out a meaning by altering the text. The emendation of Mr. Toop, of Cornwall, is the most remarkable: he reads εξουα, going out, instead of εξουια, power; wherefore the woman, when she goes out, should have a veil on her head. Whatever ingenuity there may appear in this emendation, the consideration that it is not acknowledged by any MS. or Version, or primitive writer, is sufficient proof against it. Dr. Lightfoot, Schoetgen, and Bishop Pearce, have written best on the subject; in which they allow that there are many difficulties: the latter contends, 1. that the original should be read Wherefore the woman ought to have a power upon her head: that is, the power of the husband over the wife. The word power standing for the sign or token of that power which was a covering or veil. Theophylact explains the word το του εξουιαζουσαι συμβολοι, τω- τει, το καλυμμα, “the symbol of being under power; that is, a veil or covering.” And Photius explains it thus, της υποταχης συμβολοι το επι της κεφαλης καλυμμα φερειν; to wear a veil on the head is a symbol of subjection. It is no unusual thing, in the Old and New Testaments, for the signs and tokens of things to be called by the names of the things themselves; for thus, circumcision is called the covenant, in Gen. xvii. 10, 13. though it were only the sign of it.

2. The word angels presents another difficulty: some suppose that, by these, the apostle means the fallen angels, or devils; others the governors of the church; and others those who were deputed among the Jews to espouse a virgin in the name of a lover. All these senses the learned Bishop rejects; and believes that the apostle uses the word angels in its most obvious sense, for the heavenly angels; and that he speaks according to the notion which then prevailed among the Jews, that the holy angels interested themselves in the affairs of men, and particularly were present in their religious assemblies, as the cherubim, their representation, were present in the temple. Thus we read in Eccles. v. 6. Neither say thou before the ANGEL, it was an error; and in 1 Tim. v. 21. I charge thee before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect ANGELS, &c. Parallel to these is what Agrippa says in his oration to the Jews, Josephus, War, b. ii. chap. 16. I protest before God, your holy temple, and all the ANGELS of heaven, &c. All which passages suppose, or were spoken to those who supposed that the angels know what passes here upon earth. The notion, whether just or not, prevailed among the Jews; and, if so, St. Paul might speak according to the common opinion.

3. Another difficulty lies in the phrase ου- τωυτ, wherefore: which shows that this verse is a conclusion from what the apostle was arguing before; which we may understand thus, that his conclusion from the foregoing argument, ought to have the more weight, upon account of the presence, real or supposed, of the holy angels, at their religious meetings. See Bp. Pearce, in loc.

The learned bishop is not very willing to allow that the doctrine of the presence of angelic beings in religious assemblies, is legitimate ; but what difficulty can there be in this, if we take the words of the apostle in another place, Are they not all ministering spirits, sent to minister to them that shall be heirs of salvation ? Heb. i. 14. And perhaps there is no time in which they can render more essential services to the followers of God, than when they are engaged in divine ordinances. On the whole, the bishop's sense of the passage, and paraphrase, stand thus : " And because of this superiority in the man, I conclude, that the woman should have on her head a veil, the mark of her husband's power over her ; especially in the religious assemblies, where the angels are supposed to be invisibly present."

The ancient Versions make little alteration in the common reading ; and the MSS. leave the verse nearly as it stands in the common printed editions. The Armentian has a word that answers to umbram, a shade or covering. The Ethiopic, her head should be veiled. The common editions of the Vulgate have potestatem, power ; but in an ancient edition of the Vulgate, perhaps one of the first, if not the first ever printed, 2 vols. folio, sine ulla nota anni, &c. the verse stands thus, Ideo debet mulier velamen habere super caput suum : et propter angelos. My old MS. translation seems to have been taken from a MS. which had the same reading : Wherfore the woman schal haue a heyl on her heuyd : and for aungels. Some copies of the Itala have also velamen, a veil.

In his view of this text, Kypke differs from all others ; and nothing, that so judicious a critic advances, should be lightly regarded. 1. He contends that εἰς, occurs now where in the sense of veil, and yet he supposes that the word καλυμμα, veil, is understood, and must, in the translation of the passage, be supplied. 2. He directs that a comma be placed after εἰς, and that it be construed with ουλου, ought : after which he translates the verse thus : Propterea mulier potestati obnoxia est, ita ut velamen in capite habeat, propter angelos. On this account the woman is subject to power, so that she should have a veil on her head, because of the angels. 3. He contends that both Latins and Greeks use debere and ουλου, elegantly to express to that which one is obnoxious or liable. So Horace :— of the winds ; for to these thou art now exposing thyself.

So Dionys. Hal. Ant. lib. iii. p. 205. και πολλων φημιλοντες ασχουν απληδον εκ της αγρας, they departed from the market exposed to great dishonour. So Euripides, ουλω σοι Γλαυκω, I am exposed to thy injury.

4. He contends that the words taken in this sense agree perfectly with the context, and with δια τουτο, wherefore, in this verse, " Because the man was not created for the woman, but the woman for the man, therefore she is subject to his authority ; and should have a veil on her head as the token of that subjection : and particularly before the holy angels, who are present in the congregations of the saints."

For Dr. Lightfoot's opinion, that by angels, we are to understand the paranymphs, or messengers who came on the part of others, to look out for proper spouses for their friends, I must refer to his works, vol. ii. fol. p. 772. The reader has now before him every thing that is likely to cast light on this difficult subject ; and he must either adopt what he judges to be best, or else think for himself.

Verse 11. Neither is the man without the woman] The apostle seems to say, I do not intimate any disparagement of the female sex, by insisting on the necessity of her being under the power or authority of the man : for they are both equally dependent on each other ; In the Lord, ω Κυριω ; but instead of this reading, Theodoret has εσ κοσμου, in the world. Probably the apostle means that the human race is continued by an especial providence of God. Others think, that he means men and women equally make a Christian society ; and in it have equal rights and privileges.

Verse 12. For as the woman is of the man] For as the woman was first formed out of the side of the man ; man has ever since been formed out of the womb of the woman ; but they, as all other created things, are of God.

Verse 13. Judge in yourselves] Consider the subject in your own common sense ; and then say whether it be decent for a woman to pray in public without a veil on her head ? The heathen priestesses prayed or delivered their oracles bareheaded, or with dishevelled hair, non compta mansere comæ, as in the case of the Cuman Sibyl, Æn. vi. ver. 48. and otherwise in great disorder ; to be conformed to them would be very disgraceful to Christian women ; and in reference to such things as these, the apostle appeals to their sense of honour and decency.

Verse 14. Doth not nature—teach you, that, if a man have long hair] Nature certainly teaches us, by bestowing it, that it is proper for

A. M. 4060. 15 But if a woman have women to have long hair; and it is not so with men. The hair of the male rarely grows like that of the female unless art is used; and even then it bears but a scanty proportion to the former. Hence it is truly womanish to have long hair; and it is a shame to the man who affects it. In ancient times, the people of Achaia, the province in which Corinth stood, and the Greeks in general, were noted for their long hair, and hence called by Homer, in a great variety of places, καρυχίωοις; Ἀχαιοί, the long-haired Greeks, or Achæans. Soldiers, in different countries, have been distinguished for their long hair; but whether this can be said to their praise or blame, or whether Homer uses it always as a term of respect, when he applies it to the Greeks, I shall not wait here to inquire. Long hair was certainly not in repute among the Jews. The Nazarites let their hair grow, but it was a token of humiliation: and it is possible that St. Paul had this in view. There were, consequently, two reasons why the apostle should condemn this practice—1. Because it was a sign of humiliation—2. Because it was womanish. After all, it is possible that St. Paul may refer to dressed, frizzled, and curled hair, which shallow and effeminate men might have affected in that time, as they do in this. Perhaps there is not a sight more ridiculous in the eye of common sense than a high dressed, curled, and powdered head, with which the operator must have taken considerable pains, and the silly patient lost much time and comfort in submitting to what all but senseless custom must call an indignity and degradation. Hear nature, common sense, and reason; and they will inform you that if a man have long hair, it is a shame unto him.

Verse 15. But if a woman have long hair] The Author of their being has given a larger proportion of hair to the head of women than to that of men: and to them it is an especial ornament; and may, in various cases, serve as a veil.

It is a certain fact, that a man's long hair renders him contemptible; and a woman's long hair renders her more amiable. Nature and the apostle speak the same language; we may account for it as we please.

Verse 16. But if any man seem to be contentious Ἐὰν τις τις δόξαι φιλονεικεῖσθαι. If any person sets himself up as a wrangler; puts himself forward as a defender of such points, that a woman may pray or teach with her head uncovered, and that a man may, without reproach, have long hair; let him know that we have no such custom as either; nor are they sanctioned by any of the churches of God, whether among the Jews or the Gentiles. We have already seen that the verb δοξαι, which we translate to seem, generally strengthens and increases the sense. From the attention that the apostle has paid to the subject of veils and hair, it is evident that it must have occasioned considerable disturbance in the church of Corinth. They have produced evil effects in much later times.

Verse 17. Now, in this—I praise you not] In the beginning of this epistle, the apostle did praise them, for their attention in general to the rules he had laid down; see ver. 2. but here he is obliged to condemn certain irregularities which had crept in among them, particularly relative to the celebration of the Lord's supper. Through some false teaching which they had received in the absence of the apostle, they appear to have celebrated it precisely in the same way the Jews did their pass-over. That, we know, was a regular meal, only accompanied with certain peculiar circumstances and ceremonies: two of these ceremonies were eating bread solemnly broken, and drinking a cup of wine, called the cup of blessing. Now, it is certain that our Lord has taken these two things, and made them expressive of the crucifixion of his body, and the shedding of his blood, as an atonement for the sins of mankind. The teachers which had crept into the Corinthian church, appear to have perverted the whole of this divine institution; for the celebration of the Lord's supper appears to have been made among them a part of an ordinary meal. The people came together, and, it appears, brought their provisions with them; some had much, others had less; some ate to excess, others had scarcely enough to suffice nature. One was hungry, and the other was drunken; μεθύω, was filled to the full; this is the sense of the word in many places of Scripture. At the conclusion of this irregular meal, they appear to have done something in reference to our Lord's institution; but more resembling the Jewish pass-over. These irregularities, connected with so many indecencies, the apostle reproves; for, instead of being benefitted by the divine ordinance, they were injured: they came together not for the better, but for the worse.

Verse 18. There be divisions among you] They had σχίσματα, schisms among them; the old parties were kept up, even in the place where they assembled to eat the Lord's supper.

The Paulinians, the Kephites, and the Apollonians, continued to be distinct parties, and ate their meals separately, even in the same house.

Verse 19. There must be also heresies] Αἵρεσις: not a common consent of the members of the church, either in the doctrines of the Gospel, or in the ceremonies of the Christian religion. Their difference in religious opinion led to a difference in their religious practice; and thus the church of God, that should have been one body, was split into sects and parties. The divisions and the heresies sprung out of each other. I have spoken largely on the word heresy in Acts v. 17. to which place I beg leave to refer the reader.

Verse 20. This is not to eat the Lord's supper.] They did not come together to eat the Lord's supper exclusively, which they should have done; and not have made it a part of an ordinary meal.

Verse 21. Every one taketh before—his own supper] They had a grand feast, though the different sects kept in parties by themselves; but all took as ample a supper as they could provide, (each bringing his own provisions with him,) before they took what was called the Lord's supper. See on ver. 17.

Verse 22. Have ye not houses to eat and to drink in?] They should have taken their ordinary meal at home; and have come together in the church to celebrate the Lord's supper.

Despise ye the church of God] Ye render the sacred assembly and the place contemptible by your conduct; and ye show yourselves destitute of that respect which ye owe to the place set apart for divine worship.

Verse 23. I have received of the Lord] It is possible that several of the people at Corinth did receive the bread and wine of the eucharist, as they did the paschal bread and wine; as a mere commemoration of an event. And, as our Lord had, by his institution, consecrated that bread and wine, not to be the means of commemorating the deliverance from Egypt, and their joy on the account; but their deliverance from sin and death, by his passion and cross: therefore the apostle states that he had received from the Lord what he delivered; viz. that the eucharistic bread and wine were to be understood of the accomplishment of that, of which the paschal lamb was the type: the body broken for them; the blood shed for them.

The Lord Jesus—took bread] See the whole of this account collated with the parallel passages in the four Gospels, amply explained in my Discourse on the Eucharist; and in the notes on Matt. xxvi.

Verse 26. Ye do show the Lord's death] As in the pass-over they showed forth the bondage they had been in, and the redemption they had received from it: so, in the Eucharist they showed forth the sacrificial death of Christ, and the redemption from sin derived from it.

Verse 27. Whosoever shall eat—and drink—unworthily] To put a final end to controversies and perplexities relative to these words and the context, let the reader observe, that to eat and drink the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper unworthily, is to eat and drink as the Corinthians did, who eat it not in reference to Jesus Christ's sacrificial death; but rather in such a way as the Israelites did the pass-over, which they celebrated in remembrance of their deliverance from Egyptian bondage. Likewise these mongrel Christians at Corinth, used it as a kind of historical commemoration of the death of Christ; and did not, in the whole institution, discern the Lord's body and blood as a sacrificial offering for sin: and besides, in their celebration of it, they acted in a way utterly un-coming the gravity of a sacred ordinance. Those who acknowledge it as a sacrificial offering, and receive it in remembrance of God's love to them in sending his Son into the world, can neither bring damnation upon themselves by so doing; nor eat nor drink unworthily. See our translation of this verse vindicated, at the end of the chapter.

Shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord] If he use it irreverently, if he deny that Christ suffered unjustly, (for of some such persons the apostle must be understood to speak,) then he in effect joins issue with the Jews in their condemnation and crucifixion of the Lord Jesus; and renders himself guilty of the death of our blessed Lord. Some, however, understand the passage thus; is guilty, i. e. eats and drinks unworthily, and brings on himself that punishment mentioned ver. 30.

Verse 28. Let a man examine himself] Let him try whether he has proper faith in the Lord Jesus; and whether he discerns the Lord's body; and whether he duly considers that the bread and wine point out the crucified body and split blood of Christ?

Verse 29. Eateth and drinketh damnation] Κριμα, judgment, punishment; and yet this is not unto damnation, for the judgment or punishment inflicted upon the disorderly and the profane, was intended for their emendation; for in ver. 32. it is said, when we are judged, απομαυνοι, we are chastened, κατανοηθησθε, corrected as a father does his children, that we should not be condemned with the world.

Verse 30. For this cause] That they partook of this sacred ordinance without discerning the Lord's body: many are weak and sickly; it is hard to say whether these words refer to the consequences of their own intemperance, or to some extraordinary disorders inflicted immediately by God himself. That there were disorders of the most reprehensible kind among these people at this sacred supper, the preceding verses sufficiently point out: and after such excesses, many might be weak and sickly among them; and many might sleep, i. e. die; for continual experience shows us, that many fall victims to their own intemperance. Verse 33. When ye come together to eat] The Lord's supper, tarry one for another; do not eat and drink in parties, as ye have done heretofore; and do not connect it with any other meal.

Verse 34. And if any man hunger] Let him not come to the house of God to eat an ordinary meal, let him eat at home; take that in his own house which is necessary for the support of his body, before he comes to that sacred repast; where he should have the feeding of his soul alone in view.

That ye come not together unto condemnation] That ye may avoid the curse that must fall on such worthless communicants as those above-mentioned; and that ye may get that especial blessing which every one that discerns the Lord's body, in the eucharist, must receive.

The rest will I set in order, &c.] All the other matters relative to this business, to which you have referred in your letter, I will regulate when I come to visit you; as, God permitting, I fully design. The apostle did visit them about one year after this, as is generally believed.

I have already been so very particular on this long and difficult chapter, that I have left neither room nor necessity for many supplementary observations. A few remarks are all that is requisite.

1. The apostle inculcates the necessity of order and subjection; especially in the church. Those who are impatient of rule, are generally those who wish to tyrannize. And those who are loudest in their complaints against authority, whether civil or ecclesiastical, are those who wish to have the power in their own hands and would infallibly abuse it if they had. They alone who are willing to obey, are capable of rule; and he who can rule well, is as willing to obey as to govern. Let all be submissive and orderly; let the woman know that the man is head and protector; let the man know that Christ is his Head and Redeemer; and the gift of God's endless mercy for the salvation of a lost world.

2. The apostle insisted on the woman having her head covered in the church, or Christian assembly. If he saw the manner in which Christian women now dress, and appear in the ordinances of religion, what would he think? What would he say? How could he even distinguish the Christian from the infidel? And if they who are in Christ, are new creatures, and the persons who ordinarily appear, in religious assemblies, are really new creatures, as they profess, in general, to be in Christ; he might reasonably inquire, if these are new creatures, what must have been their appearance when they were old creatures? Do we dress to be seen? And do we go to the house of God to exhibit ourselves? Wretched is that man or woman who goes to the house of God to be seen by any but God himself.

3. The Lord's supper may be well termed the feast of charity; how unbecoming this sacred ordinance, to be the subject of dispute, party spirit, and division! Those who make it such, must answer for it to God. Every man who believes in Christ as his atoning sacrifice, should as frequently as he can, receive the sacrament of the Lord's supper. And every minister of Christ is bound to administer it to every man who is seeking the salvation of his soul, as well as to all believers. Let no man dare to oppose this ordinance; and let every man receive it according to the institution of Christ.

4. Against the fidelity of our translation of ver. 27. of this chapter, Whosoever shall eat this bread and drink this cup unworthily, several Popish writers have made heavy complaints, and accused the Protestants of wilful corruption; as both the Greek and Vulgate texts, instead of eat and et, AND, have et and vel, OR: Whosoever shall eat this bread or drink this cup. As this criticism is made to countenance their unscriptural communion in one kind, it may be well to examine the ground of the complaint. Supposing even this objection to be valid, their cause can gain nothing by it while the 26th and 28th verses stand both in the Greek text and Vulgate, as they now do; For, as often as ye eat this bread, AND drink this cup, &c.—Let him eat of that bread AND drink of that cup. But although et, OR, be the reading of the common printed text, eat, AND, is the reading of the Codex Alexandrinus, and the Codex Claromontanus, two of the best MSS. in the world; as also of the Codex Lincolnensis, 2, and the Codex Pelavianus, 3, both MSS. of the first character: it is also the reading of the ancient Syriac, all the Arabic, the Coptic, the margin of the latter Syriac, the Ethiopic, different MSS. of the Vulgate, and of one in my own possession; and of Clemens, Chromatius, and Cassiodorus. Though the present text of the Vulgate has vel, OR, yet this is a departure from the original editions, which were all professedly taken from the best MSS. In the famous Bible without date, place, or printer's name, 2 vols. fol. two columns, and forty-five lines in each, supposed by many to be the first Bible ever printed, the text stands thus: Itaque quicumque manducaverit panem et biberit calicem, &c.—Wherefore whosoever shall eat this bread AND drink this cup, &c. here is no vel, OR. The Bible printed by Fust, 1462, the first Bible with a date, has the same reading. Did the Protestants corrupt these texts? In the editio princeps of the Greek Testament, printed by the authority of Cardinal Ximenes at Complutum, and published by the authority of Pope Leo X. though et OR, stands in the Greek text; yet in the opposite column which contains the Vulgate, and in the opposite line, et, AND, is found, and not vel, OR; though the Greek text would have authorized the editor to have made this change; but he conscientiously preserved the text of his Vulgate. Did the Protestants corrupt this Catholic text also? Indeed, so little design had any of those who differed from the Romish church, to make any alteration here, that even Wiclif, having a faulty MS. of the Vulgate by him, which read vel instead of et, followed that faulty MS. and translated, And so who ever schal ete the bread or drinke the cup.

That eat, AND, is the true reading; and not et, OR, both MSS. and Versions sufficiently prove: also that et, not vel, is the proper reading in the Vulgate, those original editions formed by Roman Catholics, and one of them by the highest authority in the Papal church, fully establish: likewise those MSS. Versions, Fathers, and original editions, must be allowed to be not only competent, but also unsuspected and incontrovertible witnesses.

But as this objection to our translation is brought forward to vindicate the withholding the cup from the laity in the Lord's supper; it may be necessary to show that without the cup there can be no eucharist. With respect to the bread, our Lord had simply said, Take, eat, this is my body: but concerning the cup, he says, Drink ye all of this; for as this pointed out the very essence of the institution, viz. the blood of atonement, it was necessary that each should have a particular application of it; therefore he says, Drink ye ALL of THIS. By this we are taught that the cup is essential to the sacrament of the Lord's supper; so that they who deny the cup to the people, sin against God's institution; and they who receive not the cup, are not partakers of the body and blood of Christ. If either could, without mortal prejudice, be omitted, it might be the bread; but the cup, as pointing out the blood, poured out, i. e. the life, by which alone the great sacrificial act is performed, and remission of sins procured, is absolutely indispensable. On this ground it is demonstrable, that there is not a Popish priest under heaven, who denies the cup to the people, (and they all do this,) that can be said to celebrate the Lord's supper, at all; nor is there one of their votaries that ever received the holy sacrament. All pretension to this is an absolute farce, so long as the cup, the emblem of the atoning blood, is denied. How strange is it, that the very men, who plead so much for the bare literal meaning of this is my body, in the preceding verse, should deny all meaning to drink ye all of this cup, in this verse. And though Christ has, in the most positive manner, enjoyed it, they will not permit one of the laity to taste it! See the whole of this argument, at large, in my Discourse on the Nature and Design of the Eucharist.

CHAPTER XII.

The apostle proceeds to the question of the Corinthians concerning spiritual gifts, 1. He calls to their remembrance their former state, and how they were brought out of it, 2, 3. Shows that there are diversities of gifts which proceed from the Spirit, 4. Diversities of administrations which proceed from the Lord Jesus, 5. And diversities of operations which proceed from God, 6. What these gifts are, and how they are dispensed, 7—11. Christ is the Head, and the church his members; and this is pointed out under the similitude of the human body, 12, 13. The relation which the members of the body have to each other; and how necessary their mutual support, 14—26. The members in the church, or spiritual body, and their respective offices, 27—30. We should earnestly covet the best gifts, 31.

NOTES ON CHAP. XII.

Verse 1. Now concerning spiritual gifts] This was a subject about which they appear to have written to the apostle; and concerning which there were probably some contentions among them. The words ἡμῶν τῶν πνευματικῶν may as well be translated concerning spiritual persons, as spiritual gifts; and indeed the former agrees much better with the context.

I would not have you ignorant.] I wish you fully to know whence all such gifts come, and for what end they are given, that each person may serve the church in the capacity in which God has placed him; that there may be no misunderstandings, and no schism in the body.

Verse 2. Ye were Gentiles] Previously to your conversion to the Christian faith; ye were heathens, carried away, not guided by reason or truth, but hurried by your passions into a senseless worship, the chief part of which was calculated only to excite and gratify animal propensities.

Dumb idols] Though often supplicated, could never return an answer; so that not only the image could not speak, but the god or demon pretended to be represented by it, could not speak: a full proof that an idol was nothing in the world.

Verse 3. No man speaking by the Spirit of God] It was granted on all hands, that there could be no religion without divine inspiration; because God alone could make his will known to men: hence heathenism pretended to this inspiration. Judaism had it in the law and the prophets; and it was the very essence of the Christian religion. The heathen priests and priestesses pretended to receive, by inspiration from their god, the answers which they gave to their votaries. And, as far as the people believed their pretensions, so far they were led by their teaching.

Both Judaism and heathenism were full of expectations of a future teacher and deliverer: and to this person, especially among the Jews, the Spirit in all the prophets gave witness. This was the Anointed One, the Messiah, who was manifested in the person of Jesus of Nazareth; and him the Jews rejected, though he proved his divine mission, both by his doctrines and his miracles. But, as he did not come as they fancied he would, as a mighty secular conqueror; they not only rejected, but blasphemed him; and persons among them, professing to be spiritual men, and under the influence of the Spirit of God, did so. But as the Holy Spirit, through all the law and the prophets, gave testimony to the Messiah; and as Jesus proved himself to be the Christ, both by his miracles and doctrines, no man, under the inspiration of the Divine Spirit, could say to him Anathema, thou art a deceiver, and a person worthy of death, &c. as the Jews did: therefore the Jews were no longer under the inspiration of the Spirit of God. This appears to be the meaning of the apostle in this place; No man speaking by the Spirit, &c.

And that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord] Nor can we demonstrate this person to be the Messiah and the Saviour of men, but by the Holy Ghost, enabling us to speak with divers tongues, to work miracles: He attesting the truth of our doctrines to them that hear, by enlightening their minds, changing their hearts, and filling them with the peace and love of God.

A. M. 4060. 4 Now, ^a there are diversities of gifts, but ^b the same Spirit.

5 ^c And there are differences of ^d administrations, but the same Lord.

6 And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God ^e which worketh all in all.

7 ^f But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal.

A. M. 4060. 8 For to one is given by the Spirit, ^g the word of wisdom; to another, ^h the word of knowledge by the same Spirit;

9 ⁱ To another, faith by the same Spirit; to another, ^k the gifts of healing by the same Spirit;

10 ^l To another, the working of miracles; to another, ^m prophecy; ⁿ to another, discerning of spirits; to another ^o divers kinds of tongues;

Verse 4. There are diversities of gifts] Χαρισματων, gracious endowments; leading to miraculous results: such as the gift of prophecy, speaking different tongues, &c. And these all came by the extraordinary influences of the Holy Spirit.

Verse 5. Differences of administrations] Διακονιαι, various offices in the church, such as apostle, prophet, and teacher, under which were probably included bishop or presbyter, pastor, deacon, &c. the qualifications for such offices, as well as the appointments themselves, coming immediately from the one Lord, Jesus Christ.

Verse 6. Diversities of operations] Ενεργηματων, miraculous influences exerted on others; such as the expulsion of dæmons, inflicting extraordinary punishments, as in the case of Aanias and Sapphira, Elymas the sorcerer, &c. the healing of different diseases, raising the dead, &c. all these proceeded from God the Father, as the fountain of all goodness and power, and the immediate dispenser of every good and perfect gift.

In the three preceding verses we find more than an indirect reference to the doctrine of the Sacred Trinity.

GIFTS, are attributed to the Holy Spirit, ver. 4.

ADMINISTRATIONS, to the Lord Jesus, ver. 5.

OPERATIONS, to God the Father, ver. 6. He who may think this fanciful, must account for the very evident distinctions here, in some more satisfactory way.

Verse 7. The manifestation of the Spirit] φανερωσις τω Πνευματι: this is variously understood by the fathers, some of them rendering φανερωσις, by illumination, others, demonstration, and others, operation. The apostle's meaning seems to be this: whatever gifts God has bestowed, or in what various ways soever the Spirit of God may have manifested himself, it is all for the common benefit of the church; God has given no gift to any man for his own private advantage, or exclusive profit. He has it for the benefit of others, as well as for his own salvation.

Verse 8. Word of wisdom] In all these places, I consider that the proper translation of λογος, is doctrine, as in many other places of the New Testament. It is very difficult to say what is intended here by the different kinds of gifts mentioned by the apostle; they were probably all supernatural, and were necessary at that time only for the benefit of the church. On the 8th, 9th, and 10th verses, much may be seen in Lightfoot, Whitby, Pearce, and others.

1. By doctrine of wisdom, we may understand, as Bp. Pearce and Dr. Whitby observe, the mystery of our redemption, in which the wisdom of God was most eminently conspicuous: see chap. ii. 7, and 10. and which is called the manifest wisdom of God, Eph. iii. 10. Christ, the great teacher of it, is called the wisdom of God, 1 Cor. i. 24. and in him are said to be contained all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, Col. ii. 3. The apostles, to whom this doctrine was committed, are called σοφοι, wise men, Matt. xxiii. 34. and they are said to teach this Gospel according to the wisdom given them, 2 Peter iii. 15.

2. By the doctrine of knowledge, we may understand either a knowledge of the types, &c. in the Old Testament, or what are termed mysterics; the calling of the Gentiles, the recalling of the Jews: the mystery of iniquity,—of the beast, &c. and especially the mystical sense or meaning of the Old Testament, with all its types, rites, ceremonies, &c. &c.

3. By faith, ver. 9. we are to understand that miraculous faith by which they could remove mountains, chap. xiii. 2. or a peculiar impulse, as Dr. Whitby calls it, that came upon the apostles when any difficult matter was to be performed, which inwardly assured them that God's power would assist them in the performance of it. Others think that justifying faith received by means of Gospel teaching, is what is intended.

4. Gifts of healing, simply refers to the power which at particular times the apostles received from the Holy Spirit, to cure diseases; a power which was not always resident in them; for Paul could not cure Timothy, nor remove his own thorn in the flesh; because it was given only on extraordinary occasions, though perhaps more generally than many others.

5. The working of miracles, ενεργηματα δυναμων, ver. 10. This seems to refer to the same class as the operations, ενεργηματων, ver. 6. as the words are the same, and to signify those powers

A. M. 4080. A. D. 56. A. U. C. 809. Aa. Imp. Neronis Cæs. 3. to another, the interpretation of tongues:

11 But all these worketh that one and self-same Spirit, ^a dividing to every man severally ^b as he will.

12 For, ^c as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body: ^d so also is Christ.

13 For ^e by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, ^f whether we be Jews or ^g Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and ^h have been all made to drink into one Spirit.

14 For the body is not one member, but many.

by which they were enabled at particular times to work miraculously on others; ejecting demons, inflicting punishments or judgments, as in the cases mentioned under verse 6. It is a hendiadys, for mighty operations.

6. Prophecy.—This seems to import two things, 1st, The predicting future events, such as then particularly concerned the state of the church and the apostles; as the dearth foretold by Agabus, Acts xi. 28. and the binding of St. Paul, and delivering him to the Romans, Acts xxi. 10, &c. and St. Paul's foretelling his own shipwreck on Malta, Acts xxvii. 25, &c. And 2dly, As implying the faculty of teaching or expounding the Scriptures, which is also a common acceptance of the word.

7. Discerning of spirits.—A gift by which the person so privileged, could discern a false miracle from a true one; or a pretender to inspiration from him who was made really partaker of the Holy Ghost. It probably extended also to the discernment of false professors from true ones; as appears in Peter, in the case of Ananias and his wife.

8. Divers kinds of tongues.—ἑνὴ γλῶσσαν, different languages, which they had never learned; and which God gave them for the immediate instruction of the people of different countries who attended their ministry.

9. Interpretation of tongues.—It was necessary that while one was speaking the deep things of God, in a company where several were present who did not understand, though the majority did, there should be a person who could immediately interpret what was said to that part of the congregation that did not understand the language. This power to interpret was also an immediate gift of God's Spirit: and is classed here among the miracles.

Verse 11. But all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit] All these gifts are miraculously bestowed; they cannot be acquired by human art or industry; the different languages excepted: but they were given in such a way, and in such circumstances, as sufficiently proved that they also were miraculous gifts.

Verse 12. For as the body is one] Though the human body have many members, and though it be composed of a great variety of parts, yet it is but one entire system: every part and member being necessary to the integrity or completeness of the whole.

So also is Christ] That is, so is the church the body of Christ, being composed of the different officers already mentioned, and especially those enumerated, ver. 28. apostles, prophets, teachers, &c. It cannot be supposed that Christ is composed of many members, &c. and therefore the term church must be understood; unless we suppose, which is not improbable, that the term Ὁ Χριστός, Christ, is here used to express the church, or whole body of Christian believers.

Verse 13. For by one Spirit are we all baptized, &c.] As the body of man, though composed of many members, is formed and influenced by one soul; so the church of Christ, which is his body, though composed of many members, is informed and influenced by one Spirit, the Holy Ghost, actuating and working by this spiritual body; as the human soul does in the body of man.

To drink into one Spirit] We are to understand being made partakers of the gifts and graces of the Holy Ghost, agreeably to the words of our Lord, John vii. 37, &c. If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink: this he spake of the Spirit which they that believed on him should receive.

On this verse there is a great profusion of various readings, which may be found in Griesbach; but cannot be conveniently noticed here.

Verse 14. For the body is not one member] The mystical body, the church, as well as the natural body, is composed of many members.

Verse 15. If the foot shall say, &c.] As all the members of the body are necessarily dependent on each other, and minister to the general support of the system; so it is in the church. All the private members are intimately connected among themselves; and also with their pastors: without which union, no church can subsist.

Verse 21. And the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee] The apostle goes on with his principal object in view, to show that the gifts and graces with which their different teachers were endowed, were all necessary for their salvation, and should be collectively used; for not one of them was unnecessary, nor could they dispense with the least of them; the body of Christ needed the whole for its nourishment and support. The famous apologue of Menenius Agrippa, related by Livy, will serve to illustrate the apostle's reasoning. The Roman people, getting into a state of insurrection and rebellion against the nobility, under pretext that the great men not only had all the honours, but all the emoluments of the nation; while they were obliged to bear all the burdens, and suffer all privations. Matters were at last brought to such an issue, that the senators and great men were obliged to fly from the city, and the public peace was on the point of being utterly ruined: it was then thought expedient to send Menenius Agrippa to them, who was high in their esteem, having vanquished the Sabines and Samnites, and had the first triumph at Rome. This great general, who was as eloquent as he was valiant, went to the Mons Sacer, to which the insurgents had retired, and thus addressed them: Tempore, quo in homine non, ut nunc, omnia in unum consentiebant, sed singulis membris suum cuique consilium, seu sermo fuerat, indignatas reliquas partes, sua cura, suo labore ac ministerio ventri omnia queri; ventrem, in medio quietum, nihil aliud, quam datis voluptatibus frui. Conspirasse inde, ne manus ad os cibum ferrent, nec os acciperet datum, nec dentes conficerent. Hæc irâ: dum ventrem fame domare vellent, ipsa unâ membra totumque corpus ad extremam tabem venisse. Inde apparuisse, ventris quoque haud æque ministerium esse: nec magis ali, quam alere eum, reddentem in omnes corporis partes hunc, quo vivimus vigemusque, divisum pariter in vena maturum, confecto cibo, sanguinem. T. Livii, Histor. lib. ii. cap. 32. "In that time in which the different parts of the human body were not in a state of unity as they now are, but each member had its separate office and distinct language; they all became discontented, because whatever was procured by their care, labour, and industry, was spent on the belly; while this, lying at ease in the midst of the body, did nothing but enjoy whatever was provided for it. They therefore conspired among themselves, and agreed that the hands should not convey food to the mouth; that the mouth should not receive what was offered to it; and that the teeth should not masticate whatever was brought to the mouth. Acting on this principle of revenge, and hoping to reduce the belly by famine, all the members, and the whole body itself, were at length brought into the last stage of a consumption. It then plainly appeared that the belly itself did no small service; that it contributed not less to their nourishment than they did to its support; distributing to every part that from which they derived life and vigour; for, by properly concocting the food, the pure blood derived from it, was conveyed by the arteries to every member."

This sensible comparison produced the desired effect: the people were persuaded that the senators were as necessary to their existence as they were to that of the senators; and that it required the strictest union and mutual support of high and low, to preserve the body politic. This transaction took place about 500 years before the Christian era, and was handed down by unbroken tradition, to the time of Titus Livius, from whom I have taken it; who died the year of our Lord 17, about forty years before St. Paul wrote this epistle: as his works were well known, and universally read among the Romans in the time of the apostle, it is very probable that St. Paul had this famous apologue in view, when he wrote from the 14th-verse to the end of the chapter.

Verse 22. Those members—which seem to be more feeble] These, and the less honourable and the uncomely, mentioned in the next verses, seem to mean the principal viscera, such as the heart, lungs, stomach, and intestinal canal. These, when compared with the arms and limbs, are comparatively weak, and some of them, considered in themselves, uncomely and less honourable—yet these are more essential to life, than any of the others. A man may lose an eye by accident, and an arm, or a leg, may be amputated; and yet the body live and be vigorous: but let the stomach, heart, lungs, or any of the viscera, be removed, and life becomes necessarily extinct. Hence these parts are not only covered, but the parts in which they are lodged are surrounded, ornamented, and fortified for their preservation and defence, on the

A. M. 4080. in the body; but that the members should have the same care one for another.

26 And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it.

proper performance of whose functions life so immediately depends.

Verse 24. For our comely parts have no need.] It would be easy to go into great detail in giving an anatomical description of the different members and parts to which the apostle refers; but it would not, probably, answer the end of general edification—and to explain every allusion made by the apostle, would require a minuteness of description, which would not be tolerated, except in a treatise on the anatomy of the human body. My readers will therefore excuse my entering into this detail.

Verse 25. That there should be no schism in the body] That there should be no unnecessary and independent part in the whole human machine; and that every part should contribute something to the general proportion, symmetry, and beauty of the body. So completely has God tempered the whole together, that not the smallest visible part can be removed from the body without not only injuring its proportions, but producing deformity. Hence the members have the same care one for another.—The eyes and ears watch for the general safety of the whole, and they are placed in the head like sentinels in a tower, that they may perceive the first approach of a foe, and give warning. The hands, immediately on an attack, exert themselves to defend the head and the body; and the limbs are swift to carry off the body from dangers, against which resistance would be vain.—Even the heart takes alarm from both the eyes and the ears: and when an attack is made on the body, every external muscle becomes inflated, and contracts itself, that by thus collecting and concentrating its force, it may the more effectually resist the assailant, and contribute to the defence of the system.

Verse 26. And whether one member suffer] As there is a mutual exertion for the general defence; so there is a mutual sympathy. If the eye, the hand, the foot, &c. be injured, the whole man grieves; and if by clothing, or any thing else, any particular member or part is adorned, strengthened, or better secured; it gives a general pleasure to the whole man.

Verse 27. Now, ye are the body of Christ] The apostle having finished his apologue, comes to his application.

As the members in the human body; so the different members of the mystical body of Christ. All are intended by him to have the same relation to each other, to be mutually subservient to each other, to mourn for, and rejoice with each other. He has also made each necessary to the beauty, proportion, strength, and perfection of the whole. Not one is useless; not 27 Now, ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular.

28 And God hath set some in the church, first, apostles, secondarily, prophets, thirdly, teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of one unnecessary. Paul, Apollos, Kephas, &c. with all their variety of gifts and graces, are for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ, Eph. iv. 12. Hence no teacher should be exalted above, or opposed to another. As the eye cannot say to the hand, I have no need of thee—so luminous Apollos cannot say to laborious Paul, I can build up and preserve the church without thee. The foot planted on the ground to support the whole fabric, and the hands that swing at liberty, and the eye that is continually taking in near and distant prospects, are all equally serviceable to the whole; and mutually helpful to and dependent on each other. So also, are the different ministers and members of the church of Christ.

From a general acquaintance with various ministers of Christ, and a knowledge of their different talents and endowments, manifested either by their preaching or writings, and with the aid of a little fancy, we could here make out a sort of correspondency between their services and the uses of the different members of the human body. We could call one eye, because of his acute observation of men and things, and penetration into cases of conscience, and divine mysteries. Another hand, from his laborious exertions in the church. Another foot, from his industrious travels to spread abroad the knowledge of Christ crucified: and so of others. But this does not appear to be any part of the apostle's plan.

Verse 28. God hath set some in the church] As God has made evident distinctions among the members of the human body, so that some occupy a more eminent place than others: so has he in the church. And to prove this the apostle enumerates the principal offices, and in the order in which they should stand.

First, apostles] Απιστολοι, from απο, from, and σλλαω, I send; to send from one person to another, and from one place to another. Persons immediately designated by Christ, and sent by him to preach the Gospel to all mankind.

Secondarily, prophets] Προφηται, from προ, before, and φημι, I speak; a person who, under divine inspiration, predicts future events: but the word is often applied to those who preached the Gospel. See on ver. 10.

Thirdly, teachers] Διδασκαλοι, from διδασκω, I teach. Persons whose chief business it was to instruct the people in the elements of the Christian religion, and their duty to each other. See on Rom. viii. 8.

Miracles] Δελημια. Persons endued with miraculous gifts, such as those mentioned Mark xvi. 17, 18. casting out devils, speaking with new tongues, &c. see on ver. 10. and at the end of the chapter.

Gifts of healing] Χαρσματα ιαματων. Such as laying hands upon the sick and healing them, Mark xvi. 18. which, as being one of the most beneficent miraculous powers, was most frequently conceded. See on ver. 8.

Helps] Αρτιμαχοι. Dr. Lightfoot conjectures that these were the apostles' helpers; persons who accompanied them, baptized those who were converted by them; and were sent by them to such places as they could not attend to, being otherwise employed.

The Levites are termed by the Talmudists, helps of the priests. The word occurs Luke i. 54—Rom. viii. 26.

Governments] Κυβερνησεις. Dr. Lightfoot contends that this word does not refer to the power of ruling, but to the case of a person endued with a deep and comprehensive mind, who is profoundly wise and prudent; and he thinks that it implies the same as discernment of spirits; ver. 10. where see the note. He has given several proofs of this use of the word in the Septuagint.

Diversities of tongues] Γενε γλωσσαι, kinds of tongues; that is, different kinds—The power to speak, on all necessary occasions, languages which they had not learned. See on ver. 10.

Verse 29. Are all apostles, &c.] That is, all are not apostles; all are not prophets, &c. God has distributed his various gifts among various persons, each of whom is necessary for the complete edification of the body of Christ. On these subjects see the notes on verses 7, 8, 9, 10.

Verse 31. But covet earnestly] To covet, signifies, to desire earnestly. This disposition towards heavenly things is highly laudable—towards earthly things, is deeply criminal. A man may possess the best of all these gifts, and yet be deficient in what is essentially necessary to his salvation; for he may be without that love or charity which the apostle here calls the more excellent way, and which he proceeds in the next chapter to describe.

Some think that this verse should be read affirmatively, Ye earnestly contend about the best gifts; but I show unto you a more excellent way; i. e. get your hearts filled with love to God and man:—Love which is the principle of obedience; which works no ill to its neighbour, and which is the fulfilling of the law. This is a likely reading, for there was certainly more contentions in the church of Corinth about the gifts, than about the graces of the Spirit.

1. After all that has been said on the different offices mentioned by the apostle in the preceding chapter, there are some of them which, perhaps, are not understood. I confess I scarcely know what to make of those which we translate helps and governments. Bishop Pearce, who could neither see church government, nor state government in these words, expresses himself thus: "These two words, after all that the commentators say about them, I do not understand; and in no other part of the New Testament, is either of them, in any sense, mentioned as the gift of the Spirit; especially it is observable that in ver. 29, 30. where the gifts of the Spirit are again enumerated, no notice is taken of any thing like them, while all the other several parts are exactly enumerated. Perhaps these words were put in the margin to explain δυναμεις, miracles, or powers. Some taking the meaning to be helps, assistances, as in 2 Cor. xii. 9. Others to be κυβερνησεις, governments, as in Rom. viii. 38. and from being marginal explanations, they might have been at last incorporated with the text." It must, however, be acknowledged, that the omission of these words is not countenanced by any MS. or Version. One thing we may fully know, that there are some men who are peculiarly qualified for governing by either providence or grace; and that there are others who can neither govern nor direct, but are good helpers.

2. In three several places in this chapter the apostle sums up the gifts of the Spirit. Dr. Lightfoot thinks they answer to each other in the following order, which the reader will take on his authority.

Verses 8, 9, 10.
 Is given
 The word of Wisdom;
 The word of Knowledge
 Verse 9. Faith;
 Gifts of Healings.
 Ver. 10. Working of Miracles; Prophecy;
 Discerning of Spirits;
 Divers kinds of Tongues;
 Interpretation of Tongues.

Verse 28.
 God hath set some First, APOSTLES;
 Secondly, PROPHETS;
 Thirdly, TEACHERS;
 After that, MIRACLES;
 The GIFTS of HEALINGS; HELPS; GOVERNMENTS;
 Divers kinds of Tongues.

Verses 29, and 30.
 Are all Apostles; Prophets; Teachers;
 Miracles;
 Verse 30. Gifts of Healings Speak with Tongues; Interpret.

If the reader thinks that this is the best way of explaining these different gifts and offices, he will adopt it; and he will, in that case, consider, 1. That the word or doctrine of wisdom comes from the apostles. 2. The doctrine of knowledge, from the prophets. 3. Faith, by means of the teachers. 4. That working of miracles includes the gifts of healing. 5. That to prophesy, signifying preaching, which it frequently does, helps is a parallel. 6. That discernment of spirits, is the same with governments, which Dr. Lightfoot supposes to imply a deeply comprehensive, wise, and prudent mind. 7. As to the gift of tongues, there is no variation in either of the three places.

3. It is strange that in this enumeration, only three distinct offices in the church should be mentioned: viz. apostles, prophets, and teachers. We do not know that miracles, gifts of healing, helps, governments, and diversity of tongues, were exclusive offices; for it is probable that apostles, prophets, and teachers, wrought miracles occasionally, and spoke with divers tongues. However, in all this enumeration, where the apostle gives us all the officers, and gifts necessary for the constitution of a church; we find not one word of bishops, presbyters, or deacons; much less of the various officers and offices which the Christian church at present exhibits. Perhaps the bishops are included under the apostles: the presbyters under the prophets; and the deacons under the teachers.—As to the other ecclesiastical officers with which the Romish church teems, they may seek them who are determined to find them, any where out of the New Testament.

4. Mr. Quemel observes on these passages, that there are three sorts of gifts necessary to the forming Christ's mystical body. 1. Gifts of power, for the working of miracles, in reference to the Father. 2. Gifts of labour and ministry, for the exercise of government and other offices, with respect to the Son. 3. Gifts of knowledge for the instruction of the people, with relation to the Holy Ghost.

The FATHER is the principle and end of all created power; let us then ultimately refer all things to Him.

The SON is the Institutor and Head of all the hierarchical ministries; let us depend upon Him.

The HOLY GHOST is the fountain and fulness of all spiritual graces; let us desire and use them, only in and by Him.

There is nothing good, nothing profitable to salvation, unless it be done in the power of God, communicated by Christ Jesus, and in that holiness of heart which is produced by his SPIRIT. Pastors are only the instruments of God, the depositories of the authority of Christ, and the channels by whom the love and graces of the Spirit are conveyed. Let these act as receiving all from God by Christ, through the Holy Ghost; and let the church receive them as the ambassadors of the Almighty.

NOTES ON CHAP. XIII.

Verse 1. Though I speak, &c.] At the conclusion of the preceding chapter, the apostle promised to show the Corinthians a more excellent way than that in which they were now proceeding. They were so distracted with contentions, divided by parties, and envious of each other's gifts, that unity was nearly destroyed. This was a full proof that love to God and man was wanting; and that without this, their numerous gifts and other graces were nothing in the eyes of God; for it was evident that they did not love one another, which is a proof that they did not love God; and, consequently, that they had not true religion. Having, by his advices and directions, corrected many abuses, and having showed them how, in outward things, they should walk so as to please God, he now shows them the spirit, temper, and disposition, in which this should be done, and without which all the rest must be ineffectual.

Before I proceed to the consideration of the different parts of this chapter, it may be necessary to examine whether the word αγάπη, be best translated by charity or love. Wiclif, translating from the Vulgate, has the word charity, and him our authorized version follows. But Coverdale, Matthews, Cranmer, and the Geneva Bible, have love; which is adopted by recent translators and commentators in general;

among whom the chief are Dodd, Pearce, Purver, Wakefield, and Wesley; all these strenuously contend that the word charity, which is now confined to almsgiving, is utterly improper; and that the word love, alone expresses the apostle's sense. As the word charity seems now to express little else than almsgiving, which, performed even to the uttermost of a man's power, is nothing, if he lack what the apostle terms agape, and which we here translate charity; it is best to omit the use of a word in this place, which, taken in its ordinary signification, makes the apostle contradict himself; see ver. 3. Though I give all my goods to feed the poor, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing.—That is, “though I have the utmost charity, and act in every respect according to its dictates; yet if I have not charity, my utmost charity is unprofitable.” Therefore, to shun this contradiction, and the probable misapplication of the term, Love had better be substituted for CHARITY.

The word agape, love, I have already considered at large in the note on Matt. xxiii. 37. and to that place I beg leave to refer the reader for its derivation and import. Our English word love we have from the Teutonic luben to live, because love is the means, dispenser, and preserver of life; and without it, life would have nothing desirable, nor indeed any thing even supportable: or it may be taken immediately from the Anglo-Saxon lofa and lufa, love, from lupan and lupan, to desire, to love, to favour. It would be ridiculous to look to the Greek verb φιλεω for its derivation.

Having said so much about the word love, we should say something of the word charity, which is supposed to be improper in this place. Charity comes to us immediately from the French charité, who borrowed it from the Latin charitas, which is probably borrowed from the Greek χαρις, signifying grace or favour, or χαρη, joy, as a benefit bestowed is a favour that inspires him who receives it with joy; and so far contributes to his happiness. The proper meaning of the word CHARUS, is dear, costly; and CHARITAS, is dearth, scarcity, a high price, or dearness. Hence, as in times of dearth or scarcity, many, especially the poor, must be in want, and the benevolent will be excited to relieve them; the term which expressed the cause of this want, was applied to the disposition which was excited in behalf of the sufferer. Now, as he who relieves a person in distress, and preserves his life, by communicating a portion of his property to him, will feel a sort of interest in the person thus preserved: hence he is said to be dear to him: i. e. he has cost him something; and he values him in proportion to the trouble or expense he has cost him. Thus charity properly expresses that affectionate attachment we may feel to a person whose wants we have been enabled to relieve; but originally it signified that want of the necessaries of life, which produced dearth or deariness of those necessaries; and brought the poor man into that state in which he stood so much in need of the active benevolence of his richer neighbour. If the word be applied to God's benevolence towards man, it comes in with all propriety and force: we are dear to God, for we have not been purchased with silver or gold, but with the precious τιμη αιματος (costly) blood of Christ, who so loved us as to give his life a ransom for ours.

As Christians in general acknowledge that this chapter is the most important in the whole New Testament, I shall give here the first translation of it into the English language, which is known to exist; extracted from an ancient and noble MS. in my own possession, which seems to exhibit both a text and language prior to the time of Wiclif. The reader will please to observe that there are no divisions of verses in the MS.

The XIII. chapter of I. Corinthians, from an ancient MS.

Of I speke with tungis of men and aungels sothell I habe not charitee: I am maad as brasse sounpunge, or a symbale tynking. And gif I schal habe prophetic and habe knowen alle mysteris and alle kunnyng and science. and gif I schal habe al feith so that I ober bere hillis fro oo place to an other. forsothe gif I schal not habe charite: I am nougt. And gif I schal deperte al my goodis into metts of pore men. And gif I schal bitake my body so that I brenne forsothe gif I schal not habe charite it profitith to me no thing. Charite is patient or sufferinge. It is benyng or of good wille. Charite enbyeth not. It doth not gyle: it is not inblowen with pride it is not ambycious or covetouse of wircschippis. It seekyth not the thingis that ben her owne. It is not stirid to wreath it thinkith not pvel, it jopeth nat on wickidnesse: forsothe it jopeth to gydre to treuthe. It suffereth alle thingis, it biweveth alle thingis. It hopith alle thingis: it susteeneth alle thingis. Charite fallith not down. Whether prophetis schuln be void epyter langagis schuln ceese: epyter sciencis shal be destraped. Forsothe of party we han knowen: and of party propheten. Forsothe whenne that schal cum to that is perfite: that thing that is of party schal be abyddid. Whenne I was a litil child: I spake as a litil child. I understode as a litil child: I thougte as a litil child. Forsothe whenn I was maad a man: I abyddid the thingis that weren of a litil child. Forsothe we seen now bi a mirar in berennesse: thanne forsothe face to face. Nowe I know of party: thanne forsothe I schal know as I am knowen. Nowe forsothe dwellen feith hoope charite. These three: forsothe the more of hem is charite.

This is the whole of the chapter, as it exists in the MS. with all its peculiar orthography, points, and lines. The words with lines under, may be considered the translator's marginal readings; for though incorporated with the text, they are distinguished from it by those lines.

I had thought once of giving a literal translation of the whole chapter from all the ancient Versions. This would be both curious and useful: but the reader might think it would take up too much of his time; and the writer has none to spare.

The tongues of men] All human languages, with all the eloquence of the most accomplished orator.

And of angels] i. e. Though a man knew the language of the eternal world so well, that he could hold conversation with its inhabitants, and find out the secrets of their kingdom. Or, probably the apostle refers to a notion that was common among the Jews, that there was a language by which angels might be invoked, adored, collected, and dispersed: and, by the means of which, many secrets might be found out: and curious arts and sciences known.

There is much of this kind to be found in their cabalistical books, and in the books of many called Christians. Cornelius Agrippa's occult philosophy abounds in this; and it was the main object of Dr. Dee's actions with spirits, to get a complete vocabulary of this language. See what has been published of his work by Dr. Casaubon; and the remaining manuscript parts in the Sloan library, in the British Museum.

In Bava Bathra, fol. 134. mention is made of a famous rabbin, Jochanan Ben Zaccai, who understood the language of devils, trees, and angels.

Some think that the apostle means only the most splendid eloquence; as we sometimes apply the word angelic to signify any thing sublime, grand, beautiful, &c. but it is more likely that he speaks here after the manner of his countrymen, who imagined that there was an angelic language which was the key to many mysteries; a language which might be acquired, and which, they say, had been learned by several.

Sounding brass] Χαλκος κων. That is, like a trumpet made of brass; for, although Χαλκος signifies brass, and ων signifies the same, yet we know the latter is often employed to signify the trumpet, because generally made of this metal. Thus Virgil when he represents Misenus endeavouring to fright away the harpies with the sound of his trumpet:

Ergo, ubi delapsæ sonitum per curvâ dedere Littora; dat signum speculâ Misenus ab altâ Ære cævo: invadunt socii, et nova prælia tentant,

Obscenas pelagi ferro sædare volucres.

Æneid. lib. iii. ver. 238.

Then as the harpies, from the hills once more, Pour'd shrieking down, and crowded round the shore;

On his high stand, Misenus sounds from far,
The brazen trump, the signal of the war.
With unaccustomed fight, we flew to slay
The forms obscene, dread monsters of the sea.

Pill.

The metal, of which the instrument was made,

is used again for the instrument itself, in that fine passage of the same poet, Æneid. lib. ix. ver. 503. where he represents the Trojans rushing to battle against the Volscians.

At tuba terribilem sonitum procul ære canoro

Increpuit: sequitur clamor, cælumque remugit.

And now the trumpets, terribly from far,
With rattling clangour rouse the sleepy war.
The soldiers' shouts succeed the brazen sounds,
And heaven from pole to pole their noise rebounds.

Dryden.

And again, in his Battle of the Bees, Geo. lib. iv. ver. 70.

*—namque morantes
Martius ille æris rauci canor increpat, et vox Auditur fractos sonitus imitata tubarum.*

With shouts the coward's courage they excite,

And martial clangours call them out to fight;
With hoarse alarms, the hollow camp rebounds,

That imitates the trumpet's angry sounds.

Dryden.

Examples of the same figure might be multiplied; but these are sufficient.

Tinkling cymbal.] "The cymbal was a concavo-convex plate of brass, the concave side of which being struck against another plate of the same kind, produced a tinkling, inharmonious sound." We may understand the apostle thus: "Though I possessed the knowledge of all languages, and could deliver even the truth of God in them, in the most eloquent manner; and, had not a heart full of love to God and man, producing piety and obedience to the ONE, and benevolence and beneficence to the other, doing unto all as I would wish them to do to me, were our situations reversed; my religion is no more to my salvation than the sounds emitted by the brazen trumpet; or the jingling of the cymbals could contribute intellectual pleasure to the instruments which produce them. And, in the sight of God, I am of no more moral worth than those sounds are. I have, it is true, a profession; but destitute of a heart filled with love to God and man, producing meekness, gentleness, long-suffering, &c. I am without the soul and essence of religion."

I have quoted several passages from heathens of the most cultivated minds in Greece and Rome, to illustrate passages of the sacred writers. I shall now quote one from an illiterate collier of Somerset; and as I have named Homer, Horace, Virgil, and others, I will quote Isiah Gregory, whose mind might be compared to a diamond of the first water, whose native splendour broke in various places through its incrustations; but the brilliancy of which was not brought out, for want of the hand of the lapidary. Among various energetic sayings of this great, unlettered man, I remember to have heard the following: "People of little religion are always noisy; he who has not the love of God and man filling his heart, is like an empty wagon coming violently down a hill; it makes a great noise, because there is nothing in it."

Verse 2. And though I have the gift of prophecy] Though I should have received from God the knowledge of future events; so that I could correctly foretell what is coming to pass in the world and in the church:—

And understand all mysteries] The meaning of all the types and figures in the Old Testament; and all the unexplored secrets of nature: and all knowledge; every human art and science: and though I have all faith, such miraculous faith as would enable me even to remove mountains; or had such powerful discernment in sacred things, that I could solve the greatest difficulties: see the note on Matt. xxi. 21. And have not charity; this love to God and man, as the principle and motive of all my conduct, the characteristics of which are given in the following verses:—I am nothing; nothing in myself, nothing in the sight of God, nothing in the church, and good for nothing to mankind. Balaam, and several others, not under the influence of this love of God, prophe- sied: and we daily see many men, who are pro- found scholars, and well skilled in arts and sciences, and yet not only careless about religion, but downright infidels! It does not require the tongue of the inspired to say, that these men, in the sight of God, are nothing; nor can their literary or scientific acquisitions give them a passport to glory.

Verse 3. And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor] This is a proof that charity, in our sense of the word, is not what the apostle means; for surely almsgiving can go no further than to give up all that a man possesses, in order to relieve the wants of others. The word ἑσθίω, which we translate to feed the poor, signifies to divide into morsels, and put into the mouth; which implies carefulness and tenderness in applying the bounty thus freely given.

And though I give my body to be burned] ἢ αὐθινομαι. Mr. Wakefield renders this clause thus: And though I give up my body so as to have cause of boasting; in vindication of which he first refers to Dan. iii. 28. Acts xv. 26. Rom. viii. 32. Phil. i. 20. 2. he says that there is no such word as αὐθινομαι. 3. That αὐχρησμαι, that I may boast, is the reading of the Ethiopic and Coptic, and he might have added of the Codex Alexandrinus, several Greek and Latin MSS. referred to by St. Jerome, by Ephraim, and by St. Jerome himself, who translates the passage thus, Si tradero corpus meum ut glorier: i. e. "If I deliver up my body, that I may glory, or have cause of boasting." 4. He adds, that burning, though a common punishment in after times, was not prevalent when this epistle was written.

Some of the foreign critics, particularly Schulzrus, translate thus, Si traderem corpus, ut mihi stigma inureretur! "If I should deliver up my body, to receive a stigma with a hot iron;" which may mean, if I should, in order to redeem another, willingly give up myself to slavery, and receive the mark of my owner, by having my flesh stamped with a hot iron; and have not love, as before specified, it profits me nothing. This gives a good sense; but will the passage bear it? In the MSS. there are several various readings, which plainly show the original copyists scarcely knew what to make of the word αὐθινομαι, which they found in the text generally. The various readings are αὐθινομαι, which Griesbach seems to prefer: αὐθινομαι and αὐθῖ, all of which give little variation of meaning. Which should be preferred, I can scarcely venture to say. If we take the commonly received word, it states a possible case; a man may be so obstinately wedded to a particular opinion, demonstrably false in itself, as to give up his body to be burned in its defence, as was literally the case with Vanini, who, for his obstinate atheism, was burnt alive at Paris, February 19, A. D. 1619. In such a cause, his giving his body to be burnt, certainly profited him nothing.

"We may observe," says Dr. Lightfoot, "in those instances which are compared with charity, and are as good as nothing, if charity be absent, that the apostle mentions those which were of the noblest esteem in the Jewish nation; and as also the most precious things that could be named by them, were compared with this more precious, and were of no account in comparison of it.

1. To speak with the tongues of men, among the Jewish interpreters, means, to speak the languages of the seventy nations. To the praise of Mordecai, they say, that he understood all those languages; and they require that the fathers of the Sanhedrin should be skilled in many languages, that they may not be obliged to hear any thing by an interpreter. Maim. in Sanh. c. 2.

2. To speak with the tongues of angels, they thought to be not only an excellent gift, but to be possible: and highly extol Jochanan ben Zaccai, because he understood them: see the Note on ver. 1.

3. To know all mysteries and all knowledge, was not only prized but affected by them. Of Hillel, the elder, they say, he had eighty disciples: thirty who were worthy to have the Holy Spirit dwell upon them, as it did upon Moses; thirty who were worthy that the sun should stop his course for them, as it did for Joshua; and there were twenty between both. The greatest of all was Jonathan ben Uzziel; the least was Jochanan ben Zaccai. He omitted not, i. e. (perfectly understood,) the Scripture, the Mishna, the Gemara, the idiotisms of the law, and the scribes, traditions, illustrations, comparisons, equalities, gematries, parables, &c.

4. The moving or rooting up of mountains, which, among them, signified the removing of the greatest difficulties, especially from the sacred text, they considered also a high and glorious attainment: see the note on Matt. xxi. 21. And of his salvation who had it, they could not have formed the slightest doubt. But the apostle says, a man might have and enjoy all those gifts, &c. and be nothing in himself, and be nothing profited by them.⁷⁹

The reader will consider, that the charity or love, concerning which the apostle speaks, is that which is described from ver. 4 to 7, inclusive: it is not left to the conjectures of men to find it out. What the apostle means, is generally allowed to be true religion; but if he had not described it, this true religion would have been as various as the parties are who suppose they have it. Let the reader also observe, that not only the things which are in the highest repute among the Jews, but the things which are in the highest repute among Christians and Gentiles, are those which the apostle shows to be of no use, if the love hereafter described be wanting. And yet, who can suppose that the man hereafter described can be destitute of true religion, as he must be under an especial influence of God; else how, 1st. could he speak all the languages of men? for this was allowed to be one of the extraordinary gifts of God's Spirit. 2. He must have Divine teaching to know the language of angels, and thus to get acquainted with the economy of the invisible world. 3. Without immediate influence from God, he could not be a prophet, and predict future events. 4. Without this he could not understand all the mysteries of the Divine word; nor those of Providence. 5. All knowledge, suppose this be confined to human arts and sciences, could not be acquired without especial assistance. 6. And without the most powerful and extraordinary assistance, he could not have a faith that could remove mountains; or miraculous faith of any kind: and the apostle supposes that a man might have all these six things, and not possess that religion which could save his soul! And may we not say, that if all these could not avail for salvation, a thousand times less surely cannot. How blindly, therefore, are multitudes of persons trusting in that which is almost infinitely less than that which the apostle says would profit them nothing!

The charity or love which God recommends, the apostle describes in sixteen particulars, which are the following:—

Verse 4. (1.) Charity suffereth long] Μακροθυμῶν, has a long mind; to the end of which, neither trials, adversities, persecutions, nor provocations, can reach. The love of God, and of our neighbour for God's sake, is patient towards all men: it suffers all the weakness, ignorance, errors, and infirmities of the children of God; and all the malice and wickedness of the children of this world: and all this, not merely for a time, but long, without end: for it is still a mind or disposition, to the end of which, trials, difficulties, &c. can never reach. It also waits God's time of accomplishing his gracious or providential purposes, without murmuring or repining; and bears its own infirmities as well as those of others, with humble submission to the will of God.

(2.) Is kind] Χρηστωταῖς, it is tender and compassionate in itself, and kind and obliging to others: it is mild, gentle, and benign; and, if called to suffer, inspires the sufferer with the most amiable sweetness, and the most tender affection. It is also submissive to all the dispensations of God; and creates trouble to no one.

(3.) Charity envieth not] Οὐ ζήλοι: is not grieved because another possesses a greater portion of earthly, intellectual, or spiritual blessings. Those who have this pure love, rejoice as much at the happiness, the honour, and comfort of others, as they can do in their own. They are ever willing that others should be preferred before them.

(4.) Charity vaunteth not itself] Οὐ περσηται: This word is variously translated; acteth not rashly, insolently; is not inconstant, &c. It is not agreed by learned men whether it be Greek, Latin, or Arabic. Bishop Pearce derived it from the latter language, and translates it not inconstant. There is a phrase in our own language that expresses what I think to be the meaning of the original, does not set itself forward; does not desire to be noticed or applauded; but wishes that God may be in all.

(5.) Is not puffed up] Οὐ φουσηται: is not inflated with a sense of its own importance; for it knows it has nothing but what it has received; and that it deserves nothing that it has got. Every man whose heart is full of the love of God, is full of humility; for there is no man so humble as he whose heart is cleansed from all sin. It has been said that indwelling sin humbles us; never was there a greater falsity: Pride is the very essence of sin; he who has sin has pride, and pride too in proportion to his sin; this is a mere Papish doctrine; and, strange to tell, the doctrine in which their doctrine of merit is founded! They say, God leaves concupiscence in the heart of every Christian, that in striving with, and overcoming it from time to time, he may have an accumulation of meritorious acts. Certain Protestants say, it is a true sign of a very gracious state, when a man feels and deplors his inbred corruptions. How near do these come to the Papists, whose doctrine they profess to detest and abhor! The truth is, it is no sign of grace whatever; it only argues, as they use it, that the man has got light to show him his corruptions; but he has not yet got grace to destroy them. He is convinced that he should have the mind of Christ, but he feels that he has the mind of Satan; he deplors it; and, if his bad doctrine do not prevent him, he will not rest till he feels the blood of Christ cleansing him from all sinful lust and corruption.

True humility arises from a sense of the fullness of God in the soul; abasement from a sense of corruption, is a widely different thing; but this has been put in the place of humility; and even called grace; many, very many, verify the saying of the poet:—

“ Proud I am, my wants to see;
Proud of my humility.”

Verse 5. (6.) Doth not behave itself unseemly] Ου ασηχημον, from α, negative, and σχημα, figure, mien; love never acts out of its place or character: observes due decorum and good manners; is never rude, boarish, or brutish: and is ever willing to become all things to all men, that it may please them for their good to edification. No ill-bred man, or what is termed rude or unmannerly, is a Christian. A man may have a natural bluntness, or be a clown, and yet there be nothing boarish or hoggish in his manner. I must apologize for using such words; they best express the evil against which I wish, both powerfully and successfully, to declaim. I never wish to meet with those who affect to be called “blunt, honest men,” who feel themselves above all the forms of respect and civility; and care not how many they put to pain; or how many they displease. But let me not be misunderstood: I do not contend for ridiculous ceremonies, and hollow compliments; there is surely a medium: and a sensible Christian man will not be long at a loss to find it out. Even that people, who profess to be above all worldly forms, and are generally stiff enough, yet are rarely found to be rude, uncivil, or ill-bred.

(7.) Seeketh not her own] Ου ζητι τα ιαυτης: is not desirous of her own spiritual welfare only, but of her neighbour's also: for the writers of the Old and New Testaments do, almost every where, agreeably to their Hebrew idiom, express a preference given to one thing before another, by an affirmation of that which is preferred, and a negative of that which is contrary to it. See Bishop Pearce; and see the note on chap. i. 17. and chap. x. 24, 33. Love is never satisfied but in the welfare, comfort, and salvation of all. That man is no Christian who is solicitous for his own happiness alone; and cares not how the world goes, so that himself be comfortable.

(8.) Is not easily provoked] Ου παρεξυμεται; is not provoked, is not irritated, is not made sour or bitter. How the word easily got into our translation it is hard to say; but, however it got in, it is utterly improper, and has nothing in the original to countenance it. By the transcript from my old MS. which certainly contains the first translation ever made in English, we find that the word did not exist there; the conscientious translator rendering it thus;—It is not stirred to wrath.

The New Testament, printed in 1547, 4to.

the first year of Edward VI. in English and Latin, has simply, is not provoked to anger. The edition published in English, in the following year, 1548, has the same rendering, but the orthography better: is not provoked to anger. The Bible in folio, with notes, published the next year, 1549, by Edmund Becke, preserves nearly the same reading, is not provoked to anger. The large folio printed by Richard Cardmarden, at Rouen, 1566, has the same reading. The translation made and printed by the command of King James I. fol. 1611, &c. departs from all these, and improperly inserts the word easily, which might have been his majesty's own; and yet this translation was not followed by some subsequent editions; for the 4to. Bible printed at London four years after, 1615, not only retains this original and correct reading, it is not provoked to anger, but has the word love every where in this chapter, instead of charity, in which all the preceding versions and editions agree. In short, this is the reading of Coverdale, Matthews, Cranmer, the Geneva, and others; and our own authorized version is the only one which I have seen where this false reading appears.

As to the ancient versions, they all, Vulgate, Syriac, Arabic, Æthiopic, Coptic, and Itala, strictly follow the Greek text; and supply no word that tends to abate the signification of the apostle's ω παρεξυμεται, is not provoked; nor is there a various reading here, in all the numerous MSS. It is of importance to make these observations, because the common version of this place destroys the meaning of the apostle, and makes him speak very improperly. If love is provoked at all, it then ceases to be love; and if it be not easily provoked, this grants, as almost all the commentators say, that in special cases, it may be provoked; and this they instance in the case of Paul and Barnabas, Acts xv. 39. but I have sufficiently vindicated this passage in my note on that place, and given at large the meaning of the word παρεξυμε; and to that place I beg leave to refer the reader. The apostle's own words in ver. 7. are a sufficient proof that the love of which he speaks, can never be provoked.—When the man who possesses this love, gives way to provocation, he loses the balance of his soul, and grieves the Spirit of God. In that instant he ceases from loving God with all his soul, mind, and strength; and surely if he get embittered against his neighbour, he does not love him as himself. It is generally said, that though a man may feel himself highly irritated against the sinner, he may feel tender concern for the sinner. Irritation of any kind is inconsistent with self-government, and consequently with internal peace and communion with God. However favourably we may think of our own state, and however industrious we may be to find out excuses for sallies of passion, &c. still the testimony of God is, Love is not provoked; and if I have not such a love, whatever else I may possess, it profiteth me nothing.

(9.) Thinketh no evil] Ου λογίζεσθαι το κακόν—“believes no evil, where no evil seems.” Never supposes that a good action may have a bad motive; gives every man credit for his profession of religion, uprightness, godly zeal, &c. while nothing is seen in his conduct or in his spirit inconsistent with this profession. His heart is so governed and influenced by the love of God, that he cannot think of evil but where it appears. The original implies that he does not invent, or devise any evil; or does not reason on any particular act or word, so as to infer evil from it; for this would destroy his love to his brother; it would be ruinous to charity and benevolence.

Verse 6. (10.) Rejoiceth not in iniquity] Ου χαίρουσιν επί το αδικίᾳ—rejoiceth not in falsehood, but, on the contrary, rejoiceth in the truth: this meaning αδικία has in different parts of the Scriptures. At first view, this character of love seems to say but little in its favour; for who can rejoice in unrighteousness or falsity. But is it not a frequent case, that persons who have received any kind of injury, and have forborne to avenge themselves, but perhaps, have left it to God; when evil falls upon the sinner, do console themselves with what appears to them an evidence that God has avenged their quarrel; and do at least secretly rejoice that the man is suffering for his misdeeds. Is not this, in some sort, rejoicing in iniquity? Again, is it not common for interested persons to rejoice in the successes of an unjust and sanguinary war, in the sacking and burning of cities and towns; and is not the joy always in proportion to the slaughter that has been made of the enemy? And do these call themselves Christians? Then we may expect that Moloch and his sub-devils, are not so far behind this description of Christians as to render their case utterly desperate. If such Christians can be saved, demons need not despair!

(11.) But rejoiceth in the truth] ἀλλ' ἐν ἀληθείᾳ—every thing that is opposite to falsehood and irreligion. Those who are filled with the love of God and man, rejoice in the propagation and extension of divine truth; in the spread of true religion, by which alone peace and good-will can be diffused throughout the earth. And because they rejoice in the truth, therefore they do not persecute or hinder true religion; but help it forward with all their might and power.

Verse 7. (12.) Beareth all things] Πάντα ὑπομένει. This word is also variously interpreted; to endure, bear, sustain, cover, conceal, contain. Bishop Pearce contends that it should be translated covereth all things, and produces several plausible reasons for this translation; the most forcible of which is, that the common translation confounds it with endureth all things, in the same verse. We well know that it is a grand and distinguishing property of love to cover and conceal the fault of another; and it is certainly better to consider the passage in this light than in that which our common version holds out: and this perfectly agrees with what St. Peter says of charity, 1 Ep. iv. 8. it shall cover the multitude of sins; but there is not sufficient evidence that the original will fully bear this sense; and perhaps it would be better to take it in the sense of contain, keep in, as a vessel does liquor; thus Plato compared the souls of foolish men to a sieve, and not able τῶν ματαίων τι καὶ ληθῆναι, to contain any thing through unfaithfulness and forgetfulness. See Parkhurst and Wetstein. Some of the Versions have ἠρώμεν, loveth, or is warmly affectioned to all things or persons. But the true import must be found either in cover or contain. Love conceals every thing that should be concealed; betrays no secret; retains the grace given, and goes on to continual increase. A person under the influence of this love, never makes the sins, follies, faults, or imperfections of any man, the subject either of censure or conversation. He covers them as far as he can; and if alone privy to them, he retains the knowledge of them in his own bosom, as far as he ought.

b Ch. 12. 31. Phil. 1. 9, 11. 2 Pet. 1. 19. Rev. 22. 4, 5.

(13.) Believeth all things] Πάντα πιστεύει—is ever ready to believe the best of every person, and will credit no evil of any but on the most positive evidence; gladly receives whatever may tend to the advantage of any person whose character may have suffered from obloquy and detraction; or even justly, because of his misconduct.

(14.) Hopeth all things] Πάντα ἐπιτίθει—When there is no place left for believing good of a person; then love comes in with its hope, where it could not work by its faith; and begins immediately to make allowances and excuses, as far as a good conscience can permit: and further, anticipates the repentance of the transgressor, and his restoration to the good opinion of society, and his place in the church of God from which he had fallen.

(15.) Endureth all things] Πάντα ὑπομένει—bears up under all persecutions and mal-treatment from open enemies and professed friends. Bears adversities with an even mind, as it submits with perfect resignation to every dispensation of the providence of God; and never says of any trial, affliction, or insult, this cannot be endured.

Verse 8. (16.) Charity never faileth] Ἡ ἀγάπη ἀδύνατον ἀπολείπει—This love never falleth off, because it bears, believes, hopes and endures all things; and while it does so it cannot fail; it is the means of preserving all other graces; indeed, properly speaking, it includes them all;

and all receive their perfection from it. Love to God and man can never be dispensed with. It is essential to social and religious life; without it, no communion can be kept up with God: nor can any man have a preparation for eternal glory whose heart and soul are not deeply imbued with it. Without it there never was true religion, nor ever can be; and it not only is necessary through life, but will exist throughout eternity. What were a state of blessedness, if it did not comprehend love to God and human spirits, in the most exquisite, refined, and perfect degrees?

Prophecies—shall fail] Whether the word imply predicting future events, or teaching the truths of religion to men, all such shall soon be rendered useless. Though the accurate prophet, and the eloquent persuasive preacher, be useful in their day, they shall not be always so; nor shall their gifts fit them for glory; nothing short of the love above described, can fit a soul for the kingdom of God.

Tongues—shall cease] The miraculous gift of different languages, that also shall cease, as being unnecessary.

Knowledge shall vanish away] All human arts and sciences, as being utterly useless in the eternal world, though so highly extolled and useful here.

Verse 9. For we know in part] We have here but little knowledge even of earthly, and much less, of heavenly things. He that knows most, knows little in comparison of what is known by angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect. And as we know so very little, how deficient must we be if we have not much love? Angels may wonder at the imperfection of our knowledge; and separate spirits may wonder at the perfection of their own, having obtained so much more in consequence of being separated from the body, than they could conceive to be possible while in that body. When Sir Isaac Newton had made such astonishing discoveries in the laws of nature, far surpassing any thing that had been done, by all his predecessors in science, from the days of Solomon; one of our poets, considering the scantiness of human knowledge, when compared with that which is possessed by the inhabitants of heaven, reduced his meditations on the subject to the following nervous and expressive epigram:

Superior beings, when of late they saw,
 A mortal man explain all nature's law;
 Admired such wisdom in an earthly shape,
 And show'd our NEWTON as we show an ape.

We prophesy in part] Even the sublimest prophets have been able to say but little of the heavenly state; and the best preachers have left the Spirit of God, very much to supply. And had we no more religious knowledge than we can derive from men and books; and had we no further instruction in the knowledge of God and ourselves, than we derive from preaching, our religious experience would be low indeed. Yet, it is our duty to acquire all the knowledge we possibly can: and, as preaching is the ordinary means by which God is pleased to instruct and convert the soul, we should diligently and thankfully use it. For, we have neither reason nor Scripture to suppose that God will give us that immediately from himself, which he has promised to convey only by the use of means. Even this, his blessing makes effectual: and, after all, his Spirit supplies much that man cannot teach. Every preacher should take care to inculcate this on the hearts of his hearers. When you have learned all you can from your ministers, remember you have much to learn from God: and for this you should diligently wait on him by the reading of his word, and incessant prayer.

Verse 10. But when that which is perfect] The state of eternal blessedness; then that which is in part, that which is imperfect, shall be done away; the imperfect as well as the probationary state shall cease for ever.

Verse 11. When I was a child] This future state of blessedness is as far beyond the utmost perfection that can be attained in this world, as our adult state of Christianity is above our state of natural infancy; in which we understood only as children understand; speak only a few broken articulate words; and reason only as children reason; having few ideas, little knowledge but what may be called mere instinct, and that much less perfect than the instinct of the brute creation; and having no experience. But when we became men; adults, having gained much knowledge of men and things, we spoke and reasoned more correctly, having left off all the manners and habits of our childhood.

Verse 12. Now we see through a glass darkly] Δι' ὀπίσκου ἢ ἀντιπέλας. Of these words, some literal explanation is necessary. The word ὀπίσκου, which we translate a glass, literally signifies a mirror, or reflector, from ω, into, and σπου, I look: and among the ancients, mirrors were certainly made of fine polished metal. The word here may signify any thing by which the image of a person is reflected, as in our looking, or look in glass. The word is not used for a glass to look through; nor would such an image have suited with the apostle's design. The σπου, or mirror, is mentioned by some of the most ancient Greek writers; so Anacreon, Ode xi. ver. 1.

Δι' ὀπίσκου εἰ γυναικας,
 Ἀνακρεων γινωσκει

Take thy mirror, and view
How few of thy hairs remain.

And again, in Ode xx. ver. 5.

Εγώ δ' εσοπτρον αυτ
Οπως αυτ ελπιουσ με.

I wish I were a mirror,
That thou mightest always look into me.

In Exod. xxxviii. 8. we meet with the term looking-glasses; but the original is מראה maroth, and should be translated mirrors; as out of those very articles which we absurdly translate looking-glasses, the brazen laver was made!

In the Greek version, the word εσοπτρον, is not found but twice, and that in the apocryphal books.

In the book of the wisdom of Solomon, chap. vii. 26. speaking of wisdom, the author says, "She is the brightness of the everlasting light, και εσοπτρον ακαλιδωτου, and the unspotted mirror of the power of God and the image of his goodness."

In Eccles. xii. 11. exhorting to put no trust in an enemy, he says, "Though he humble himself, and go crouching, yet take good heed, and beware of him, and thou shalt be unto him εκαμυχαλις εσοπτρον, as if thou hadst wiped a looking-glass. (mirror,) and thou shalt know that his rust hath not altogether been wiped away." All these passages must be understood of polished metal, not of glass; which, though it existed among the Romans and others, yet was brought to very little perfection: and as to grinding and silvering of glass, they are modern inventions.

Some have thought that the apostle refers to something of the telescopic kind; by which distant and small objects become visible, although their surfaces became dim in proportion to the quantum of the magnifying power: but this is too refined; he appears simply to refer to a mirror, by which images were reflected, and not to any diaphanous and magnifying powers, through which objects were perceived.

Possibly, the true meaning of the words δ' εσοπτρον ε ανηγματι, through a glass darkly, may be found among the Jewish writers, who use a similar term to express nearly the same thing to which the apostle refers. A revelation of the will of God, in clear and express terms, is called by them מראה כהן aspecularia maira, a clear or lucid glass, or specular; in reference specularibus lapidibus, to the diaphanous, polished stones, used by the ancients for windows, instead of glass. An obscure prophecy they termed מראה דל aspecularia dela naharia, "A specular which is not clear."

Numb. xii. 6. If there be a prophet, I the Lord, will make myself known unto him in a vision, and I will speak unto him in a dream:

Rab. Tanchum thus explains—"My Shechinah shall not be revealed to him, מראה כהן aspecularia maira, in a lucid specular, but only in a dream and vision."

On Ezek. i. 4, 5. And I looked and behold a whirlwind, a great cloud and a fire infolding itself, &c., Sohar Chadash, fol. 33. says, "This is a vision, מראה דל aspecularia dela nahara, "by an obscure or dark specular."

From a great variety of examples produced by Schoetgen, it appears that the rabbins make a great deal of difference between seeing through the lucid glass or specular, and seeing through the obscure one. The first is attributed only to Moses, who conversed with God face to face, i. e. through the lucid specular; and between the other prophets, who saw him in dreams and visions, i. e. through the obscure specular. In these distinctions and sayings of the ancient Jews, we must seek for that to which the apostle alludes. See Schoetgen.

The word ανηγματι, which we render darkly, will help us to the true meaning of the place. The following is Mr. Parkhurst's definition of the term and of the thing. "Ανηγμα, from ανηγμα, the perfect passive of ανημι, to hint, intimate, signify with some degree of obscurity; an enigma, in which one thing answers or stands in correspondence to, or as the representative of another; which is, in some respects, similar to it, occurs 1 Cor. xiii. 12. Now, in this life, we see by means of a mirror reflecting the images of heavenly and spiritual things, as ανηγματι, in an enigmatical manner, invisible things being represented by visible; spiritual, by natural; eternal, by temporal; but then, in the eternal world, face to face; every thing being seen in itself, and not by means of a representative or similitude."

Now I know in part] Though I have an immediate revelation from God, concerning his great design in the dispensation of the Gospel; yet there are lengths, breadths, depths, and heights of this design, which even that revelation has not discovered; nor can they be known and apprehended in the present imperfect state. Eternity alone can unfold the whole scheme of the Gospel.

As—I am known.] In the same manner in which disembodied spirits know and understand.

Verse 13. And now, [in this present life,] abideth faith, hope, charity] These three supply the place of that direct vision, which no human embodied spirit can have; these abide or remain for the present state. Faith, by which we apprehend spiritual blessings, and walk with God. Hope, by which we view and expect eternal blessedness, and pass through things temporal, so as not to lose those which are eternal. Charity or love, by which we show forth the virtues of the grace which we receive by faith, in living a life of obedience to God, and of good will and usefulness to man.

[But the greatest of these is charity.] Without faith it is impossible to please God; and without it, we cannot partake of the grace of our Lord Jesus: without hope, we could not endure, as seeing him who is invisible; nor have any adequate notion of the eternal world: nor bear up under the afflictions and difficulties of life: but great, and useful, and indispensably necessary as these are, yet charity or love is greater: LOVE is the fulfilling of the law; but this is never said of faith or hope.

It may be necessary to enter more particularly into a consideration of the conclusion of this very important chapter.

1. Love, is properly the image of God in the soul; for God is LOVE. By faith, we receive from our Maker; by hope, we expect a future and eternal good; but by love, we resemble God; and by it alone are we qualified to enjoy heaven, and be one with him throughout eternity. Faith, says one, is the foundation of the Christian life, and of good works: Hope rears the superstructure; but love finishes, completes, and crowns it in a blessed eternity. Faith and hope respect ourselves alone; love takes in both God and MAN. Faith helps, and hope sustains us; but love to God and man makes us obedient and useful. This one consideration is sufficient to show that love is greater than either faith or hope.

2. Some say love is the greatest, because it remains throughout eternity, whereas faith and hope proceed only through life; hence we say, that there faith is lost in sight, and hope in fruition. But does the apostle say so? Or does any man inspired by God, say so? I believe not. Faith and hope will as necessarily enter into eternal glory, as love will. The perfections of God are absolute in their nature, infinite in number, and eternal in their duration. However high, glorious, or sublime the soul may be in that eternal state, it will ever, in respect to God, be limited in its powers; and must be improved and expanded by the communications of the Supreme Being. Hence it will have infinite glories in the nature of God to apprehend by faith, to anticipate by hope, and enjoy by love.

3. From the nature of the Divine perfections, there must be infinite glories in them which must be objects of faith to disembodied spirits; because it is impossible that they should be experimentally or possessively known by any creature. Even in the heaven of heavens we shall, in reference to the infinite and eternal excellencies of God, walk by faith, and not by sight. We shall credit the existence of infinite and illustrious glories in Him, which, from their absolute and infinite nature, must be incommunicable. And as the very nature of the soul shows it to be capable of eternal growth and improvement; so the communications from the Deity, which are to produce this growth, and effect this improvement, must be objects of faith to the pure spirit; and if objects of faith, consequently objects of hope; for, as hope is "the expectation of future good," it is inseparable from the nature of the soul, to know of the existence of any attainable good, without making it immediately the object of desire or hope. And is it not this that shall constitute the eternal and progressive happiness of the immortal spirit; viz. knowing, from what it has received, that there is infinitely more to be received; and desiring to be put in possession of every communicable good which it knows to exist?

4. As faith goes forward to view, so hope goes forward to desire; and God continues to communicate; every communication making way for another, by preparing the soul for greater enjoyment; and this enjoyment must produce love. To say that the soul can have neither faith nor hope in a future state, is to say that, as soon as it enters heaven, it is as happy as it can possibly be; and this goes to exclude all growth in the eternal state; and all progressive manifestations and communications of God; and consequently to fix a spirit which is a composition of infinite desires, in a state of eternal sameness, in which it must be greatly changed in its constitution, to find endless gratification.

5. To sum up the reasoning on this subject, I think it necessary to observe—1. That the term faith is here to be taken in the general sense of the word, for that belief which a soul has of the infinite sufficiency and goodness of God; in consequence of the discoveries he has made of himself and his designs, either by revelation, or immediately by his Spirit. Now we know that God has revealed himself not only in reference to this world, but in reference to eternity: and much of our faith is employed in things pertaining to the eternal world, and the enjoyments in that state. 2. That hope is to be taken in its common acceptation, the expectation of future good; which expectation is necessarily founded on faith; as faith is founded on knowledge. God gives a revelation which concerns both worlds; containing exceeding great and precious promises relative to both. We believe what he has said on his own veracity; and we hope to enjoy the promised blessings in both worlds, because he is faithful who has promised. 3. As the promises stand in reference to both worlds, so also must the faith and hope to which these promises stand as objects. 4. The enjoyments in the eternal world are all spiritual, and must proceed immediately from God himself. 5. God, in the plenitude of his excellencies, is as incomprehensible to a glorified spirit, as he is to a spirit resident in flesh and blood. 6. Every created, intellectual nature, is capable of eternal improvement. 7. If seeing God as he is, be essential to the eternal happiness of beatified spirits, then the discoveries which He makes of himself must be gradual; forasmuch as it is impossible that an infinite, eternal nature, can be manifested to a created and limited nature, in any other way. 8. As the perfections of God are infinite, they are capable of being eternally manifested: and after all manifestations, there must be an infinity of perfections still to be brought to view. 9. As every soul that has any just notion of God must know that he is possessed of all possible perfections; so these perfections being objects of knowledge, must be objects of faith. 10. Every holy spirit feels itself possessed of unlimited desires for the enjoyment of spiritual good; and faith, in the infinite goodness of God, necessarily implies that he will satisfy every desire he has excited. 11. The power to gratify, in the Divine Being, and the capacity to be gratified in the immortal spirit, will necessarily excite continual desires; which desires, on the evidence of faith, will as necessarily produce hope, which is the expectation of future good.

12. All possible perfections in God, are the objects of faith: and the communication of all possible blessedness, the object of hope. 13. Faith goes forward to apprehend, and hope to anticipate, as God continues to discover his unbounded glories and perfections. 14. Thus discovered and desired, their influences become communicated, love possesses them, and is excited and increased by the communication. 15. With respect to those which are communicated, faith and hope cease, and go forward to new apprehensions and anticipations; while love continues to retain and enjoy the whole. 16. Thus an eternal interest is kept up; and infinite blessings, in endless succession, apprehended, anticipated, and enjoyed.

6. My opinion, that faith and hope, as well as love, will continue in a future state, will, no doubt, appear singular to many, who have generally considered the two former as necessarily terminating in this lower world: but this arises from an improper notion of the beatified state; and from inattention to the state and capacity of the soul. If it have the same faculties there which it has here, howsoever improved they may be, it must acquire its happiness from the Supreme Being, in the way of communication; and this communication must necessarily be gradual, for the reasons already alleged: and if gradual, then there must be (if in that state we have any knowledge at all of the Divine Nature) faith that such things exist, and may be communicated; desire to possess them because they are good; and hope that these good things shall be communicated.

7. I conclude, therefore, from these, and a multitude of other reasonings, which might be brought to bear on this subject, that faith and hope will exist in the eternal world as well as love; and that there as well as here, it may endlessly be said, the greatest of these is love. With great propriety, therefore, does the apostle exhort, Follow after love; it being so essential to our comfort and happiness here, and to our beatification in the eternal world; and how necessary faith and love are to the same end, we have already seen.

NOTES ON CHAP. XIV.

Verse 1. Follow after charity] Most earnestly labour to be put in possession of that love which beareth, believeth, hopeth, and endureth all things. It may be difficult to acquire, and difficult to retain this blessed state; but it is essential to your present peace and eternal happiness. This clause belongs to the preceding chapter.

Desire spiritual gifts] Ye are very intent on getting those splendid gifts which may add to your worldly consequence; and please your carnal minds; but labour rather to get the gifts of God's Spirit, by which ye may grow in grace, and be useful to others: and particularly desire that ye may prophesy, that ye may be able to teach and instruct others in the things of their salvation.

Verse 2. For he that speaketh in an unknown tongue] This chapter is crowded with difficulties. It is not likely that the Holy Spirit should, in the church, suddenly inspire a man with the knowledge of some foreign language, which none in the church understood but himself: and lead him to treat the mysteries of Christianity in that language, though none in the place could profit by his teaching.

Dr. Lightfoot's mode of reconciling these difficulties is the most likely I have met with. He supposes that, by the unknown tongue, the Hebrew is meant: and that God restored the true knowledge of this language when he gave the apostles the gift of tongues. As the Scriptures of the Old Testament were contained in this language, and it has beauties, energies, and depths in it, which no verbal translation can reach: it was necessary for the proper elucidation of the prophecies concerning the Messiah, and the establishment of the Christian religion, that the full meaning of the words of this sacred language should be properly understood. And it is possible that the Hebrew Scriptures were sometimes read in the Christian congregations, as they were in the Jewish synagogues; and if the person who read and understood them, had not the power and faculty of explaining them to others; in vain did he read and understand them himself. And we know that it is possible for a man to understand a language, the force, phraseology, and idioms of which he is incapable of explaining, even in his mother's tongue. We shall see, in the course of these notes, how this view of the subject will apply to the illustration of the apostle's words throughout the chapter.

Speaketh not unto men, but unto God] None present understanding the language, God alone knowing the truth and import of what he says.

In the spirit he speaketh mysteries] Though his own mind, (for so πνευματι is understood here by many eminent critics,) apprehends the mysteries contained in the words which he reads or utters; but if, by the Spirit, we understand the Spirit of God, it only shows that it is by that Spirit that he is enabled to speak and apprehend these mysteries. See the note on ver. 19.

Verse 3. But he that prophesieth] The person who has the gift of teaching, is much more useful to the church than he is who has only the gift of tongues, because he speaks to the profit of men, viz. to their edification, by the Scriptures he expounds; to their exhortation, by what he teaches; and to their comfort, by his revelation.—Whitby. I must here refer to my sermon on this text, intitled, "The Christian Prophet and his Work," in which I have endeavoured to consider the whole of this subject at large.

Verse 4. He that speaketh in an unknown tongue] In the Hebrew for instance: the knowledge of the depth and power of which he has got by a divine revelation, edifieth himself by that knowledge.

But he that prophesieth] Has the gift of teaching.

Edifieth the church] Speaketh unto men to edification, exhortation, and comfort, ver. 3.

Verse 5. I would that ye all spake with tongues] The word βουα, does not so much imply a wish, or desire, as a command or permission. As if he had said, I do not restrain you to prophesying or teaching, though I prefer that; but I give you full permission to speak in Hebrew whenever it is proper; and when one is present

6 Now, brethren, if I come unto you speaking with tongues, what shall I profit you, except I shall speak to you either by a revelation, or by knowledge, or by prophesying, or by doctrine?

7 And even things without life giving sound, whether pipe or harp, except they give a distinction in the sounds, how shall it be known what is piped or harped?

who can interpret for the edification of the church; provided yourselves have not that gift, though you understand the language. The apostle said tongue, in the singular number, ver. 2, 4. because he spoke of a single man: now he says tongues, in the plural number, because he speaks of many speaking; but he has the same meaning in both places.—Lightfoot.

Greater is he that propheseth] A useful, zealous preacher, though unskilled in learned languages, is much greater in the sight of God, and in the eye of sound common sense, than he who has the gift of those learned tongues: except he interpret; and we seldom find great scholars good preachers. This should humble the scholar, who is too apt to be proud of his attainments, and despise his less learned, but more useful brother. This judgment of St. Paul is too little regarded.

Verse 6. Speaking with tongues] Without interpreting.

What shall I profit you?] i. e. I shall not profit you;

Except I shall speak to you either by revelation] Of some secret thing: or by knowledge, of some mystery: or by prophesying, foretelling some future event: or by doctrine, instructing you what to believe and practise.—See Whitby. These four words are taken in different acceptations by learned men. The general sense of the terms is that given above: but the peculiar meaning of the apostle is perhaps not easily discerned.

Verse 7. And even things without life] I may, as if he had said, illustrate this further, by referring to a pipe or harp; if these were to utter mere sounds without order, harmony, or melody: though every tone of music might be in the sounds, surely no person could discern a tune in such sounds, nor receive pleasure from such discords: even so is the person who speaks in an unknown tongue, but does not interpret. His speech tends no more to edification, than those discordant and unmeaning sounds do to pleasure and delight.

Verse 8. If the trumpet give an uncertain sound] If, when the soldier should prepare himself for the battle, the trumpet should give a different sound to that which is ordinarily used on such occasions; the soldier is not informed of what he should do, and therefore does not arm himself; consequently, that vague, unintelligible sound of the trumpet, is of no use.

Verse 9. Likewise ye] If ye do not speak in the church so as to be understood, your labour is useless: ye shall speak into the air; your speech will be lost and dissipated in the air, without conveying any meaning to any person: there will be a noise or sound, but nothing else. Gifts of that kind, thus used, are good for nothing.

Verse 10. There are, it may be] Εἰ τυχῆς, for example.

So many kinds of voices] So many different languages; each of which has its distinct articulation, pronunciation, emphasis, and meaning; or, there may be so many different nations, each possessing a different language, &c.

Verse 11. If I know not the meaning of the voice] τὴν δύναμιν τῆς φωνῆς, the power and signification of the language.

I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian] I shall appear to him, and he to me, as a person who had no distinct, and articulate sounds which can convey any kind of meaning. This observation is very natural, when we hear persons speaking in a language of which we know nothing; we wonder how they can understand each other; as, in their speech, there appears to us no regular distinction of sounds or words. For the meaning and origin of the word barbarian, see the note on Acts xxviii. 2.

Verse 12. Forasmuch as ye are zealous] Seeing ye affect so much to have spiritual gifts; seek that you may get those by which ye may excel in edifying the church.

Verse 13. Pray that he may interpret.] Let him who speaks or reads the prophetic declarations in the Old Testament, in that tongue in which they were originally spoken and written, pray to God that he may so understand them himself, and receive the gift of interpretation, that he may be able to explain them in all their depth and latitude to others.

Verse 14. For if I pray in an unknown tongue] If my prayers are composed of sentences and sayings taken out of the prophets, &c. and in their own language: my spirit prayeth; my heart is engaged in the work, and

 An. Imp. Nerois Cæs. 3. in the edifying of the church.

13 Wherefore let him that speaketh in an unknown tongue pray that he may interpret.

14 For, if I pray in an unknown tongue, my spirit prayeth, but my understanding is unfruitful.

15 What is it then? I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also: ^c I will sing with my prayers answer all the purpose of prayers to myself; but my understanding is unfruitful to all others, because they do not understand my prayers; and I either do not, or cannot interpret them. See the note on ver. 19.

Verse 15. I will pray with the spirit] I will endeavour to have all my prayers influenced and guided by the Spirit of God; and to have my own heart deeply affected in and by the work.

And I will pray with the understanding also] I will endeavour so to pray, that others may understand me; and thus be edified and improved by my prayers. And therefore I will pray in a language, in the public congregation, that may be understood by all present; so that all may join, not only in the act, but in the spirit of devotion.

I will sing with the spirit] It does appear that singing psalms, or spiritual hymns, was one thing that was implied in what is termed prophecy in the Old Testament, as is evident from 1 Sam. x. 5, 6, 10, &c. And when this came through an immediate afflatus or inspiration of God, there is no doubt that it was exceedingly edifying; and must have served greatly to improve and excite the devotional spirit of all that were present. But I rather suppose that their singing consisted in solemn well-measured recitative, than in the gingling and often foolish sounds which we use when a single monosyllable is sometimes shivered into thirty-six demi-semi-quavers!

Here it may not be improper to remark that the spirit and the understanding are seldom united in our congregational singing. Those whose hearts are right with God, have generally no skill in music; and those who are well skilled in music, have seldom a devotional spirit; but are generally proud, self-willed, contentious, and arrogant. Do not these persons entirely overrate themselves? Of all the liberal arts, surely music is the least useful, however ornamental it may be. And should any thing be esteemed in the church of God, but in proportion to its utility? A good singer, among the people of God, who has not the life of God in his soul, is vox et præterea nihil, as Helio-gabalus said of the nightingale's brains on which he desired to sup, he is nothing but a sound. Some of those persons, I mean they who sing with the understanding, without the spirit; suppose themselves of great consequence in the church of Christ; and they find foolish, superficial people, whom they persuade to be of their own mind, and some raise parties and contentions if they have not every thing their own way; and that way is generally as absurd as it is unscriptural, and contrary to the spirit and simplicity of the Gospel.

Verse 16. He that occupieth the room of the unlearned] One who is unacquainted with the language in which you speak, sing, or pray:

Say Amen] Give his assent and ratification to what he does not understand. It was very frequent in primitive times, to express their approbation in the public assemblies by Amen. This practice, soberly, and piously conducted, might still be of great use in the church of Christ.

This response was of the highest authority and merit among the Jews; they even promised the remission of all sins; the annihilation of the sentence of damnation; and the opening of the gates of Paradise to those who fervently say Amen. And it is one of their maxims, that "greater is he who says Amen, than he who prays." See many testimonies of this kind in Schoetgen. Now, allowing that this was of so much consequence in the time of St. Paul: it was a very serious matter for a person to be in a congregation where prayer was offered, and who could not say Amen, because the prayers were in a language which he did not understand.

Verse 17. Thou verily givest thanks well] Because he felt gratitude; and from a sense of his obligation, gave praise to God: but because this was in an unknown tongue, those who heard him, received no edification.

Verse 18. I speak with tongues more than ye all] He understood more languages than any of them did; and this was indispensably necessary, as he was the apostle of the Gentiles in general; and had to preach to different provinces where different dialects, if not languages were used. In the Hebrew, Syriac, Greek, and Latin, he was undoubtedly well skilled from his education: and how many he might understand, by miraculous gift, we cannot tell. But, even literally understood, it is very probable that he knew more languages than any man in the church of Corinth.

Verse 19. Yet in the church] As the grand

18 I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than ye all:

19 Yet in the church I had my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue.

20 Brethren, ^c be not children in understanding: howbeit in malice ^d be ye children: but in understanding be ^e men.

object of public worship is the edification of those who attend; five words, spoken so as to convey edification, were of much more consequence than ten thousand, which not being understood, could convey none. By the word γλωσσαι, tongue, to which we add unknown, I suppose the apostle always means the Hebrew, for the reasons offered in the note on ver. 1.

One of the greatest difficulties, says Bishop Pearce, in this epistle, is contained in the words πνευμα, and vous, spirit and understanding, which are frequently used in this chapter; and, fixing the true meaning of these words, will solve the difficulty. In this verse the apostle explains λαλησεν τω υμιν, to speak with the understanding, by να αλλου καταχησεν, that I might teach others; so that the sense of vous, understanding, seems to be, that understanding which the hearer has of what is said: and this sense will agree well with, I will sing with the spirit; and with the understanding, ver. 15.

He observes also, that πνευμα, spirit, and vous, understanding, have a sense opposite to each other; so that if vous, is rightly rendered, the understanding which another has of what is said; then πνευμα, will signify a man's own mind; i. e. his own understanding of what he himself speaks: and this sense agrees well with ver. 2. In the spirit he speaketh mysteries.

Verse 20. Be not children in understanding] There are three words here to which we must endeavour to affix the proper sense—1. παιδια, signifies children in general, but particularly such as are grown up, so as to be fit to send to school, in order to receive instruction—2. νηπιος, from νη, not, and πιω, I speak, signifies an infant, one that cannot yet speak, and is in the lowest stage of infancy—3. τελειος, from τελειω, I complete or perfect, signifies those who are arrived at perfect maturity, both of growth and understanding. We shall now see the apostle's meaning. Brethren, be not, παιδια, as little children, just beginning to go to school, in order to learn the first elements of their mother tongue; and, with an understanding only sufficient to apprehend those elements.

In malice] κακια, in wickedness; νηπιων, be ye as infants, who neither speak, do, nor purpose evil.

But in understanding] τελειος γωσθη, be ye perfect men, whose vigour of body, and energy of mind, show a complete growth; and a well cultivated understanding.

^a John 10. 34. — ^b Isai. 28. 11, 12. — ^c Acts 2. 13. — ^d Isai. 45. 14. Zech. 8. 23.

Verse 21. In the law it is written] But the passage quoted is in Isai. xxviii. 11. Here is no contradiction, for the term מִן torah, LAW, was used by the Jews to express the whole Scriptures, law, prophets, and hagiographia; and they used it to distinguish these sacred writings from the words of the scribes.

With men of other tongues] Bp. Pearce paraphrases this verse as follows: "With the tongues of foreigners, and with the lips of foreigners, will I speak to this people; and yet, for all that, will they not hear me, saith the Lord." To enter into the apostle's meaning, we must enter into that of the prophet. The Jewish people were under the teaching of the prophets who were sent from God: these instructed, reprov'd, and corrected them by this Divine authority. They however became so refractory and disobedient, that God purposed to cast them off, and abandon them to the Babylonians: then, they had a people to teach, correct, and reprove them, whose language they did not understand. The discipline that they received in this way, was widely different from that which they received while under the teaching of the prophets, and the government of God: and yet for all this, they did not humble themselves before their Maker, that this affliction might be removed from them.

Verse 22. Wherefore tongues are for a sign] The miraculous gift of tongues was never designed for the benefit of those who have already believed, but for the instruction of unbelievers: that they might see, from such a miracle, that this is the work of God; and so embrace the Gospel.—But as in the times of the prophet, the strange Babylonish tongues came in the way of punishment, and not in the way of mercy, take heed that it be not the case now; that, by dwelling on the gift, ye forget the giver: and what was designed for you as a blessing, may prove to you to be a curse. For, if, because ye have the gift of tongues, ye will choose for your own aggrandizement, to use them in the public congregation where none understands them, God may curse your blessings.

24 But if all prophesy, and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all:

25 And thus are the secrets of his heart made manifest; and so falling down on his face he will worship God, and report that God is in you of a truth.

26 How is it then, brethren? when ye come together, every one of you hath a psalm, ^e hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation. Let all things be done unto edifying.

^e Ver. 6. Ch. 12. 8, 9, 10. — Ch. 12. 7. 2 Cor. 12. 19. Eph. 4. 12.

Prophesying] Teaching the things of God in a known language, is of infinitely more consequence than speaking in all the foreign tongues in the universe.

Verse 23. Will they not say that ye are mad?] So they well might, finding a whole assembly of people talking languages, which those who had most need of instruction could not understand.

Verse 24. But if all prophesy] If all those who teach, do it in the tongue which all understand; if an unbeliever, or one who knows nothing of the sacred language, come in, and hears things just suited to his own state, he is convicted by all, and he is judged by all.

Verse 25. And thus are the secrets of his heart] As these, who were the prophets or teachers, had often the discernment of spirits, they were able, in certain cases, and probably very frequently, to tell a man the secrets of his own heart; and, where this was not directly the case, God often led his ministers to speak those things that were suitable to the case before them, though they themselves had no particular design. The sinner, therefore, convinced that God alone could uncover the secrets of his heart, would be often obliged to fall down on his face, abashed and confounded, and acknowledge that God was truly among them. This seems to be the plain meaning of the passages, before us.

Verse 26. How is it—every one of you hath a psalm, &c.] Dr. Lightfoot understands this in the following manner:—When the congregation came together, some were for spending the time in psalmody; others, in explaining particular doctrines; others, in reading, praying, or speaking in the Hebrew tongue; others, were curious to hear of further revelations; and others, wished to spend the time in the interpretation of what had already been spoken. This may be specious, but to me it is not satisfactory. It seems more likely that, when the whole church came together, among whom there were many persons with extraordinary gifts, each of whom wished to put himself forward, and occupy the time and attention of the congregation: hence 27 If any man speak in an unknown tongue, let it be by two, or at the most by three, and that by course; and let one interpret.

28 But if there be no interpreter, let him keep silence in the church; and let him speak to himself, and to God.

29 Let the prophets speak two or three, and ^a let the other judge.

30 If any thing be revealed to another that sitteth by, ^b let the first hold his peace.

confusion must necessarily take place; and perhaps, not a little contention. This was contrary to that edifying, which was the intention of these gifts.

Verse 27. Speak in an unknown tongue] The Hebrew, as has already been conjectured.

Let it be by two, or at the most by three, and that by course] Let only two or three, in one assembly, act in this way, that too much time may not be taken up with one exercise; and let this be done by course, the one after the other, that two may not be speaking at the same time: and let one interpret, for all that shall thus speak.

Verse 28. But if there be no interpreter] If there be none present who can give the proper sense of this Hebrew reading and speaking, then let him keep silence, and not occupy the time of the church by speaking in a language which only himself can understand.

Verse 29. Let the prophets] Those who have the gift of speaking to men, to edification, and exhortation, and comfort, ver. 3.

Two or three] As prophesying implied psalmody, teaching, and exhortation, Dr. Lightfoot thinks that the meaning of the phrase is this: Let one sing who has a psalm; let another teach who has a doctrine; and let a third exhort or comfort, who has a gift of that kind.

And let the other judge.] The other prophets, or qualified persons, judge of the propriety of what had been spoken; or let them discern, διακρίνας, how the revelation under the New Covenant, confirmed and illustrated the revelation granted under the Old Testament. It appears to have been taken for granted, that a man might pretend to this spirit of prophecy, who was not sent of God; and therefore it was the duty of the accredited teachers, to examine whether what he spoke was according to truth, and the analogy of faith. For the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets: Every man's gift was to be judged of by those whose age, experience, and wisdom, gave them a right to decide. Besides, though the person who did speak, might do it from an impulse of God; yet, if he was not sufficiently known, his testimony ought to be received with caution; and therefore the aged prophets should judge of his gift, lest false doctrines should slide into the church.

31 For ye may all prophesy one by one, that all may learn, and all may be comforted.

32 And ^c the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets.

33 For God is not the author of confusion, but of peace, ^d as in all churches of the saints.

34 ^e Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but ^f they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the ^h law.

But all these provisions, as Schoetgen justly observes, were in imitation of the practice in the Jewish synagogues; for there, it was customary for them to object, interrogate, refute, &c.

Verse 30. Be revealed to another that sitteth by] Probably those who were teachers, sat on a particular seat, or place from which they might most readily address the people; and this may be the meaning of sitting by. If such a person could say, I have just received a particular revelation from God; then let him have the liberty immediately to speak it: as it might possibly relate to the circumstances of that time and place.

Verse 31. For ye may all prophesy one by one] The gifts which God grants are given for the purpose of edification; but there can be no edification where there is confusion; therefore let them speak one by one.

Verse 32. And the spirits of the prophets, &c.] Let no one interrupt another; and let all be ready to prefer others before themselves, and let each feel a spirit of subjection to his brethren. God grants no un governable gifts.

Verse 33. For God is not the author of confusion] Let not the persons who act in the congregation in this disorderly manner, say that they are under the influence of God; for he is not the author of confusion: but two, three, or more praying or teaching in the same place, at the same time, is confusion; and God is not the author of such work: and let men beware how they attribute such disorder to the God of order and peace. The apostle calls such conduct anarraxatai, tumults, seditions; and such they are in the sight of God, and in the sight of all good men. How often is a work of God marred and discredited by the folly of men! for nature will always, and Satan too, mingle themselves, as far as they can, in the genuine work of the Spirit, in order to discredit and destroy it. Nevertheless, in great revivals of religion, it is almost impossible to prevent wild-fire from getting in among the true fire: but it is the duty of the ministers of God, to watch against, and prudently check this: but if themselves encourage it, then there will be confusion and every evil work.

Verse 34. Let your women keep silence in the churches] This was a Jewish ordinance; women were not permitted to teach in the assemblies, or even to ask questions. The rabbins taught, that "a woman should know nothing but the use of her distaff." And the saying of Rabbi Eliezer, as delivered, Bammid-bar Rabba, sect. 9. fol. 204. are both worthy of remark and of execration; they are these, ישעיהו דיברו וברו חרדיאל יסרו לנשים yesrephu dibrey Torah veal yemsaru lenashim—"Let the words of the Law be burned, rather than that they should be delivered to women."

This was their condition till the time of the Gospel, when, according to the prediction of Joel, the Spirit of God was to be poured out on the women as well as the men, that they might prophesy, i. e. teach. And that they did prophesy or teach, is evident from what the apostle says, chap. xi. 5. where he lays down rules to regulate this part of their conduct, while ministering in the church.

But does not what the apostle says here contradict that statement; and show that the words in chap. xi. should be understood in another sense? For, here it is expressly said, that they should keep silence in the church; for it was not permitted to a woman to speak? Both places seem perfectly consistent. It is evident, from the context, that the apostle refers here to asking questions, and what we call dictating, in the assemblies. It was permitted to any man to ask questions, to object, altercate, attempt to refute, &c. in the synagogue; but this liberty was not allowed to any woman: St. Paul confirms this, in reference also to the Christian church; he orders them to keep silence: and, if they wished to learn any thing, let them inquire of their husbands at home; because it was perfectly indecorous for women to be contending with men in public assemblies, on points of doctrine, cases of conscience, &c. But this by no means intimated that, when a woman received any particular influence from God, to enable her to teach, that she was not to obey that influence; on the contrary, she was to obey it, and the apostle lays down directions in chap. xi. for regulating her personal appearance when thus employed. All that the apostle opposes here, is their questioning, finding fault, &c. in the Christian church, as the Jewish men were permitted to do in their synagogues; together with the attempts to usurp any authority over the man, by setting up their judgment in opposition to them: for the apostle has in view, especially, acts of disobedience, arrogance, &c. of which no woman would be guilty who was under the influence of the Spirit of God.

But to be under obedience, as also saith the law.] This is a reference to Gen. iii. 14. Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee. From this, it is evident, that it was the disorderly and disobedient that the apostle had in view; and not any of those on whom God had poured out his Spirit.

Verse 35. For it is a shame for women to speak in the church] The Jews would not suffer a woman to read in the synagogue; though a servant, or even a child, had this permission; but the apostle refers to irregular conduct; such conduct as proved that they were not under obedience, ver. 34.

Verse 36. Came the word of God out from you? Was it from you that other churches received the Gospel? Are you the mother church? that you should have rules, and orders, and customs, different from all others; and set yourselves up for a model to be copied by all the churches of Christ?

Or came it unto you only?] Are you the only church of God? Are there not many others founded before you, that have no such customs, and permit no such disorders?

Verse 37. If any man think himself to be a prophet, &c.] He who is really a spiritual man, under the influence of the Spirit of God, and capable of teaching the Divine will, he will acknowledge that what I now say, is from the same Spirit; and that the things which I now write, are the commandments of God, and must be obeyed, on pain of his displeasure.

Verse 38. But if any man be ignorant] If he affect to be so, or pretend that he is ignorant: let him be ignorant. Let him be so at his peril.

Verse 39. Covet to prophesy] Let it be your endeavour and prayer, to be able to teach the way of God to the ignorant: this is the most valuable, because the most useful gift of the Spirit.

And forbid not to speak with tongues.] Let every gift have its own place and operation; let none envy another; nor prevent him from doing that part of the work to which God, by giving the qualification, has evidently called him.

Verse 40. Let all things be done decently] Εὐχαριστίας, in their proper forms, with becoming reverence; according to their dignity and importance. Every thing in the church of God should be conducted with gravity and con-posure suitable to the importance of the things; the infinite dignity of the object of worship, and the necessity of the souls in behalf of which those religious ordinances are instituted.

And in order.] Κατὰ ταῦτα, every thing in its place, every thing in its time, and every thing suitably.

Let all things be done decently and in order, is a direction of infinite moment in all the concerns of religion; and of no small consequence in all the concerns of life. How much pain, confusion, and loss would be prevented, were this rule followed! There is scarcely an embarrassment in civil or domestic life, that does not originate in a neglect of this precept. No business, trade, art or science, can be carried on to any advantage or comfort, unless peculiar attention be paid to it. And as to religion, there can be absolutely none without it. Where decency and order are not observed in every part of the worship of God, no spiritual worship can be performed. The manner of doing a thing is always of as much consequence as the act itself. And often the act derives all its consequence and utility from the manner in which it is performed.

NOTES ON CHAP. XV.

It appears from this chapter, that there were some false apostles at Corinth, who denied the resurrection, see verse 12. in consequence of which, St. Paul discusses three questions in this chapter.

1. Whether there be a resurrection of the dead? ver. 1—35.
 2. What will be the nature of the resurrection bodies? 35—51.
 3. What should become of those who should be found alive in the day of judgment? 51—57.
- I.—The resurrection he proves,
1. From Scripture, ver. 1—4.
 2. From eye-witnesses, 5—12.
- II.—He proves the resurrection, by showing the absurdity of the contrary doctrine.
1. If the dead rise not, Christ is not risen, ver. 13.
 2. It would be absurd to have faith in him, according to the preaching of the Gospel, if he be not risen, ver. 14.
 3. The apostles must be false-witnesses, who attest this resurrection, ver. 15.
 4. The faith of the Corinthians must be vain who believe it, ver. 16, 17.
 5. All the believers who have died in the faith of Christ have perished, if Christ be not risen, ver. 18.

6. Believers in Christ are in a more miserable state than any others, if there be no resurrection, ver. 19.
7. Those who were baptized in the faith, that Christ died for them, and rose again, are deceived, ver. 29.
8. The apostles, and Christians in general, who suffer persecution, on the ground that, after suffering a while here, they shall have a glorious resurrection, are acting a foolish and unprofitable part, ver. 30—32.

portance, and are essential to the Gospel scheme of salvation.

According to the Scriptures] It is not said any where in the Scriptures, in express terms, that Christ should rise on the third day; but it is fully implied in his types, as in the case of Jonah, who came out of the belly of the fish on the third day; but particularly in the case of Isaac, who was a very expressive type of Christ; for, as his being brought to the mount Moriah, bound and laid on the wood in order to be sacrificed, pointed out the death of Christ: so, his being brought alive on the third day from the mount, was a figure of Christ's resurrection. Bishop Pearce, and others, refer to Matt. xii. 40. xvi. 21. and Luke ix. 22. "which two Gospels, having been written at the time when Paul wrote this epistle, were properly called by the name of the Sacred Scriptures." It might be so, but I do not know of one proof in the New Testament, where its writings, or any part of them, is called the Scriptures.

Verse 5. That he was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve] This refers to the journey to Emmaus, Luke xxiv. 13. and 34. and to what is related Mark xvi. 14.

Then of the twelve—Instead of twelve, eleven, is the reading of D*EFG. Syriac in the margin, some of the Slavonic; Armenian, Vulgate, Itala, and several of the Fathers: and this reading is supported by Mark xvi. 14. Perhaps the term twelve is used here merely to point out the society of the apostles, who, though at this time they were only eleven, were still called the twelve, because this was their original number; and a number which was afterward filled up. See John xx. 24.

Verse 6. Above five hundred brethren at once] This was probably in Galilee, where our Lord had many disciples. See Matt. xxviii. 16. What a remarkable testimony is this to the truth of our Lord's resurrection! Five hundred persons saw him at one time; the greater part of whom were alive when the apostle wrote, and he might have been confronted by many, if he had dared to assert a falsity.

Verse 7. After that, he was seen of James] But where, and on what occasion, we are not told; nor indeed do we know which James is intended; James the son of Zebedee, or James the son of Alphaeus. But one thing is sufficiently evident, from what is here said, that this James, of whom the apostle speaks, was still alive; for the apostle's manner of speaking justifies this conclusion.

Then of all the apostles] Including not only the eleven, but, as some suppose, the seventy-two disciples.

Verse 8. And last of all—of me also] It seems that it was essential to the character of an apostle, that he had seen and conversed with Christ: and it is evident, from the history of Saul's conversion, Acts ix. 4—7. where see the notes, that Jesus Christ did appear to him; and he pleaded this ever after, as a proof of his call to the apostleship. And, it does not appear, that, after this time, Jesus ever did make any personal discovery of himself to any one.

As of one born out of due time] The apostle considers himself as coming after the time in which Jesus Christ personally conversed with his disciples; and that, therefore, to see him at all, he must see him in this extraordinary way. Some have entered into a very disgusting detail on the figure used here by the apostle. The words απορη να απομαρτι, signifies not merely one born out of due time; but one born before his time; and consequently not bidding fair for vigour, usefulness, or long life. But it is likely that the apostle had a different meaning; and that he refers to the original institution of the twelve apostles, in the rank of whom he never stood; and was appointed, not to fill up a place among the twelve: but, as an extra and additional apostle. Rosenmüller says, that those who were beyond the number of twelve senators, were termed abortivi, abortives; and refers to Suetonius in Octavio, cap. 35. I have examined the place, but find no such epithet. According to Suetonius, in that place, they were called orcini, persons who had assumed the senatorial dignity after the death of Julius Cæsar, pretending that they had derived that honour from him.

Verse 9. I am the least of the apostles] This was literally true, in reference to his being chosen last, and chosen not in the number of the twelve, but as an extra apostle. How much pains do some men take to make the apostle contradict himself, by attempting to show that he was the very greatest of the apostles; though he calls himself the least. Taken as a man, and a minister of Christ, he was greater than any of the twelve; taken as an apostle, he was less than any of the twelve, because not originally in that body.

Am not meet to be called an apostle] None of the twelve had ever persecuted Christ, nor withstood his doctrine: Saul of Tarsus had been, before his conversion, a grievous persecutor; and therefore, he says, οὐκ ἔμην ἄξιος, ἰ ἀμ ἄποστολος, I am not proper to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God, i. e. of Christ, which none of the apostles ever did.

Verse 10. But by the grace of God, I am what I am] God by his mere grace and good will, has called me to be an apostle, and has denominated me such.

And his grace, &c.] Nor have I been unfaithful to the Divine call; I used the grace which he gave me; and when my labours, travels, and sufferings are considered, it will be evident, that I have laboured more abundantly than the whole twelve. This was most literally true.

Yet not I, but the grace of God] It was not through my own power or wisdom, that I performed these things; but through the Divine influence which accompanied me.

Verse 11. Whether it were I or they] All the apostles of Christ agree in the same doctrines; we all preach one and the same thing; and, as we preached, so ye believed; having received from us the true apostolical faith, that Jesus died for our sins, and rose again for our justification; and that His resurrection is the pledge and proof of ours. Whoever teaches contrary to this, does not preach the true apostolic doctrine.

Verse 12. Now, if Christ be preached, &c.] Seeing it is true that we have thus preached Christ, and ye have credited this preaching; how say some among you, who have professed to receive this doctrine from us, that there is no resurrection of the dead? though we have shown that his resurrection is the proof and pledge of the dead, ^d then is Christ not risen:

14 And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain.

15 Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God; because ^e we have testified of God that he raised up Christ: whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not.

16 For, if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised:

17 And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ^f ye are yet in your sins.

ours. That there was some false teacher or teachers among them, who was endeavouring to incorporate Mosaic rites and ceremonies with the Christian doctrines, and even to blend Sadduceism with the whole, appears pretty evident. To confute this mongrel Christian, and overturn his bad doctrine, the apostle writes this chapter.

Verse 13. If there be no resurrection of the dead] As Christ was partaker of the same flesh and blood with us; and he promised to raise mankind from the dead, through his resurrection; if the dead rise not, then Christ has had no resurrection. There seems to have been some at Corinth, who, though they denied the resurrection of the dead, admitted that Christ had risen again: the apostle's argument goes therefore to state, that if Christ was raised from the dead, mankind may be raised; if mankind cannot be raised from the dead, then the body of Christ was never raised.

Verse 14. Then is our preaching vain] Our whole doctrine is useless, nugatory, and false.

And your faith is also vain.] Your belief of a false doctrine, must necessarily be to you unprofitable.

Verse 15. False witnesses] As having testified the fact of Christ's resurrection, as a matter which ourselves had witnessed; when we knew that we bore testimony to a falsehood. But could five hundred persons agree in this imposition? And if they did, is it possible that some one would not discover the cheat, when he could have no interest in keeping the secret; and might greatly promote his secular interest by making the discovery? Such a case never occurred, and never can occur. The testimony, therefore, concerning the resurrection of Christ, is incontrovertibly true.

If so be that the dead rise not] This clause is wanting in DE. Syriac, some of the Slavonian and Italia: several also of the primitive Fathers omit it. Its great similarity to the following words might be the cause of its omission by some copyists.

that he has not been justly put to death. If he were a malefactor, God would not work a miracle to raise him from the dead. If he have not been raised from the dead, there is a presumption that he has been put to death justly; and if so, consequently he has made no atonement: and ye are yet in your sins, under the power, guilt, and condemnation of them. All this reasoning of the apostle, goes to prove that, at Corinth, even among those false teachers, the innocency of our Lord was allowed, and the reality of his resurrection not questioned.

Verse 18. They also which are fallen asleep] All those who, either by martyrdom or natural death, have departed in the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, are perished; their hope was without foundation, and their faith had not reason and truth for its object. Their bodies are dissolved in the earth, finally decomposed and destroyed, notwithstanding the promise of Christ to such, that he would raise them up at the last day. See John v. 25, 28, 29. xi. 25, 26, &c.

Verse 19. If in this life only we have hope] It would be better to translate and point this verse as follows:

And, if in this life we have hoped in Christ only, we are more to be pitied than all men. If, in this life, we have no other hope and confidence but in Christ, (and if he be still dead, and not yet risen,) we are more to be pitied than any other men: we are sadly deceived: we have denied ourselves, and been denied by others: have mortified ourselves, and been persecuted by our fellow-creatures on account of our belief and hope in one who is not existing; and therefore can neither succour us here, nor reward us hereafter. Bp. Pearce.

Verse 20. But now is Christ risen] On the contrary, Christ is raised from the dead, and is become the first-fruits of them that slept. His resurrection has been demonstrated, and our resurrection necessarily follows: as sure as the first-fruits are the proof that there is a harvest; so surely the resurrection of Christ is a proof of ours. The Judaizing teacher at Corinth would feel the force of this observation much sooner than we can, who are not much acquainted with Jewish customs. "Although," says Dr. Lightfoot, "the resurrection of Christ, compared with some first-fruits, has very good harmony with them; yet especially it agrees with the offering of the sheaf, commonly called ἡ ὄμειδος, not only as to the thing itself, but also as to the circumstances of the time. For, first there was the pass-over, and the day following was a sabbatic day, and on the day following that, the first-fruits were offered. So Christ, our pass-over, was crucified: the day following his crucifixion, was the Sabbath; and the day following that, he, the first-fruits of them that slept, rose again. All who died before Christ, and were raised again to life, died afterward: but Christ is the first-fruits of all who shall be raised from the dead to die no more.

Verse 21. For, since by man came death] Mortality came by Adam, immortality by Christ; so sure as all have been subjected to natural death by Adam, so sure shall all be raised again by Christ Jesus. Mortality and immortality, on a general ground, are the subject of the apostle's reasoning here: and, for the explanation of the transgression of Adam, and the redemption by Christ, see the notes on Rom. v. 10, &c.

Verse 23. But every man in his own order] The apostle mentions three orders here:—1. Christ who rose from the dead by his own power. 2. Them that are Christ's; all his apostles, martyrs, confessors, and faithful followers—Thirdly, then cometh the end, when the whole mass shall be raised. Whether this order be exactly what the apostle intends, I shall not assert. Of the first, Christ's own resurrection, there can be no question. The second, the resurrection of his followers, before that of the common dead, is thought by some, very reasonable. "They had here a resurrection from a death of sin, to a life of righteousness, which the others had not; because they would not be saved in Christ's way. That they should have the privilege of being raised first, to behold the astonishing changes and revolutions which shall then take place, has nothing in it contrary to propriety and fitness;" but it seems contrary to ver. 52. in which all the dead are said to arise in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye. "And, thirdly, that all the other mass of mankind should be raised last, just to come forward and receive their doom, is equally reasonable:" but it is apparently inconsistent with the manner in which God chooses to act, see ver. 53. Some think that, by them that are Christ's at his coming, "we are to understand Christ's coming to reign on earth a thousand years with his saints, previously to the general judgment;" but I must confess, I find nothing in the Sacred Writings distinctly enough marked, to support this opinion of the millennium, or thousand years' reign: nor can I conceive any important end that can be answered by this procedure.

We should be very cautious how we make a figurative expression, used in the most figurative book in the Bible, the foundation of a very important literal system, that is to occupy a measure of the faith, and no small portion of the hope of Christians. The strange conjectures formed on this very uncertain basis, have not been very creditable either to reason or religion.

Verse 24. When he shall have delivered up the kingdom] The mediatorial kingdom; which comprehends all the displays of his grace in saving sinners; and all his spiritual influence in governing the church.

All rule, and all authority, and power.] Ἀπὸν—ἐξουσίαν καὶ δυνάμιν. As the apostle is here speaking of the end of the present system of the world; the rule, authority, and power, may refer to all earthly governments, emperors, kings, princes, &c. though angels, principalities, and powers, and the rulers of the darkness of this world, and all spiritual wickedness in high places, may be also intended. Our Lord Jesus is represented here as administering the concerns of the kingdom of grace in this lower world, during the time that this divine economy lasts; and when the end, the time determined by the wisdom of God, comes; then, as there is no longer any need of this administration, the kingdom is delivered up unto the Father; an allusion to the case of Roman viceroys or governors of provinces, who, when their administration was ended, delivered up their kingdom or government into the hands of the emperor.

The apostle may refer also to an opinion of the ancient Jews; that there should be ten kings, who should have the supreme government of the whole world: the first and last of which, should be God himself; but the ninth should be the Messiah, after whose empire the kingdom should be delivered up into the hands of God for ever. See the place in Schoetgen on this verse, and on Luke i. 33.

Verse 25. For he must reign, &c.] This is according to the promise, Psal. cx. 1. "The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstool." Therefore the kingdom cannot be given up, till all rule and government are cast down. So that while the world lasts, Jesus, as the Messiah and Mediator, must reign; and all human beings are properly his subjects, and under his government, and are accountable to him.

Verse 26. The last enemy] Death shall be destroyed; καταργηται, shall be counter-worked, subverted, and finally overturned. But death cannot be destroyed by there being simply no further death; death can only be destroyed and annihilated by a general resurrection: if there be no general resurrection, it is most evident that death will still retain his empire. Therefore, the fact that death shall be destroyed, assures the fact that there shall be a general resurrection: and this is a proof also, that, after the resurrection, there shall be no more death.

Verse 27. For he hath put all things under his feet.] The Father hath put all things under the feet of Christ, according to the prophecy, Psal. cx.

He is excepted] i. e. The Father; who hath put all things under him, the Son. This observation seems to be introduced by the apostle to show, that he does not mean that the Divine Nature shall be subjected to the human nature. Christ, as Messiah, and Mediator between God and man, must ever be considered inferior to the Father: and his human nature, however dignified in consequence of its union with the Divine Nature, must ever be inferior to God. The whole of this verse should be read in a parenthesis.

Verse 28. The Son also himself be subject] When the administration of the kingdom of grace is finally closed; when there shall be no longer any state of probation; and consequently no longer need of a distinction between the kingdom of grace and the kingdom of glory: then the Son, as being man, shall cease to exercise any distinct dominion; and God be all in all, there remaining no longer any distinction in the persons of the glorious Trinity, as acting any distinct or separate parts in either the kingdom of grace, or the kingdom of glory: and so the one infinite essence shall appear undivided and eternal.

Verse 29. Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead] This is certainly the most difficult verse in the New Testament; for, notwithstanding the greatest and wisest men have laboured to explain it, there are to this day nearly as many different interpretations of it as there are interpreters. I shall not employ my time, nor that of my reader, with a vast number of discordant and conflicting opinions: I shall make a few remarks—1. The doctrine of the resurrection of our Lord, was a grand doctrine among the apostles: they considered and preached this as the demonstration of the truth of the Gospel.—2. The multitudes who embraced Christianity, became converts on the evidence of this resurrection.—3. This resurrection was considered the pledge and proof of the resurrection of all believers in Christ, to the possession of the same glory into which he had entered.—4. The baptism which they received, they considered as an emblem of their natural death and resurrection. This doctrine St. Paul most pointedly preaches, Rom. vi. 3, 4, 5. Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead, even so we also should walk in newness of life: for, if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in his resurrection.—5. It is evident from this, that all who died in the faith of Christ, died in the faith of the resurrection; and therefore cheerfully gave up their lives to death, as they took joyfully the spoiling of their goods, knowing in themselves that they had in heaven a better and an enduring substance, Heb. x. 34.—6. As is the body, so are the members; those who were properly instructed, and embraced Christianity, believed that, as all who had died in the faith of Christ should rise again, so they were baptized in the same faith.—7. As so many of the primitive followers of Christ, sealed the truth with their blood; and Satan and his followers continued unchanged: every man who took on him the profession of Christianity, which was done by receiving baptism, considered himself as exposing his life to the most imminent hazard, and offering his life with those who had already offered and laid down theirs.—8. He was therefore baptized in reference to this martyrdom; and having a regard to those dead, he cheerfully received baptism, that, whether he was taken off by a natural or violent death, he might be raised in the likeness of Jesus Christ's resurrection, and that of his illustrious martyrs.—9. As martyrdom and baptism were thus so closely and intimately connected, βαπτισθεὶς, to be baptized, was used to express being put to a violent death by the hands of persecutors. So Matt. xx. 22, 23. "But Jesus answered and said, Are ye able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of," &c. (can ye go through my sufferings?)—"They say unto him, We are able: He saith unto them, Ye shall indeed drink of my cup," (ye shall bear your part of the afflictions of the Gospel).—"And be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with,"—(That is, ye shall suffer martyrdom,) see also Mark x. 38. So Luke xii. 50. "I have a baptism to be baptized with; and how am I straitened till it be accomplished?" That is, I must die a violent death, for the salvation of men.—10. The sum of the apostle's meaning appears to be this: If there be no resurrection of the dead, those who, in becoming Christians, expose themselves to all manner of privations, crosses, severe sufferings, and a violent death, can have no compensation, nor any motive sufficient to induce them to expose themselves to such miseries. But as they receive baptism as an emblem of death, in voluntarily going under the water; so they receive it as an emblem of the resurrection unto eternal life, in coming up out of the water; thus they are baptized for the dead, in perfect faith of the resurrection. The three following verses seem to confirm this sense.

Verse 30. And why stand we in jeopardy every hour? Is there any reason why we should voluntarily submit to so many sufferings, and every hour be in danger of losing our lives, if the dead rise not. On the conviction of the possibility and certainty of the resurrection, we are thus baptized for the dead. We have counted the cost, despise sufferings, and exult at the prospect of death, because we know we shall have a resurrection unto eternal life.

Verse 31. I protest by your rejoicing [Να τῶν υμνεῶν καυχῶν, by your exultation or boasting. Dr. Lightfoot understands this of "the boasting of the Corinthians against the apostle: that he considered himself continually trampled on by them; rejected and exposed to infamy and contempt; but that he took this as a part of the reproach of Christ, and was happy in the prospect of death and a glorious resurrection, when all those troubles and wrongs would terminate for ever." Instead of υμνεῶν, YOUR exultation or boasting, ὑμνεῶν, OUR exultation, is the reading of the Codex Alexandrinus, and several others; with the Æthiopic, Origen, and Theophylact.—This will lead to an easier sense: I declare by the exultation which I have in Christ Jesus, as having died for my offences, and risen again for my justification, that I neither fear sufferings nor death; and am daily ready to be offered up, and feel myself continually exposed to death. But the common reading is probably to be preferred: for, your glorying, is the same as glorying on your account. I profess by the glorying or exultation which I have on account of your salvation; that I anticipate with pleasure the end of my earthly race.

I die daily] A form of speech, for I am continually exposed to death. The following passages will illustrate this. So Philo, pag. 990. Flaccus, who was in continual fear of death, says, καθ' ἑκάστην ἡμέραν, μάλλον δε σφαι, προσηκουσκα, πολλοὺς θανάτους υπομεινω ἀθ' ἵσος του τειστω μιν. "Every day, rather every hour, I anticipate death; enduring many deaths before that last one comes." So Libanius, speaking of his own miseries, and those of the people of Antioch, Epist. 1320. pag. 615, says, ἐτι ζῶντες τεθνεαμεν. "though living, we are dead." It is a similar form of expression to signify continual danger, xxix. 17. Quotidie capitur urbs nostra, quotidie diripitur. "Daily, is our city taken; daily, is it pillaged."

Verse 32. If after the manner of men, &c. Much learned criticism has been employed on this verse, to ascertain whether it is to be understood literally or metaphorically. Does the apostle mean to say, that he had literally fought with wild beasts at Ephesus? or, that he had met with brutish, savage men, from whom he was in danger of his life? That St. Paul did not fight with wild beasts at Ephesus, may be argued, 1. From his own silence on this subject, when enumerating his various sufferings, 2 Cor. xi. 23, &c. 2. From the silence of his historian Luke, who, in the Acts of this Apostle, gives no intimation of this kind; and it certainly was too remarkable a circumstance to be passed over, either by Paul, in the catalogue of his own sufferings, or by Luke in his history. 3. From similar modes of speech, which are employed metaphorically, and are so understood. 4. From the improbability that a Roman citizen, as Paul was, should be condemned to such a punishment, when, in other cases, by pleading his privilege, he was exempted from being scourged, &c. And, 5. From the positive testimony of Tertullian and Chrysostom, who deny the literal interpretation.

On the other hand, it is strongly argued, that the apostle is to be literally understood; and that he did, at some particular time, contend with wild beasts at Ephesus: from which he was miraculously delivered. 1. That the phrase ut arborum, signifies as men used to do, and never means according to the manner of men, as implying their purposes, or, to use their forms of speech, &c. 2. From the circumstances of the case in Ephesus, usually referred to, viz. the insurrection by Demetrius and his fellow-craftsmen; where, though Paul would have been in danger had he gone into the theatre, he was in little or none, as he did not adventure himself. 3. From his having endured much greater conflicts at Lystra and at Philippi, than at Ephesus, at the former of which he was stoned to death, and again miraculously raised to life: see the notes on Acts xiv. 19, &c. And yet he calls not those greater dangers by this name. 4. That it cannot refer to the insurrection of Demetrius and his fellows, for St. Paul had no contention with them, and was scarcely in any danger, though Gaius and Aristarchus were; see the whole of Acts xix. And, 5. As we do not read of any other imminent danger to which he was exposed at Ephesus, and that already mentioned is not sufficient to justify the expression, I have fought with beasts at Ephesus; therefore we must conclude that he was, at some time, not directly mentioned by his historian or himself, actually exposed to wild beasts at Ephesus. 6. That this is the case that he refers to,

2 Cor. i. 8, 9, 10. For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia, that we were pressed out of measure above strength, and we despaired even of life. But we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God, which raiseth the dead; who delivered us from so great a death: for these expressions refer to some excessive and unprecedented danger, from which nothing less than a miraculous interference could have saved him; and that it might have been an actual exposure to wild beasts, or any other danger, equally great, or even greater.

What advantageth it me, if the dead rise not? I believe the common method of pointing this verse is erroneous: I propose to read it thus: If, after the manner of men, I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what doth it advantage me? If the dead rise not, let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die.—

What the apostle says here, is a regular and legitimate conclusion from the doctrine, that there is no resurrection; for, if there be no resurrection, then there can be no judgment; no future state of rewards and punishments; why, therefore, should we bear crosses, and keep ourselves under continual discipline! Let us eat and drink, take all the pleasure we can, for to-morrow we die: and there is an end of us for ever. The words, Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die, are taken from Isai. xxii. 13. as they stand now in the Septuagint; and are a pretty smooth, proverbial saying, which might be paralleled from the writings of several epicurean heathens, φαγεται και ποινεται αυτος για αποθνησκουσαν. The words of Isaiab are אכלו ושתו כי יום אחד וכלו ושתו atol ve shatho, ki machar namuth: "In eating and drinking, for to-morrow we die:" i.e. Let us spend our time in eating and drinking, &c. See a similar speech by Trimalchio, in Petronius Arbiter, Satiric. cap. xxxvii.

Heu heu nos miseros; quam totus hognancia nil est! Sic erimus cuncti, postquam nos auferet circus.
Ergo vivamus dum licet esse bene.

Alas! alas! what wretches we are; all mankind are a worthless pack: thus shall we all be, after death hath taken us away. Therefore, while we may, let us enjoy life.

Verse 33. Be not deceived] Do not impose on yourselves; and permit not others to do it.

Evil communications corrupt good manners.] There are many sayings like this among the Greek poets; but this of the apostle, and which according to the best MSS. makes an Iambic verse, is generally supposed to have been taken from Menander's lost comedy of Thais.

There is a proverb much like this among the Rabbins:

תרי אודי יבויש וחד ריבנא אוקרן יבויש לרשיבא

"There were two dry logs of wood, and one green log; but the dry logs burnt up the green log."

There is no difficulty in this saying; he who frequents the company of bad or corrupt men, will soon be as they are. He may be sound in the faith, and have the life and power of godliness, and at first frequent their company only for the sake of their pleasing conversation, or their literary accomplishments: and he may think his faith proof against their infidelity; but he will soon find, by means of their glozing speeches, his faith weakened; and, when he once gets under the empire of doubt, unbelief will soon prevail; his bad company will corrupt his morals, and the two dry logs will soon burn up the green one.

The same sentiment, in nearly the same words, is found in several of the Greek writers: Æschylus, vii. Theb. ver. 605. Εἰ παρτί πράγμα δ' ὄψθ' ὁμιλίαις κακῆς κακῶν ὄσθιν.—"In every matter there is nothing more deleterious than evil communication."—Diodorus Siculus, lib. xvi. cap. 54.—Ταῖς πομπραῖς ὁμιλίαις διαρθῆναι τὰ ἡθὲ των ἀνθρώπων.—"With these evil communications he corrupted the morals of men.

Ταῦτα μὲν αὐτοῖς ὄψθ' κακοῖσι δὲ μὴ προσομιλῆναι ἀνθρώποις ἀλλ' αἰνὴ τῶν ἀγαθῶν ἔχει. ἢ καὶ μετὰ τοῖσιν πίνει καὶ ὄσθιν, καὶ μετὰ τοῖσιν ἴζει, καὶ ἀρθεῖν τοῖς ἠν μετὰ αὐτοῖς, Ἐσθλων μὲν γὰρ ἀπ' ἐσθλα μαθῆσται ἢ δὲ κακοῖσι Συμμιχθῆς ἀπολλῆται καὶ τοῖ σόντα ἴουσι.

Theogn. Sent. ver. 31—36.

"Know this—Thou must not keep company with the wicked, but converse always with good men. With such eat, drink, and associate. Please those who have the greatest virtue. From good men thou mayest learn good things: but if thou keep company with the wicked, thou wilt lose even the intelligence which thou now possessest."

Verse 34. Awake to righteousness] Shake off your slumber; awake fully, thoroughly, δικαίως, as ye ought to do: so the word should be rendered; not awake to righteousness. Be in earnest: do not trifle with God, your souls, and eternity.

Sin not] For this will lead to the destruction both of body and soul. Life is but a moment; improve it; Heaven has blessings without end.

Some have not the knowledge of God] The original is very emphatic, ἀγνοῦσαι γὰρ Θεοῦ τινος ἔχετε, some have an ignorance of God: they do not acknowledge God. They have what is their bane; and they have not what would be their happiness and glory. To have an ignorance of God, a sort of substantial darkness, that prevents the light of God from penetrating the soul, is a worse state than to be simply in the dark; or without the divine knowledge. The apostle probably speaks of those who were once enlightened; had once good morals, but were corrupted by bad company. It was to their shame or reproach that they had left the good way, and were now posting down to the chambers of death.

Verse 35. But some man will say] ἄλλα εἶπαι τις. It is very likely that the apostle by τις, some, some one, some man, means particularly the false apostle, or teacher at Corinth; who was chief in the opposition to the pure doctrine of the Gospel; and to whom, in this covert way, he often refers.

The second part of the apostle's discourse begins at this verse. What shall be the nature of the resurrection body? 1. The question is stated, ver. 35. 2. It is answered; first, by a similitude, ver. 36—38.; secondly, by an application, ver. 39—41.; and, thirdly, by explication, ver. 42—50.

Verse 36. Thou fool] ἄφρον. If this be addressed, as it probably is, to the false apostle, there is a peculiar propriety in it; as this man seems to have magnified his own wisdom, and set it up against both God and man; and none but a fool could act so. At the same time, it is folly in any to assert the impossibility of a thing, because he cannot comprehend it.

That which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die] I have showed the propriety of this simile of the apostle, in the note on John xii. 24. to which I must refer the reader. A grain of wheat, &c. is composed of the body or lobes, and the germ. The latter forms an inconsiderable part of the mass of the grain; the body, lobes, or farinaceous part, forms nearly the whole. This body dies, becomes decomposed, and forms a fine earth, from which the germ derives its first nourishment: by the nourishment thus derived, the germ is quickened, receives its first vegetative life; and through this means, is rendered capable of deriving the rest of its nourishment and support from the grosser earth in which the grain was deposited. Whether the apostle would intimate here, that there is a certain germ in the present body, which shall become the seed of the resurrection body, this is not the place to inquire: and on this point I can with pleasure refer to Mr. Drew's work on the "Resurrection of the Human Body;" where this subject, as well as every other subject connected with this momentous question, is considered in a very luminous and cogently argumentative point of view.

37 And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain: it may chance of wheat, or some other grain:

38 But God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body.

39 All flesh is not the same flesh: but there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds.

• Matt. 23. 3. Luke 9. 29.

Verse 37. Thou sowest not that body that shall be] This is decomposed, and becomes the means of nourishing the whole plant, roots, stalk, leaves, ear, and full corn in the ear.

Verse 38. But God giveth it a body] And is there any other way of accounting for it, but by the miraculous working of God's power? For, out of that one bare grain, is produced a system of roots, a tall and vigorous stalk, with all its appendages of leaves, &c. besides the full corn in the ear; the whole making several hundred times the quantum of what was originally deposited. No proofs of what some call nature, can effect this: it will ever be a philosophical as well as scriptural truth that God giveth it a body as it pleaseth him: and so doth he manage the whole of the work, that every seed shall have its own body; that the wheat germ shall never produce barley, nor the rye, oats. See the note on Gen. i. 12.

Verse 39. All flesh is not the same flesh] Though the organization of all animals is, in its general principles, the same; yet, there are no two different kinds of animals that have flesh of the same flavour; whether the animal be beast, fowl, or fish. And this is precisely the same with vegetables.

In opposition to this general assertion of St. Paul, there are certain people who tell us that fish is not flesh: and while their religion prohibits, at one time of the year, the flesh of quadrupeds and fowls, it allows them to eat fish, fondly supposing that fish is not flesh: they might as well tell us that a lily is not a vegetable, because it is not a cabbage. There is a Jewish canon produced by Schoetgen, which my readers may not be displeased to find inserted here; Nedarim, fol. 40. הנדר מן הדג אינו בשר רבים תנאים He who is bound by a vow to abstain from flesh, is bound to abstain from the flesh of fish and of locusts. From this it appears that they acknowledged that there was one flesh of beasts, and another of fishes; and that he was religiously bound to abstain from the one, who was bound to abstain from the other.

Verse 40. There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial] The apostle certainly does not speak of celestial and terrestrial bodies in the sense in which we use those terms; we invariably mean by the former, the sun, moon, planets, and stars; by the latter, masses of inanimate matter. But the apostle speaks of human 40 There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial: but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another.

41 There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory.

42 So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption: it is raised in incorruption:

• Dan. 12. 3. Matt. 13. 43.

beings; some of which were clothed with celestial, others with terrestrial bodies. It is very likely therefore, that he means by the celestial bodies such as those refined human bodies with which Enoch, Elijah, and Christ himself appear in the realms of glory: to which we may add the bodies of those saints which arose after our Lord's resurrection; and, after having appeared to many, doubtless were taken up to Paradise. By terrestrial bodies, we may understand those in which the saints now live.

But the glory of the celestial is one] The glory, the excellence, beauty, and perfection. Even the present frail human body, possesses an indescribable degree of contrivance, art, economy, order, beauty, and excellence. But the celestial body, that in which Christ now appears, and according to which, ours shall be raised, Phil. iii. 21. will exceed the excellence of this beyond all comparison. A glory, or splendour, will belong to that which does not belong to this: here there is a glory of excellence; there, there will be a glory of light, and effulgence; for the bodies of the saints shall shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father. See Matt. xiii. 43.

Verse 41. There is one glory of the sun] As if he had said, This may be illustrated by the present appearance of the celestial bodies which belong to our system. The sun has a greater degree of splendour than the moon; the moon than the planets; and the planets, than the stars. And even in the fixed stars, one has a greater degree of splendour than another; which may proceed either from their different magnitudes, or from the greater proximity of some of them to our earth; but from which of these causes, or from some other cause unknown, we cannot tell; as it is impossible to ascertain the distance of any of the fixed stars; even the nearest of them being too remote to afford any parallax, without which their distances cannot be measured. See the concluding observations.

Verse 42. So also is the resurrection of the dead] That is, the bodies of the dead, though all immortal, shall possess different degrees of splendour and glory, according to the state of holiness in which their respective souls were found. The rabbins have some crude notions concerning different degrees of glory, which the righteous shall possess in the kingdom of heaven. They make out seven degrees:

^b Gal. 6. 8.

"The first of which is possessed by צדיקים tsadikim, the just, who observe the covenant of the holy blessed God, and subjugate all evil affections."

"The second, is possessed by those who are צדיקים yesharim, the upright, whose delight it is to walk in the ways of God, and please him."

"The third, is for צדיקים tamimim, the perfect; those who, with integrity, walk in the ways of God; and do not curiously pry into his dispensations."

"The fourth, is for צדיקים kadushim, the holy ones; those who are the excellent of the earth, in whom is all God's delight." Psa. xvi. 3.

"The fifth, is for צדיקים baaley teshubah, the chief of the penitents; who have broken through the brazen doors, and returned to the Lord."

"The sixth, is for צדיקים tinukoth shel-beith raban, the scholars and tender ones; who have not transgressed."

"The seventh, is for צדיקים chasidim, the godly; and this is the innermost of all the departments." These seven degrees requires a comment by themselves.

There is a saying among the rabbins, very like that of the apostle, in this and the preceding verse. Siphri, in Yalcut Simeoni, page 2. fol. 10.—"The faces of the righteous shall be in the world to come, like suns, moons, the heaven, stars, lightnings: and like the lilies and candlesticks of the temple."

It is sown in corruption] The body is buried in a state of degradation, decay, and corruption. The apostle uses the word sown to intimate that the body shall rise again, as a seed springs up that has been sown in the earth.

It is raised in incorruption] Being no more subject to corruption, dissolution, and death.

Verse 43. It is sown in dishonour] Being now stripped of all the glory it had as a machine, fearfully and wonderfully made by the hands of God; and also consigned to death and destruction because of sin. This is the most dishonourable circumstance.

It is raised in glory] It is raised a glorious body, because immortal, and for ever redeemed from the empire of death.

It is sown in weakness] The principles of dissolution, corruption, and decay, have prevailed over it; disease undermined it, and death made it his prey.

It is raised in power] To be no more liable to weakness through labour; decay, by age; wasting, by disease; and dissolution, by death.

Verse 44. It is sown a natural body] Σωμα φυσικον, an animal body, having a multiplicity of solids, and fluids of different kinds, with different functions; composed of muscles, fibres, tendons, cartilages, bones, arteries, veins, nerves, blood, and various juices, requiring continual support from aliment; and hence the necessity of labour to provide food, and skill to prepare it; which food must be masticated, digested and refined; what is proper for nourishment secreted, brought into the circulation, further elaborated, and prepared to enter into the composition of every part; hence growth and nutrition; without which, no organized body can possibly exist.

It is raised a spiritual body] One perfect in all its parts; no longer dependent on natural productions for its support; being built up on indestructible principles; and existing in a region where there shall be no more death; no more causes of decay leading to dissolution; and consequently, no more necessity for food, nutrition, &c. The body is spiritual, and has a spiritual existence, and spiritual support.

What the apostle says here, is quite consistent with the views his countrymen had on this subject.

In Sohar Chadash, fol. 43. it is said, "So shall it be in the resurrection of the dead; only, the old uncleanness shall not be found."

R. Bechai, on the law, fol. 14. says "When the godly shall arise, their bodies shall be pure and innocent; obedient to the instinct of the soul; there shall be no adversary, nor any evil disease."

Rab. Pinchas says, "The holy blessed God shall make the bodies of the righteous as beautiful as the body of Adam was, when he entered into paradise."

Rab. Levi says, "When the soul is in heaven, it is clothed with celestial light; when it returns to the body, it shall have the same light; and then the body shall shine like the splendour of the firmament of heaven. Then shall men gain the knowledge of what is perfect." Sohar. Gen. fol. 69.

The Jews have an opinion that the os coccydis, the lower joint of the backbone, survives the corruption of the body; and that it is out of this bone that the resurrection body is formed. In the place last quoted, fol. 70. we have the following teachings on this subject: "Let us borrow an example from what relates to the purifying of silver. First, the ore is cast into the burning furnace, that it may be separated from its earthly impurities; it is then silver, but not perfect silver. They put it in the furnace a second time, and then all its scoriae are separated from it, and it becomes perfect silver, without any adulteration. Thus does the holy blessed God: He first buries our bodies under the earth, where they putrefy and corrupt, that nothing remains but that one bone: from this, a new body is produced, which is indeed a body, but not a perfect body. But in that great day, when all bodies are hidden in the earth, and the soul departs, then even that bone decays, and the body which was formed out of it remains, and is as the light of the sun, and the splendour of heaven. Thus, as the silver was purified, so is the body; and no imperfect mixture remains." See Schoetgen.

These things must not be treated as rabbinical dotages; the different similes used by the apostle, have the same spirit and design: as the seed which is sown in the earth rots, and out of the germ contained in it, God, in his providence, produces a root, stalk, leaves, ear, and a great numerical increase of grains: is it not likely, that God, out of some essential parts of the body that now is, will produce the resurrection body; and will then give the soul a body as it pleaseth him; and so completely preserve the individuality of every human being, as he does of every grain; giving to each its own body? ver. 38. So that as surely as the grain of wheat shall produce wheat, after it is cast in the earth, corrupts, and dies, so surely shall our bodies produce the same bodies as to their essential individuality. As the germination of seeds is produced by his wisdom and power, so shall the pure and perfect human body be, in the resurrection. Hence he does not say the body is buried, but the body is sown; it is sown in weakness, it is sown in dishonour, &c. &c.

There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body] This very saying is found in so many words, in Yalcut Rubeni, fol. 126. "There are different kinds of men" אִין אִין "There is a spiritual Adam, and there is also a corporeal Adam.

Verse 45. The first man Adam was made a living soul] These forms of expression are also common among the Jews; hence we find אדם הראשון Adam harishon, "Adam the first:" and אדם קדמון Adam kadmai, "Adam the last." They assert that there are two Adams, 1. The mystical heavenly Adam; and, 2. The mystical earthly Adam. See Sohar Exod. fol. 29. and the several examples in Schoetgen. The apostle says this is written; the first man Adam was made a living soul: this is found Gen. ii. 7. in the words נִשְׁמַת חַיִּים nishmat chayim, the breath of lives; which the apostle translates ψυχή ζωντα, a living soul.

The last Adam—a quickening spirit] This is also said to be written; but where, says Dr. Lightfoot, is this written in the whole sacred book? Schoetgen replies, In the very same verse, and in these words וְהָאָדָם לְנֶפֶשׁ חַיָּה vayehi ha-Adam le-nepesh chayah, and Adam became a living soul; which the apostle translates τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ζωντα, a quickening, or life-giving spirit. Among the cabalistic Jews נֶפֶשׁ Nepesh, is considered as implying greater dignity than נִשְׁמָה Nishmah. The former may be considered as pointing out the rational, the latter the sensitive soul. All these references to Jewish opinions and forms of speech, the apostle uses to convince them that the thing was possible; and that the resurrection of the body was generally credited by all their wise and learned men. The Jews, as Dr. Lightfoot observes, speak frequently of the spirit of the Messiah; and they allow that it was this Spirit that moved on the face of the waters, Gen. i. 2. And they assert that the Messiah shall quicken those who dwell in the dust.

"It ought not to be passed by," says the same author, "that Adam, receiving from God the promise of Christ, The seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent, and believing it, named his wife מַחַבָּה Chavah, that is, life; so the Septuagint, καὶ ὠνόμασε Ἀδάμ τὸ ὄνομα τῆς γυναῖκος αὐτοῦ, Ζωή. And Adam called the name of his wife, Life. What! Is she called Life that brought death into the world? But Adam perceived τὸν ἄρχαιον Ἀδάμ, the last Adam, exhibited to him in the promise, to be πνεῦμα ζωοποιον, a quickening or life-giving spirit; and had brought in a better life of the soul; and should at last bring in a better life of the body. Hence is that saying, John i. 4. Ἐν ἀρχῇ ζῶον ἦν—In HIM was LIFE.

Some contend that the first Adam and the last Adam, mean the same person in two different states. The first man with the body of his creation; the same person with the body of his resurrection. See on ver. 49.

Verse 46. That was not first which is spiritual] The natural or animal body described, ver. 44. was the first; it was the body with which Adam was created. The spiritual body is the last, and is that with which the soul is to be clothed in the resurrection.

Verse 47. The first man is of the earth] That is, Adam's body was made out of the dust of the earth; and hence the apostle says, he was χιλιος, of the dust; for the body was made אֶפְרַח מִן הָאֲדָמָה aphar min ha-adamah; dust from the ground, Gen. ii. 7.

The second man is—from heaven] Heavenly, οὐρανόθεν, as several good MSS. and Versions read. The resurrection body shall be of a heavenly nature, and not subject to decay or death. What is formed of earth, must live after an earthly manner! must be nourished and supported by the earth: what is from heaven, is of a spiritual nature, and shall have no further connexion with, nor dependence upon earth. I conceive both these clauses to relate to man, and to point out the difference between the animal body and the spiritual body: or between the bodies which we now have, and the bodies which we shall have in the resurrection. But can this be the meaning of the clause, the second man is the Lord from heaven? In the quotation, I have omitted; Κυριος, the Lord, on the following authorities; first, MSS. BCD*EFG. and two others. VERSIONS—Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian in the margin, Vulgate, and Italian. FATHERS—Origen, who quotes it once and omits it once; Athanasius, Basil, the two Gregories, Nyssen and Nazianzen; Isidore, Cyril, Tertullian, Cyprian, Hilary, Zeno, Ambrose, Augustin, Jerom, Ambroniaster, Philaster, Leo, Pacianus, Primasius, Sedulius, Bede, and others. See these authorities more at large in Wetstein. Some of the most eminent of modern critics leave out the word, and Tertullian says that it was put in by the heretic Marcion. I do think that the word is not legitimate in this place. The verse is read by the MSS. Versions and Fathers, above referred to, thus, The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is of heaven, heavenly; Κυριος, being omitted, and εωραυτος, added. The first man, and the second man, of this verse, are the same as the first Adam, and the second Adam of ver. 45. and it is not clear that Christ is meant in either place. Some suppose that there is a reference here to what Eve said, when she brought forth Cain, I have gotten a man from the Lord, אִישׁ גָּדַל לַיהוָה kanili Iah, et Yehovah, I have possessed or obtained a man, the Lord; that is, as Dr. Lightfoot explains it, that the Lord himself should become man: and he thinks that Eve had respect to the promise of Christ when she named her son; as Adam had when he named his wife. If Eve had this in view, we can only say, she was sadly mistaken: indeed the conjecture is too refined.

The terms first man of the earth, and second man from heaven, are frequent among the Jews: אִישׁ לְיִרְאָה the superior Adam; and אִישׁ חָסֵד Adam the inferior; that is, the earthy and the heavenly Adam: Adam before the resurrection, and Adam, after it.

Verse 48. As is the earthy, &c.] As Adam was, who was formed from the earth; so are all his descendants, frail, decaying, and subject to death.

As is the heavenly] As is the heavenly state of Adam and all glorified beings, so shall be the state of all those who, at the resurrection, are found fit for glory.

Verse 49. And as we have borne the image of the earthy] As being descendants from Adam, we have all been born in his likeness, and subject to the same kind of corruption, disgrace, and death; we shall also be raised to a life immortal, such as he now enjoys in the kingdom of God. This interpretation proceeds on the ground that, what is here spoken, belongs to Adam in his two-fold state, viz. of mortality and immortality; of disgrace and honour, of earth and heaven.

But by many commentators, the words are understood to refer to Adam and Christ, in ver. 45, 47, 48, and 49. By these, Christ is called the second Adam, the quickening Spirit, the second man, and the heavenly, whose image of righteousness and true holiness we are to bear.

But when I consider, 1st. How all these terms are used and applied in the Jewish writings, it appears to me that, as this was not their import among them, so it was not the design of Paul; and it would be very difficult to find any place where Jesus Christ is called the second Adam, in either the Old or New Testament. The discourse of the apostle, Rom. v. 14—19. will not prove it, though in those verses there is a comparison drawn between Adam and Christ; but that comparison refers to the extent of the sin and condemnation, brought upon all men by the transgression of the first; and the redemption purchased for all men by the sacrifice of the last; and the superabundant grace procured by that sacrifice. But here, the comparison is most evidently is between the state of man in this mortal life, and his state after the resurrection. Here, all men are corrupt and mortal; and here all men die. There, all men shall be incorrupt and immortal; and, whether holy or unholy, shall be eternally immortal.

Of the image of Adam, in his heavenly or paradisiacal state, the rabbins talk largely: They say that "God created Adam with a double image, earthly and heavenly; that he was the most perfect of all beings: that his splendour shone from one extremity of the earth to the other; that all feared before him: that he knew all wisdom, both earthly and heavenly; but when he sinned, his glory was diminished, and his wisdom departed from him." Yalcut Rubeni, fol. 10.

They add further, that, "In the time in which Adam received הַיְמוּתוֹ הַשָּׁמַיִת the heavenly image, that all the creatures came to him, and acknowledged him king of the earth." Ibid. fol. 21.

2. From all this, and much more might be produced on the subject, (see Schoetgen.) it appears that the apostle follows, as far as it could comport with his design, the sentiments of his countrymen; and that he adopts their very phraseology, and that it is through the medium of these sentiments, and this phraseology, that he is to be understood and interpreted. Others may understand all these passages differently; and still consider them as a parallel between Adam and Christ, which is the general view of interpreters. The view which I have taken of them appears to me to be much more consistent with the nature of the discourse, and the scope and design of the apostle. The common opinion is orthodox: what I here propose is no heresy. There are many difficulties in the chapter; and not a few in the verses immediately under consideration.

Verse 50. Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom] This is a Hebrew periphrasis for man; and man in his present state of infirmity and decay. Man, in his present state, cannot inherit the kingdom of God; his nature is not suited to that place; he could not in his present weak state endure an exceeding great and eternal weight of glory. Therefore, it is necessary that he should die, or be changed; that he should have a celestial body suited to the celestial state. The apostle is certainly not speaking of flesh and blood in a moral sense, to signify corruption of mind and heart; but in a natural sense, as such flesh and blood cannot inherit glory, for the reasons already assigned.

Verse 51. I show you a mystery] That is, a thing which you have never known before. But what is this mystery? Why, that we shall not all sleep; we shall not all die; but we shall all be changed: of this the Jews had not distinct notions. For, as flesh and blood cannot inherit glory, and all shall not be found dead, at the day of judgment; then all must be changed; undergo such a change that their bodies may become spiritual, like the bodies of those who shall be raised from the dead.

Verse 52. In a moment] Εν ατομῷ, in an atom; that is, an indivisible point of time. In the twinkling of an eye; as soon as a man can wink: which expressions show that this mighty work is to be done by the Almighty power of God, as he does all his works: He calls, and it is done. The resurrection of all the dead, from the foundation of the world to that time, and the change of all the living then upon earth, shall be the work of a single moment.

At the last trump] This as well as the rest of the peculiar phraseology of this chapter, is merely Jewish; and we must go to the Jewish writers to know what is intended. On this very subject, the rabbins use the very same expression. Thus Rabbi Akiba, "How shall the holy, blessed God raise the dead? We are taught that God has a trumpet, a thousand ells long, according to the ell of God: this trumpet he shall blow, so that the sound of it shall extend from one extremity of the earth to the other. At the first blast, the earth shall be shaken; at the second, the dust shall be separated; at the third, the bones shall be gathered together; at the fourth, the members shall wax warm; at the 53 For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and ^d this mortal must put on immortality.

54 So, when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, ^e Death is swallowed up in victory.

fifth, the heads shall be covered with skin; at the sixth, the souls shall be rejoined to their bodies; at the seventh, all shall revive and stand clothed." See Welstein. This tradition shows us what we are to understand by the last trump of the apostle: it is the seventh of Rab. Akiba, when the dead shall be raised, and being clothed upon with their eternal vehicles, they shall be ready to appear before the judgment-seat of God.

For the trumpet shall sound] By this the apostle confirms the substance of the tradition; there shall be the sound of a trumpet on this great day; and this, other scriptures teach: See Zach. ix. 14. Matt. xxiv. 31. John v. 25. 1. Thess. iv. 16. in which latter place the apostle treats this subject among the Thessalonians; as he does here among the Corinthians. See the notes there.

Shall be raised incorruptible] Fully clothed, with a new body, to die no more.

We shall be changed] That, is, those who shall be found alive.

Verse 53. For this corruptible, &c.] Because flesh and blood cannot inherit glory; therefore, there must be a refinement by death, or a change without it.

Verse 54. Death is swallowed up in victory.] καταρῶν ὁ θάνατος ὡς νικῶς. These words are a quotation from Isaiah xxv. 8. where the Hebrew is בְּלֵא הַמָּוֶת לֹא-נִשְׁבַּח lâ he-maveth la-netsach; He, (God,) hath swallowed up death in victory: or, for ever. These words in the Septuagint are thus translated, καταρῶν ὁ θάνατος ὡς νικῶς; death, having prevailed or conquered, hath swallowed up. But in the version of Theodotion, the words are the same with those of the apostle.—The Hebrew נִשְׁבַּח, la-netsach, the Septuagint sometimes translate ὡς νικῶς; in victory; but most commonly, ὡς αἰῶνος, for ever: both, as Bishop Pearce observes, in such kind of phrases, signifying the same thing; because eternity conquers all things: and accordingly, in 2 Sam. ii. 26. where the Septuagint have μὴ ὡς νικῶς καταρῶν ἢ πομπῶν; our English version has Shall the sword devour FOR EVER? And the same may be seen in Job xxxiv. 7. 2 Sam. v. 20. Amos i. 11. and viii. 7. from which authority the bishop translated the clause here Death is swallowed up FOR EVER.

Death is here personified, and represented as a devouring being, swallowing up all the generations of men; and, by the resurrection of the body, and the destruction of the empire of death, God is represented as swallowing him up: or that eternity gulps him down; so that he is endlessly lost and absorbed in its illimitable waste. How glorious a time to the righteous, when the inhabitant shall no more say, I am sick; when God shall have wiped away all tears from off all faces, and when there shall be no more death. This time must come. Hallelujah! The Lord God omnipotent reigneth.

Verse 55. O death, where is thy sting? O grave where is thy victory? Πῶς σου θάνατος, το κρηττον; πῶς σου ἄδης το νικος; These words are generally supposed to be taken from Hos. xii. 14. where the Hebrew text stands thus: אֲנִי אֶחֱי עִי אֶחֱי אֶחֱי אֶחֱי אֶחֱי ehi debareyca mavath; ehi kutabca shoel: which we translate, O death! I will be thy plagues; O grave! I will be thy destruction; and which the Septuagint translate very nearly as the apostle, πῶς σου θάνατος; πῶς το κρηττον σου ἄδης; O death where is thy revenge, or judicial process? O grave where is thy sting? And it may be remarked, that almost all the MSS. Versions, and many of the Fathers, interchange the two members of this sentence, as they appear in the Septuagint, attributing victory to Death; and the sting to Hades, or the grave: only the Septuagint, probably by mistake or corruption of copyists, have δικη, dikē, revenge, or a judicial process, for νικος, nikos, victory: a mistake which the similarity of the words, both in letters and sound, might readily produce. We may observe also, that the אֶחֱי ehi, (I will be,) of the Hebrew text, the Septuagint, and the apostle following them, have translated πῶς, where, as if the word had been written אֶחֱי ehi where, the two last letters interchanged; but אֶחֱי ehi, is rendered where in other places; and our translators, in the 16th verse of this same chapter (Hos. xiii.) render אֶחֱי מַלְאָכָה ehi malca, "I will be thy king," but have this note in the margin, "Rather, where is thy king? King Hosea being then in prison." The apostle, therefore, and the Septuagint, are sufficiently vindicated by the use of the word elsewhere; and the best Jewish commentators allow this use of the word. The Targum, Syriac, Arabic, Vulgate, and some MSS. of Kennicott, and De Rossi confirm this reading.

Having vindicated the translation, it is necessary to inquire into the meaning of the apostle's expressions. Both Death and Hades are here personified; death is represented as having a sting, dagger, or goad, by which, like the driver of oxen, he is continually irritating and urging on; these irritations are the diseases by which men are urged on till they fall into hades, the empire of death. To hades, victory is attributed, having overcome and conquered all human life, and subdued all to its own emp.re. By the transposition of these two members of the sentence, the victory is given to Death, who has extinguished all human life; and the sting is given to Hades as in his empire, the evil of death is fully displayed by the extinction of all animal life, and the destruction of all human bodies. We have often seen a personification of death in ancient paintings; a skeleton crowned, with a dart in his hand; probably taken from the apostle's description. The Jews represent the angel of death as having a sword, from which deadly drops of gall fall into the mouths of all men.

Hades, which we here translate grave is generally understood to be the place of separate spirits. See the note on Matt. xi. 23.

Verse 56. The sting of death is sin] The apostle explains himself particularly here: Death could not have entered into the world if sin had not entered first: it was sin that not only introduced death, but has armed him with all his destroying force; the goad or dagger of death is sin; by this, both body and soul are slain.

The strength of sin is the law] The law of God forbids all transgression, and sentences those who commit it, to temporal and eternal death. Sin has its controlling and binding power from the law. The law *curse*s the transgressor, and provides no help for him; and if nothing else intervene, he must, through it, continue ever under the empire of death.

Verse 37. But thanks be to God] What the law could not do, because it is law, and law cannot provide pardon, is done by the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; he has died to slay death: he has risen again to bring mankind from under the empire of Hades. All this he has done through his mere unmerited mercy; and eternal thanks are due to God for this unspeakable gift. He has given us the victory over sin, Satan, death, the grave, and hell.

Verse 58. Be ye steadfast] Ἐσθῆσο, from ἕσθω, a seat; be settled, confide in the truth of this doctrine of the resurrection, and every thing that pertains to it, as confidently as a man sits down on a SEAT, which he knows to be solid, firm, and safe; and on which he has often sat.

Unmoveable] ἀμετακίνητος, from a negative; and μετακίνητος, to move away; let nothing shake your faith: let nothing move you away from this hope of the Gospel, which is given unto you. What I tell you, I receive from God; your false teachers cannot say so: in a declaration of God you may unshakenly confide.

Always abounding in the work of the Lord] The work of the Lord is obedience to his holy word; every believer in Christ is a workman of God. He that works not, to bring glory to God, and good to man, is not acknowledged as a servant of Christ: and, if he be not a servant, he is not a son; and if not a son, then not an heir. And he must not only work, but abound in that work; ever exceeding his former self; and this, not for a time, but always; beginning, continuing, and ending every act of life to God's glory, and the good of his fellows.

Your labour is not in vain] Your labour in the Lord, is not in vain: you must not only work, but you must labour, put forth all your strength; and you must work and labour in the Lord, under his direction, and by his influence; for, without Him, you can do nothing. And this labour cannot be in vain; you shall have a resurrection unto eternal life: not because you have laboured, but because Christ died, and gave you grace to be faithful.

1. The chapter through which the reader has passed, is a chapter of great importance and difficulty; and, on its difficulties, much has been written in the preceding notes. Though I have used all the helps in my power to guide me in explaining it, I have, upon the whole, been obliged to think for myself, and claim only the praise of severe labour, ever directed by honest intention; and an earnest desire to find out the truth.

2. There are many questions connected with the doctrine of the resurrection, which I could not introduce here, without writing a book, instead of short notes on a very long chapter. On such subjects, I again beg leave to direct the reader to Mr. Samuel Drew's Essay on that subject.

3. One remark I cannot help making: the doctrine of the resurrection, appears to have been thought of much more consequence among the primitive Christians than it is now! How is this? The apostles were continually insisting on it, and exciting the followers of God to diligence, obedience, and cheerfulness, through it. And their successors in the present day seldom mention it! So apostles preached; and so primitive Christians believed: so we preach, and so our hearers believe. There is not a doctrine in the Gospel on which more stress is laid: and there is not a doctrine in the present system of preaching which is treated with more neglect!

4. Though all men shall rise again: yet it will be in widely different circumstances: some will rise to glory and honour; others, to shame and everlasting contempt. Those alone who here received the salvation of God, and continued faithful unto death, shall have a resurrection to everlasting glory; not every believer, but every loving, obedient believer, shall enter into the Paradise of God; and have a body fashioned like unto his Lord's glorious body.

5. All glorified spirits will not have the same degree of glory. Two things will necessarily cause great difference: 1. The quantum of mind: and, 2. The quantum of grace.

(1.) It is idle to suppose that God has made all human souls with the same capacities: he has not. There is an infinite diversity; he who has the greatest mind, can know most, do most, suffer most, and enjoy most.

(2.) The quantum of grace will be another great cause of diversity in glory. He who received most of Christ here, and was most devoted to his service, shall have the nearest approach to him in his own kingdom. But all equally holy, and equally faithful souls, shall not have equal degrees of glory, for the glory will be according to the capacity of the mind, as well as the degree of grace and improvement. The greater the capacity, provided it be properly influenced by the grace of Christ, the greater will be the enjoyment.

6. That there will be great diversity in the states of glorified saints is the apostle's doctrine; and he illustrates it by the different degrees of splendour between the sun, moon, planets, and stars. This needs little application. There are some of the heavenly bodies that give heat, light, and splendour, as the SUN; and are of the utmost service to the world: some that give light, and comparative splendour, without heat, as the MOON; and yet are of very great use to mankind: others again, which give a steady but not a splendid light, as the PLANETS; and are serviceable in their particular spheres: and, lastly, others which twinkle in their respective systems, as the stars of different magnitudes.

7. One star, says the apostle, differs from another in glory, i. e. in splendour, according to what is called their different magnitudes. I will state a remarkable fact: The northern and southern hemispheres of the heavens, have been divided into 102 constellations, and in these constellations professor Bode has set down the places of 17,240 stars; simple, nebulous, conglomerate, and double.—The stars have been distinguished by their apparent magnitudes, or rather splendour, into stars of the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, &c. magnitudes: of these 17,240, only sixteen are, by astronomers in general, agreed to be of the first magnitude; all of which are set down in the following catalogue; with some of those that are remarkable in the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth magnitudes. The reader will observe, that the name of the constellation, or star, is first mentioned: the Greek letters, &c. are those by which they are distinguished on maps and globes; and they are, by astronomers, referred to by these letters and numbers.

8. This subject, as far as it concerns the present place, admits of few remarks or reflections. It has already been observed, that, of all the stars which our best astronomers have been able to describe and lay down in tables and maps, only sixteen are of the first magnitude; i. e. appear more luminous than any other stars in the firmament: some indeed increase the number to twenty-one, by taking in Castor and Pollux, the upper pointer, Alteer in the Engle, and β in the ship Argo, which I have placed among those of the second magnitude, because astronomers are not agreed on the subject, some ranking them with stars of the first magnitude; others, with stars of the second.

The reader is probably amazed at the paucity of large stars in the whole firmament of heaven! Will he permit me to carry his mind a little further, and either stand astonished at, or deplore with me the fact, that, out of the millions of Christians in the vicinity and splendour of the eternal Sun of righteousness, how very few are found of the first order! How very few can stand examination by the test laid down in the 13th chapter of this epistle! How very few love God with all their heart, soul, mind, and strength; and their neighbour as themselves! How few mature Christians are found in the church! How few are in all things living for eternity! How little light, how little heat, and how little influence and activity are to be found among them that bear the name of Christ! How few stars of the first magnitude will the Son of God have to deck the crown of his glory! Few are striving to excel in righteousness; and it seems to be a principal concern with many, to find out how little grace they may have, and yet escape hell! How little conformity to the will of God they may have, and yet get to heaven? In the fear of God I register this testimony, that I have perceived it to be the labour of many to lower the standard of Christianity; and to soften down, or explain away, those promises of God that himself has linked with duties; and because they know that they cannot be saved by their good works, they are contented to have no good works at all: and thus the necessity of Christian obedience, and Christian holiness, makes no prominent part of some modern creeds. Let all those who retain the apostolic doctrine, that the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin in this life, press every believer to go on to perfection; and expect to be saved, while here below, into the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Jesus. To all such, my soul says, labour to show yourselves approved unto God; workmen that need not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth; and may the pleasure of the Lord prosper in your hands!—Amen.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE FOLLOWING TABLE.

The five stars of the second magnitude in the annexed list, marked with an asterisk, are, by some writers, denominated of the first magnitude; and those named of the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth magnitudes, (the stars of the last-mentioned order being barely visible to the naked eye,) are such as the moon can occult, or make a near appulse to; except the last sixteen, in the column of stars of the third magnitude, and the last twenty-nine in that of the sixth magnitude, which never set in the latitude of London. The stars Algol and o Ceti, are set down according to their brightest appearance; the former varying from the second to the fourth magnitude every two days, 20 hours, 48 minutes, 58 seconds, 18 thirds, and 25 fourths; and the latter, from the second to the seventh, and sometimes to the tenth, every 331 days and 104 hours. The stars of the first magnitude, Capella and Lyra, never set in the latitude of London: Acharnar, Canopus, β in Argo, and α in the Cross and Centaur, never rise. Of the stars of the second magnitude, in the following list, β in Medusa's head, or Algol, α in Perseus, the Two Pointers, the Dragon's tail, and the Swan's tail, never set; the head of the Phoenix, and the bright star in the Crane, never rise. The stars marked with an asterisk in the third column, are between the third and fourth magnitudes; and those in the last column, with the same mark, are between the fifth and sixth magnitudes. Stars fainter than those of the sixth magnitude, cannot be discerned without the help of a glass, and are therefore called telescopic. The α in the tail of the Dragon is marked by Bode of the third magnitude, and the β in the same constellation of the second.

CHAPTER XVI.

The apostle exhorts the Corinthians to make a contribution for the relief of the poor Christians at Jerusalem; and directs to the best mode of doing it, 1—4. Promises to pay them a visit after Pentecost, 5—9. Gives directions about the treatment of Timothy and Apollos, 10—12. And concerning watchfulness, &c. 13, 14. Commends the house of Stephanas, and expresses his satisfaction at the visit paid him by Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, 15—18. Sends the salutations of different persons, 19—21. Shows the awful state of those who were enemies to Christ, 22. And concludes the Epistle with the apostolical benediction, 23, 24.

NOTES ON CHAP. XVI.

Verse 1. The collection for the saints Πηρη—της λεητας, from λεηται, to gather, or collect; translated by the Vulgate, de collectis, a contribution made by the rich for the relief of the poor. The Christians living at Jerusalem, we may naturally suppose, were greatly straitened: as the enmity of their countrymen to the Gospel of Christ led them to treat those who professed it, with cruelty, and spoil them of their goods. See Heb. x. 34. and Rom. xv. 26.; and see the note on the 27th verse of that chapter; and the apostle hereby teaches that it was the duty of one Christian congregation to help another when in distress.

Verse 2. Upon the first day of the week] The apostle prescribes the most convenient and proper method of making this contribution. 1. Every man was to feel it his duty to succour his brethren in distress. 2. He was to do this according to the ability which God gave him. 3. He was to do this at the conclusion of the week, when he had cast up his weekly earnings; and had seen how much God had prospered his labour. 4. He was then to bring it on the first day of the week, as is most likely, to the church or assembly, that it might be put in the common treasury. 5. We learn from this, that the weekly contribution could not be always the same, as each man was to lay by as God had prospered him: now some weeks he would gain more; others, less. 6. It appears from the whole, that the first day of the week, which is the Christian Sabbath, was the day on which their principal religious meetings were held in Corinth, and the churches of Galatia; and, consequently, in all other places where Christianity had prevailed. This is a strong argument for the keeping of the Christian Sabbath. 7. We may observe, that the apostle follows here the rule of the synagogue; it was a regular custom among the Jews, to make their collections for the poor on the Sabbath-day, that they might not be without the necessaries of life, and might not be prevented there be no gatherings when I come.

3 And when I come, whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters, them will I send to bring your liberality unto Jerusalem.

4 And if it be meet that I go also, they shall go with me.

from coming to the synagogue. 8. For the purpose of making this provision, they had a purse which was called אָרְנֵקִי אֶרְנֵקִי shel tsidekah, "The purse of the alms," or what we would term the poor's box. This is what the apostle seems to mean, when he says, Let him lay by him in store; let him put it in the alms purse, or in the poor's box. 9. It was a maxim also with them, that, if they found any money, they were not to put it in their private purse, but in that which belonged to the poor. 10. The pious Jews believed that, as salt seasoned food, so did alms, riches; and that he who did not give alms of what he had, his riches should be dispersed. The moth would corrupt the bags, and the canker corrode the money, unless the mass was sanctified by giving a part to the poor.

Verse 3. Whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters] Why should Paul require letters of approbation in behalf of certain persons, when he himself should be among them, and could have their characters vidæ voce? It is probable that he refers here to the letters of recommendation which they had sent to him, while he was away; and he now promises, that, when he should come to Corinth, he would appoint these persons whom they had recommended, to carry the alms to Jerusalem. If δουλοῦντες, be read ye shall have approved, as Bp. Pearce does, the difficulty will vanish.

Some MSS. and several Versions, join δουλοῦντες, by letters, to the following words; and read the verse thus: When I come, those whom ye shall approve, I will send with letters to bring your liberality to Jerusalem. This seems most natural.

Verse 4. And if it be meet, &c.] If it be a business that requires my attendance, and it be judged proper for me to go to Jerusalem, I will take those persons for my companions. On the delicacy with which St. Paul managed the business of a collection for the poor, Arch-deacon Paley makes the following appropriate remarks:—

way: but I trust to tarry a while with-you, * if the Lord permit.

8 But I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost.

9 For a great door and effectual is opened unto me, and there are many adversaries.

10 Now, if Timotheus come, see

* Acts 19. 21. 2 Cor. 1. 16.—Acts 15. 9. & 17. 15. & 21. 5. Rom. 15. 24. 2 Cor. 1. 16.—Acts 18. 21.

"The following observation will satisfy us concerning the purity of our apostle's conduct in the suspicious business of a pecuniary contribution.

"1st. He disclaims the having received any inspired authority for the directions which he is giving: 'I speak not by commandment, but by occasion of the forwardness of others, and to prove the sincerity of your love.' (2 Cor. chap. viii. 8.) Who, that had a sinister purpose to answer by the recommending of subscriptions, would thus distinguish, and thus lower the credit of his own recommendation?

"2d. Although he asserts the general right of Christian ministers to a maintenance from their ministry, yet he protests against the making use of this right in his own person: 'Even so hath the Lord ordained, that they which preach the Gospel, should live of the Gospel; but I have used none of these things; neither have I written these things that it should be done so unto me; for it were better for me to die, than that any man should make my glorying, i. e. my professions of disinterestedness, void.' (1. Cor. chap. ix. 14, 15.)

"3d. He repeatedly proposes that there should be associates with himself in the management of the public bounty; not colleagues of his own appointment, but persons elected for that purpose by the contributors themselves. 'And when I come, whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters, them will I send to bring your liberality unto Jerusalem; and if it be meet that I go also, they shall go with me.' (1 Cor. chap. xvi. 3, 4.) And in the second epistle, what is here proposed, we find actually done, and done for the very purpose of guarding his character against any imputation that might be brought upon it, in the discharge of a pecuniary trust: 'And we have sent with him the brother, whose praise is in the Gospel, throughout all the churches; and not that only, but who was also chosen of the churches to travel with us with this grace, (gift,) which is administered by us to the glory of the same Lord, and the declaration of your ready mind: avoiding this, that no man should blame us in this abundance which is administered by us; providing for things honest, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men:' i. e. not resting in the consciousness of our own integrity, but, in such a subject, careful also to approve our integrity to the public judgment. (2 Cor. chap. viii. 18—21.)" Horæ Paulinæ, p. 95.

Verse 5. I will come unto you when I shall pass through Macedonia] St. Paul was now at Ephesus; for, almost all allow, in opposition to the subscription, at the end of this epistle, that states it to have been written from Philippi, that it was written from Ephesus; and this is supported by many strong arguments; and the 8th verse here seems to put it past all question: I will tarry at Ephesus, i. e. I am in Ephesus, and here I purpose to remain until Pentecost. Though Macedonia was not in the direct way from Ephesus to Corinth, yet the apostle intended to make it in his way. And it was because it was not in the direct road, but lay at the upper end of the Ægean Sea, and very far out of his direct line, that he says I do pass through Macedonia; I have purposed to go thither before I go to Corinth.

Verse 6. Yea, and winter with you] He purposed to stay till Pentecost, at Ephesus; after that, to go to Macedonia, and probably to spend the summer there; and come in the autumn to Corinth, and there spend the winter.

That ye may bring me on my journey] That ye may furnish me with the means of travelling. It appears that, in most cases, the different churches paid his expenses to other churches: where this was not done, then he laboured at his business, to acquire the means of travelling.

Verse 7. I will not see you now by the way] From Ephesus to Corinth, was merely across the Ægean Sea, and comparatively a short passage.

Verse 8. I will tarry at Ephesus] And it is very probable that he did so; and that all these journeys were taken as he himself had projected. See on ver. 5.

Verse 9. A great door and effectual is opened] Θυρα γὰρ μοι ἀνεῳγὴ μεγάλη, καὶ ἐνεργὴ, a great and energetic door is opened unto me: that is, God has made a grand opening to me in those parts, which I perceive will require much labour; and besides, I shall have many adversaries to oppose me. So Bp. Pearce understands the word ἀνεῳγὴ, not as signifying effectual, but as implying full of labour. Door, often signifies occasion or opportunity; but here the apostle may allude to the throwing open of the great doors of the Circus Maximus, before the chariot races began; and the many adversaries, may refer to the numerous competitors in those races.

God gave him a grand opportunity to preach the Gospel; but he was not to expect that either Satan, or wicked men, would leave him unmolested.

Verse 10. Now, if Timotheus come] Of Timothy we have heard before, chap. iv. 17. And we learn from Acts xix. 22. that Paul sent him with Erastus, from Ephesus to Macedonia. It mended does not imply obedience, but kind and courteous demeanour, Kypke vindicates this sense of the word from Eph. v. 21. 1 Pet. v. 5.

Verse 17. I am glad of the coming of Stephanas, &c.] It was by these that the Corinthians had sent that letter to the apostle, to answer which was a main part of the design of St. Paul in this epistle.

Fortunatus] This man is supposed to have survived St. Paul; and to be the same mentioned by Clement in his Epistle to the Corinthians, sect. 59. as the bearer of that epistle from Clement at Rome, to the Christians at Corinth.

For that which was lacking on your part] This may either refer to additional communications, besides those contained in the letter which the Corinthians sent to the apostle; which additional circumstances were furnished by the persons above, and from them St. Paul had a fuller account of their spiritual state than was contained in the letter: or to some contributions on their part, for the support of the apostle in his peregrinations and labours.

Verse 18. They have refreshed my spirit and yours] They have been a means of contributing greatly to my comfort, and what contributes to my comfort, must increase yours. This is probably the meaning of the apostle.

Therefore acknowledge ye them] Pay them particular respect; and let all be held in esteem in proportion to their work and usefulness. When this is made the rule of respect and esteem, then foolish and capricious attachments will have no place. A man will then be honoured in proportion to his merit; and his merit will be estimated by his usefulness among men.

Verse 19. The churches of Asia salute you] i. e. The churches in Asia Minor. Ephesus was in this Asia, and it is clear from this, that the apostle was not at Philippi; had he been at Philippi, as the subscription states, he would have said, the churches of MACEDONIA, not the churches of ASIA, salute you. How these places lay, in reference to each other, the reader will at once perceive, by consulting the Map in Acts.

Aquila and Priscilla] Of these eminent persons we have heard before: See Acts xviii. 2, 18, 26, and Rom. xvi. 3.

With the church that is in their house.] That is, the company of believers who generally worshipped there. There were no churches or chapels at that time built; and the assemblies of Christians were necessarily held in private houses. It appears, that Aquila and Priscilla devoted their house to this purpose. The house of Philemon was of the same kind, Philem. ver. 2. So was likewise the house of Nymphas, Coloss. iv. 15. See the note on Rom. xvi. 5.

Verse 20. With a holy kiss] The ancient patriarchs, and the Jews in general, were accustomed to kiss each other whenever they met; and this was a token of friendship and peace with them, as shaking of hands is with us. The primitive Christians naturally followed this example of the Jews. See the note on Rom. xvi. 16.

Verse 21. The salutation of me Paul with mine own hand.] This should be rendered, "The salutation is written by the hand of me Paul;" ἡ χαιρεταὶ, is written, being understood. It is very likely that the apostle wrote this and the following verses with his own hand. The rest, though dictated by him, was written by an amanuensis.

Verse 22. If any man love not the Lord Jesus] This is directed immediately against the Jews.—From chap. xii. 3. we find that the Jews who pretended to be under the Spirit and teaching of God, called Jesus, anathema, or accursed; i. e. a person who should be devoted to destruction: see the note there. In this place, the apostle reborts the whole upon themselves, and says, If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema, accursed, and devoted to destruction. This is not said in the way of a wish or imprecation, but as a prediction of what would certainly come upon them if they did not repent; and of what did come on them because they did not repent; but continued to hate and execrate the Lord Jesus: and of what still lies upon them, because they continue to hate and execrate the Redeemer of the world.

It is generally allowed, that the apostle refers here to some of the modes of excommunication among the Jews, of which there were three, viz.

1. Niddui, נִדְּבִי, which signified a simple separation or exclusion of a man from the synagogue, and from his wife and family, for THIRTY days.

2. Cherem, כֶּרֶם which was inflicted on him who had borne the Niddui; and who had not, in the thirty days, made proper compensation, in order to be reconciled to the synagogue. This was inflicted with dire execrations, which he was informed must all come upon him if he did not repent: but the Cherem always supposed place for repentance.

3. Schammatha, ~~was~~: this was the direst of all, and cut off all hope of reconciliation and repentance; after which, the man was neither reconcilable to the synagogue, nor acknowledged as belonging even to the Jewish nation. See these different forms in Buxtorf's Rabbinical and Talmudical Lexicon, under their respective words.

In the lexicon just now quoted, Buxtorf gives a form of the Cherem, which he says he copied from an ancient Hebrew MS. Of this awful piece I shall lay a translation before the reader.

"By the sentence of the Lord of lords, let P. the son of P. be anathematized in both houses of judgment, the superior and inferior. Let him be anathematized among the highest saints; let him be anathematized among the Seraphim and Ophanim: and, finally, let him be anathematized by all the congregations of the great and the small! Let great and continued plagues rest upon him: with great and horrible diseases! Let his house be the habitation of dragons! and let his constellation be darkened in the clouds! Let him be for indignation, and wrath, and burning! Let his carcass be thrown to the wild beasts and serpents! Let his enemies, and his adversaries, triumph over him! Let his silver and gold be given to others! And let all his children be exposed at the doors of their enemies! And let posterity be astonished at his day! Let him be accursed by the mouth of Addiriron and Achtariel; by the mouth of Sandalphon and Hadraniel; by the mouth of Ansiel and Patchiel; by the mouth of Seraphiel and Sagan-sael; by the mouth of Michael and Gabriel; by the mouth of Raphael and Mesaretiel! Let him be anathematized by the mouth of Zafzavif and by the mouth of Hafavif, who is the great God; and by the mouth of the seventy names of the Supreme King; and, lastly, by the mouth of Tsoriak, the great chancellor.

"Let him be swallowed up like Korah and his companions! Let his soul depart with fear and terror! Let the chiding of the Lord slay him! Let him be confounded as Achitophel was in his counsel! Let the leprosy of Gehazi be his leprosy! and let there be no resurrection of his ruins! In the sepulchres of the children of Israel, let him not be buried! Let his wife be given to another; and let others bow themselves upon her in his death! In this anathema, let P. the son of P. be; and let this be his inheritance! But upon me, and upon all Israel, may God extend his peace and blessing, Amen." To this is added the 18th., 19th., and 20th verses of Deut. xxix. which the reader may read at his leisure.

b Ch. 1. 16. Ver. 15.

There are many things in this Cherem which require a comment, but this is not the place.

Anathema, Maranatha. "Let him be accursed; our Lord cometh." I cannot see the reason why these words were left untranslated. The former is Greek, and has been already explained; the latter is Syriac [ܡܪܢܐ] maranatha, our Lord is coming; i. e. to execute the judgment denounced. Does not the apostle refer to the last verse in the Bible? Let I come and smite the land. (כּרַח cherem.) with a curse? And does he not intimate that the Lord was coming to smite the Jewish land with that curse? Which took place a very few years after, and continues on that gainsaying and rebellious people to the present day. What the apostle has said, was prophetic, and indicative of what was about to happen to that people. God was then coming to inflict punishment upon them: He came; and they were broken and dispersed.

Verse 23. The grace of our Lord Jesus] May the favour, influence, mercy, and salvation procured by Jesus Christ, be with you! prevail amongst you, rule in you, and be exhibited by you, in your life and conversation! Amen.

Verse 24. My love be with you all in Christ Jesus] It appears exceedingly strange, that the apostle should say, My love be with you! as he said, The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. We can easily conceive what the latter means: the grace of Christ is an active, powerful, saving principle; it is essential to the existence of the Christian church, that this grace should be ever with it: and, without this grace, no individual can be saved. But what could the love of the apostle do with them? Has it any meaning? I confess I can see none, unless it be intended to say, I love you; or, I continue to love you. The pronoun μω, my, is wanting in the Codex Alexandrinus, and in 73. an excellent MS. in the Vatican, written about the eleventh century. This will help us to a better sense; for it either says, May love prevail among you! or, supplying the word Θεω, God, as in 2 Cor. xiii. 13. The love of God, be with you! This gives a sound sense; for the love of God is as much a principle of light, life, and salvation, as the grace of Christ. And probably ΜΟΥ, my, is a corruption for ΘΕΟΥ, God. And this is the more likely, because he uses this very form in the conclusion of his second epistle to this church, as we have seen above. I conclude, therefore, that the reading of the two MSS. above, is the true reading; or else that μω is a corruption for Θεω, and that the verse should be read thus, The love of God be with you all, in (or by) Christ Jesus.

Amen.] So be it: but this word is wanting in most MSS. of repute; and certainly was not written by the apostle.

1. The subscription to this epistle, in our common English Bibles, and in the common editions of the Greek text, is palpably absurd. That it was not written from Philippi, but from Ephesus, see the notes on ver. 5, 8, 10, and 19. and that it could not be "written by Silvanus, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus, and Timotheus;" needs no proof. But this subscription is wanting in all the best MSS. and Versions, either in whole or in part. In some, it is simply said, The first to the Corinthians; in others, The first to the Corinthians is finished;—written from Ephesus,—from Asia,—from Ephesus of Asia,—from Philippi of Macedonia,—from Philippi of Macedonia, and sent by the hands of Timotheus, so the SYRIAC. Written from Ephesus, by Stephanus and Fortunatus, COPTIC. Written from Philippi by Stephanus and Fortunatus, and Achaicus, SLAVONIC. Written, &c. by Paul and Sotheneus. Written from the city of Philippi, and sent by Stephanus, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus, and Timotheus, ARABIC. There are other variations which need not be set down. Those only appear to be correct that state the epistle to have been sent from Ephesus; of which there can be no reasonable doubt.

2. In closing my observations on this epistle, I feel it necessary, once more, to call the reader's attention to the many difficulties contained in it, as an excuse for any thing he may find handled in an unsatisfactory manner. Perhaps it will be of little consequence for him to know, that this epistle has cost more labour and difficulty than any portion of the same quantity which I have yet passed over, either in the Old or New Testament.

3. It has been already noticed, that the church at Corinth had written to the apostle for advice, direction, and information on a variety of points; and that this epistle is in the main an answer to the epistle from Corinth. Had we that epistle, all difficulty would vanish in this: but, as the apostle only refers to their questions, by mere catch words from their letter, it is impossible to know, in all cases, what the questions contained; to them the answers would be clear, because they knew on what they consulted him: to us the answers must be as they really are, in some cases, necessarily obscure, because we know not the whole bearing and circumstances of the questions. Indeed the epistle contains more local matter, and more matter of private application, than any other in the New Testament; and there is in it, on the whole, less matter for general use, than in most other parts of the sacred writings. Yet it is both very curious and useful; it gives insight into several customs, and not a few forms of speech, and matters relative to the discipline of the primitive church, which we can find nowhere else; and it reads a very awful lesson to those who disturb the peace of society, make schisms in the church of Christ, and endeavour to set up one preacher at the expense of another.

4. It shows us also, how many improper things may, in a state of ignorance, or Christian infancy, be consistent with a sincere belief in the Gospel of Christ; and a conscientious and zealous attachment to it.

5. In different parts of the epistle we find the apostle speaking very highly of the knowledge of this church; and its various gifts and endowments. How then can we say that its blemishes arose from ignorance? I answer that, certainly, only a few of the people at Corinth could possess those eminent spiritual qualifications; because the things that are attributed to this church, in other places, are utterly inconsistent with that state of grace for which the apostle, in other places, appears to give them credit, the solution of the difficulty is this: there were in the church at Corinth, many highly gifted, and very gracious people; there were also there many more, which, though they might have been partakers of some extraordinary gifts, had very little of that religion which the apostle describes in the thirteenth chapter of this epistle.

6. Besides, we must not suppose that eminent endowments necessarily imply gracious dispositions. A man may have much light, and little love: he may be very wise in secular matters: and know but little of himself, and less of his God. There is as truly a learned ignorance, as there is a refined and useful learning. One of our old writers said, "Knowledge that is not applying, is only like a candle which a man holds to light himself to hell." The Corinthians abounded in knowledge, and science, and eloquence, and various extraordinary gifts; but, in many cases, distinctly enough marked in this epistle, they were grossly ignorant of the genius and design of the Gospel. Many, since their time, have put words and observances in place of the weightier matters of the LAW; and the spirit of the GOSPEL. The apostle has taken great pains to correct these abuses among the Corinthians, and to insist on that great, unchangeable, and eternal truth, that love to God and man, filling the heart, hallowing the passions, regulating the affections, and producing universal benevolence and beneficence, is the fulfilling of all law; and that all professions, knowledge, gifts, &c. without this, are absolutely useless. And did this epistle contain no more than what is found in the 13th chapter, yet that would be an unparalleled monument of the apostle's deep acquaintance with God; and an invaluable record of the sum and substance of the Gospel, left by God's mercy to the church; as a touch-stone for the trial of creeds, confessions of faith, and ritual observances, to the end of the world.

7. I have often had occasion to note, that the whole epistle refers so much to Jewish affairs, customs, forms of speech, ceremonies, &c. that it necessarily supposes the people to have been well acquainted with them: from this I infer, that a great majority of the Christian church at Corinth, was composed of converted Jews; and it is likely that this was the case in all the churches of Asia Minor and Greece. Many Gentiles were undoubtedly brought to the knowledge of the truth; but the chief converts were from among the Hellenistic Jews. In many respects, Jewish phraseology prevails more in this epistle than even in that to the Romans. Without attention to this, it would be impossible to make any consistent sense out of the 15th chapter, where the apostle treats so largely on the doctrine of the resurrection; as almost every form and turn of expression, is JEWISH; and we must know what ideas they, attached to such words and forms of speech, in order to enter into the spirit of the apostle's meaning. His ignorance of this, caused a late eminent writer and philosopher, to charge the apostle with "inconsistent reasoning." Had he understood the apostle's language, he would not have said so: and, as he did not understand it, he should have said nothing. A man may be qualified to make great and useful discoveries in the doctrine of gases, or fictitious airs; who may be ill qualified to elucidate the meaning of the Holy Spirit.

8. Before I finish my concluding observations on this epistle, I must beg leave to call the reader's attention once more, to the concluding words of the apostle, If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema, Maranatha. These words have been as often misunderstood, and perhaps as dangerously applied, as another passage in this epistle, He that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, &c. Though I am ready to grant that the bad Christian, i. e. the man who professes Christianity, and yet lives under the power of sin, is in a very dangerous state; and that he, who, while he credits Christianity, is undecided as to the public part he should take in its profession and practice, is putting his eternal interests to the most awful hazard; yet I must also grant, that the meaning generally put on the words in question, is not correct. The words apply to the gainsaying and blasphemous Jews; to those who were calling Christ Anathema, or accursed; and cannot be applied to any person who respects his name, or confides in him for his salvation: much less do they apply to him, who finds through the yet prevalence of evil in his heart, and the power of temptation, that he has little, and, to his own apprehension, no love to the Lord Jesus. The Anathema of the apostle is denounced against him only who gives the Anathema to Christ. Of this, not one of my readers is capable. It is the duty of all to love Him with an undivided heart; if any be not yet able to do it, let him not be discouraged; if the Lord cometh to execute judgment on him who calleth Jesus accursed, he cometh also to fulfil the desire of them who fear him; to make them partake of the Divine Nature, and so cleanse their hearts by the inspiration of his Holy Spirit, that they shall perfectly love him, and worthily magnify his name.

END OF THE FIRST EPISTLE.

INTRODUCTION

SECOND EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

FOR an account of Corinth, the reader is referred to the Preface to the first epistle; where every thing relative to the geographical, political, and religious situation of that celebrated city, as far as such subjects are proper for a work of this kind, is amply detailed.

As I have borrowed from the learned and accurate Archdeacon Paley, several arguments to prove the authenticity of the first epistle; and the same able writer having bestowed equal pains on the second, I shall make those extracts which bear particularly on the subject; referring my reader to the work itself, for ampler information.

SECTION I.

I WILL not say that it is impossible, having seen the First Epistle to the Corinthians, to construct a second with ostensible allusions to the first; or that it is impossible that both should be fabricated, so as to carry on an order and continuation of story, by successive references to the same events. But I say, that this, in either case, must be the effect of craft and design. Whereas, whoever examines the allusions to the former epistle which he finds in this, whilst he will acknowledge them to be such as would rise spontaneously to the hand of the writer, from the very subject of the correspondence, and the situation of the corresponding parties, supposing these to be real, will see no particle of reason to suspect, either that the clauses containing these allusions were insertions for the purpose, or that the several transactions of the Corinthian church were feigned, in order to form a train of narrative, or to support the appearance of connexion between the two epistles.

1. In the first epistle, St. Paul announces his intention of passing through Macedonia, in his way to Corinth; "I will come to you when I shall pass through Macedonia." In the second epistle, we find him arrived in Macedonia, and about to pursue his journey to Corinth. But observe the manner in which this is made to appear: "I know the forwardness of your mind, for which I boast of you to them of Macedonia, that Achaia was ready a year ago, and your zeal hath provoked very many: yet have I sent the brethren, lest our boasting of you should be in vain in this behalf; that, as I said, ye may be ready; lest, haply, if they of Macedonia come with me, and find you unprepared, we (that we say not you) be ashamed in this same confident boasting." (Chap. ix. 2, 3, 4.) St. Paul's being in Macedonia at the time of writing the epistle, is, in this passage, inferred only from his saying, that he had boasted to the Macedonians of the alacrity of his Achaian converts; and the fear which he expresses, lest, if any of the Macedonian Christians should come with him unto Achaia, they should find his boasting unwarranted by the event. The business of the contribution is the sole cause of mentioning Macedonia at all. Will it be insinuated that this passage was framed merely to state that St. Paul was now in Macedonia; and, by that statement, to produce an apparent agreement with the purpose of visiting Macedonia, notified in the first epistle? Or will it be thought probable, that, if a sophist had meant to place St. Paul in Macedonia, for the sake of giving countenance to his forgery, he would have done it in so oblique a manner as through the medium of a contribution? The same thing may be observed of another text in the epistle, in which the name of Macedonia occurs: "Furthermore, when I came to Troas to preach the Gospel, and a door was opened unto me of the Lord, I had no rest in my spirit, because I found not Titus, my brother; but taking my leave of them, I went from thence into Macedonia." I mean that it may be observed of this passage also, that there is a reason for mentioning Macedonia, entirely distinct from the purpose of showing St. Paul to be there. The text, however, in which it is most strongly implied that St. Paul wrote the present epistle from Macedonia, is found in the fourth, fifth, and sixth verses of the seventh chapter. Yet even here, I think, no one will contend, that St. Paul's coming to Macedonia, or being in Macedonia, was the principal thing intended to be told: or, that the telling of it, indeed, was any part of the intention with which the text was written; or that the mention even of the name of Macedonia was not purely incidental, in the description of those tumultuous sorrows with which the writer's mind had been lately agitated, and from which he was relieved by the coming of Titus. The first five verses of the eighth chapter, which commend the liberality of the Macedonian churches, do not, in my opinion, by themselves, prove St. Paul to have been at Macedonia at the time of writing the epistle.

2. In the first epistle, St. Paul denounces a severe censure against an incestuous marriage, which had taken place amongst the Corinthian converts, with the connivance, not to say with the approbation, of the church; and enjoins the church to purge itself of this scandal, by expelling the offender from its society, (Chap. v. 1—5.) In the second epistle, we find this sentence executed, and the offender to be so affected with the punishment, that St. Paul now intercedes for his restoration: "Sufficient for such a man is this punishment, which was inflicted of many; so that, contrariwise, ye ought rather to forgive him and comfort him, lest perhaps such a one should be swallowed up with over-much sorrow; wherefore, I beseech you, that ye would confirm your love towards him." (2 Cor. chap. ii. 7, 8.) Is this whole business feigned for the sake of carrying on a continuation of story through the two epistles? The church also, no less than the offender, was brought by St. Paul's reproof to a deep sense of the impropriety of their conduct. Their penitence and their respect to his authority, were, as might be expected, exceedingly grateful to St. Paul: "We were comforted not by Titus' coming only, but by the consolation wherewith he was comforted in you, when he told us your earnest desire, your mourning, your fervent mind towards me, so that I rejoiced the more; for, though I made you sorry with a letter, I do not repent, though I did repent: for I perceive that the same epistle made you sorry, though it were but for a season. Now I rejoice, not that ye were made sorry, but that ye sorrowed to repentance: for ye were made sorry after a godly manner, that ye might receive damage by us in nothing." (Chap. vii. 7—9.) That this passage is to be referred to the incestuous marriage, is proved by the twelfth verse of the same chapter; "Though I wrote unto you, I did it not for his cause that had done the wrong, nor for his cause that suffered wrong; but that our care for you, in the sight of God, might appear unto you." There were, it is true, various topics of blame noticed in the first epistle; but there was none, except this of the incestuous marriage, which could be called a transaction between private parties, or of which it could be said that one particular person had "done the wrong," and another particular person "had suffered it." Could all this be without foundation?

3. In the sixteenth chapter of the first epistle, a collection for the saints is recommended to be set forwards at Corinth, (Chap. xvi. 1.) In the ninth chapter of the second epistle, such a collection is spoken of, as in readiness to be received: "As touching the ministering to the saints, it is superfluous for me to write to you, for I know the forwardness of your mind, for which I boast of you to them of Macedonia, that Achaia was ready a year ago, and your zeal hath provoked very many." (Chap. ix. 1, 2.) This is such a continuation of the transaction as might be expected; or, possibly it will be said, as might easily be counterfeited; but there is a circumstance of nicety in the agreement between the two epistles, which, I am convinced, the author of a forgery would not have hit upon, or which, if he had hit upon it, he would have set forth with more clearness. The second epistle speaks of the Corinthians as having begun this eleemosynary business a year before: "This is expedient for you, who have begun before, not only to do, but also to be forward a year ago" (Chap. viii. 10.) "I boast of you to them of Macedonia, that Achaia was ready a year ago." (Chap. ix. 2.) From these texts it is evident, that something had been done in the business a year before. It appears, however, from other texts in the epistle, that the contribution was not yet collected or paid; for brethren were sent from St. Paul to Corinth, "to make up their bounty." (Chap. ix. 5.) They are urged to "perform the doing of it" (Chap. viii. 11.) "And every man was exhorted to give as he purposed in his heart." (Chap. ix. 7.) The contribution, therefore, as represented in our present epistle, was in readiness, yet not received from the contributors; was begun, was forward long before, yet not hitherto collected. Now this representation agrees with one, and only with one, supposition, namely, that every man had laid by in store, had already provided the fund, from which he was afterwards to contribute—the very case which the first epistle authorizes us to suppose to have existed; for in that epistle St. Paul had charged the Corinthians, "upon the first day of the week, every one of them, to lay by in store as God had prospered him." (1 Cor. chap. xvi. 2.)

SECTION II.

In comparing the Second Epistle to the Corinthians with the Acts of the Apostles, we are soon brought to observe, not only that there exists no vestige either of the epistle having been taken from the history, or the history from the epistle; but also that there appears in the contents of the epistle, positive evidence that neither was borrowed from the other. Titus, who bears a conspicuous part in the epistle, is not mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles at all. St. Paul's sufferings, enumerated, chap. xi. 24. "Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes, save one; thrice was I beaten with rods; once was I stoned; thrice I suffered shipwreck; a night and a day I have been in the deep," cannot be made out from his history as delivered in the Acts; nor would this account have been given by a writer, who either drew his knowledge of St. Paul from that history, or who was careful to preserve a conformity with it. The account in the epistle of St. Paul's escape from Damascus, though agreeing in the main fact with the account of the same transaction in the Acts, is related with such difference of circumstances, as renders it utterly improbable that one should be derived from the other. The two accounts, placed by the side of each other, stand as follows:

EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

2 Cor. chap. xi. 32, 33. In Damascus, the governor under Aretas the king, kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me; and through a window in a basket was I let down by the wall, and escaped his hands.

Acts, chap. ix. 23—25. And after many days were fulfilled, the Jews took counsel to kill him; but their laying in wait was known of Saul, and they watched the gates day and night to kill him: then the disciples took him by night, and let him down by the wall in a basket.

Now, if we be satisfied in general concerning these two ancient writings, that the one was not known to the writer of the other, or not consulted by him; then the accordances which may be pointed out between them, will admit of no solution so probable, as the attributing of them to truth and reality, as to their common foundation.

SECTION III.

The opening of this epistle exhibits a connexion with the history, which alone would satisfy my mind that the epistle was written by St. Paul, and by St. Paul in the situation in which the history places him. Let it be remembered, that in the nineteenth chapter of the Acts, St. Paul is represented as driven away from Ephesus; or as leaving, however, Ephesus, in consequence of an uproar in that city, excited by some interested adversaries of the new religion. "Great is Diana of the Ephesians—and after the uproar was ceased, Paul called unto him the disciples, and embraced them, and departed for to go into Macedonia." When he was arrived in Macedonia, he wrote the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, which is now before us; and he begins his epistle in this wise: "Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort, who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God, &c. For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia, that we were pressed out of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life; but we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God, which raiseth the dead, who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver; in whom we trust that he will deliver us." Nothing could be more expressive of the circumstances in which the history describes St. Paul to have been, at the time when the epistle purports to be written; or rather, nothing could be more expressive of the sensations arising from these circumstances, than this passage. It is the calm recollection of a mind emerged from the confusion of instant danger. It is that devotion and solemnity of thought, which follows a recent deliverance. There is just enough of particularity in the passage to show that it is to be referred to the tumult at Ephesus; "We would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia." And there is nothing more; no mention of Demetrius, of the seizure of St. Paul's friends, of the interference of the town-clerk, of the occasion or nature of the danger which St. Paul had escaped, or even of the city where it happened; in a word, no recital from which a suspicion could be conceived, either that the author of the epistle had made use of the narrative in the Acts: or, on the other hand, that he had sketched the outline, which the narrative in the Acts only filled up. That the forger of an epistle, under the name of St. Paul, should borrow circumstances from a history of St. Paul then extant; or, that the author of a history of St. Paul should gather materials from letters bearing St. Paul's name, may be credited: but I cannot believe that any forger whatever should fall upon an expedient so refined, as to exhibit sentiments adapted to a situation, and to leave his readers to seek out that situation from the history; still less that the author of a history should go about to frame facts and circumstances, fitted to supply the sentiments which he found in the letter.

SECTION IV.

It has already been remarked, that St. Paul's original intention was to have visited Corinth in his way to Macedonia: "I was minded to come unto you before, and to pass by you into Macedonia." (2 Cor. chap. i. 15, 16.) It has also been remarked, that he changed his intention, and ultimately resolved upon going through Macedonia first. Now upon this head there exists a circumstance of correspondency between our epistle and the history, which is not very obvious to the reader's observation; but which, when observed, will be found, I think, close and exact. Which circumstance is this: that though the change of St. Paul's intention be expressly mentioned only in the second epistle; yet it appears, both from the history and from this second epistle, that the change had taken place before the writing of the first epistle; that it appears however from neither, otherwise than by an inference, unnoticed perhaps by almost every one who does not sit down professionally to the examination.

First, then, how does this point appear from the history? In the nineteenth chapter of the Acts, and the twenty-first verse, we are told, that "Paul purposed, in the spirit, when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem. So he sent into Macedonia two of them that ministered unto him, Timotheus and Erastus; but he himself stayed in Asia for a season." A short time after this, and evidently in pursuance of the same intention, we find, (chap. xx. 1, 2.) that "Paul departed from Ephesus for to go into Macedonia; and that, when he had gone over those parts, he came into Greece." The resolution, therefore, of passing first through Macedonia, and from thence into Greece, was formed by St. Paul previously to the sending away of Timothy. The order in which the two countries are mentioned, shows the direction of his intended route, "when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia." Timothy and Erastus, who were to precede him in his progress, were sent by him from Ephesus into Macedonia. He himself a short time afterward, and, as hath been observed, evidently in continuation and pursuance of the same design, "departed for to go into Macedonia." If he had ever, therefore, entertained a different plan of his journey, which is not hinted in the history, he must have changed that plan before this time. But, from the 17th verse of the fourth chapter of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, we discover, that Timothy had been sent away from Ephesus before that epistle was written: "For this cause have I sent unto you Timotheus, who is my beloved son." The change, therefore, of St. Paul's resolution, which was prior to the sending away of Timothy, was necessarily prior to the writing of the First Epistle to the Corinthians.

Thus stands the order of dates, as collected from the history, compared with the first epistle. Now let us inquire, secondly, how this matter is represented in the epistle before us. In the sixteenth verse of the first chapter of this epistle, St. Paul speaks of the intention which he had once entertained of visiting Achaia, in his way to Macedonia: "In this confidence I was minded to come unto you before, that ye might have a second benefit: and to pass by you into Macedonia." After protesting, in the seventeenth verse, against any evil construction that might be put upon his laying aside of this intention, in the twenty-third verse he discloses the cause of it: "Moreover I call God for a record upon my soul, that, to spare you, I came not as yet unto Corinth." And then he proceeds as follows: "But I determined this with myself, that I would not come again to you in heaviness; for, if I make you sorry, who is he then that maketh me glad, but the same which is made sorry by me? And I wrote this same unto you, lest when I came I should have sorrow from them of whom I ought to rejoice; having confidence in you all, that my joy is the joy of you all; for out of much affliction and anguish of heart, I wrote unto you with many tears; not that ye should be grieved, but that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you; but if any have caused grief, he hath not grieved me but in part, that I may not over-charge you all. Sufficient to such a man is this punishment, which was inflicted of many." In this quotation, let the reader first direct his attention to the clause marked by Italics, "and I wrote this same unto you," and let him consider, whether from the context, and from the structure of the whole passage, it be not evident that this writing was after St. Paul had "determined with himself, that he would not come again to them in heaviness?" whether, indeed, it was not in consequence of this determination, or at least with this determination upon his mind? And, in the next place, let him consider, whether the sentence, "I determined this with myself, that I would not come again to you in heaviness," do not plainly refer to that postponing of his visit, to which he had alluded in the verse but one before, when he said, "I call God for a record upon my soul, that, to spare you, I came not as yet unto Corinth;" and whether this be not the visit of which he speaks in the sixteenth verse, wherein he informs the Corinthians, "that he had been minded to pass by them into Macedonia;" but that, for reasons which argued no levity or fickleness in his disposition, he had been compelled to change his purpose. If this be so, then it follows that the writing here mentioned was posterior to the change of his intention. The only question, therefore, that remains, will be, whether this writing relate to the letter which we now have under the title of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, or to some other letter not extant? And upon this question, I think Mr. Locke's observation decisive; namely, that the second clause marked in the quotation by Italics, "I wrote unto you with many tears," and the first clause so marked, "I wrote this same unto you," belong to one writing, whatever that was; and that the second clause goes on to advert to a circumstance which is found in our present First Epistle to the Corinthians; namely, the case and punishment of the incestuous person. Upon the whole, then, we see, that it is capable of being inferred, from St. Paul's own words, in the long extract which we have quoted, that the First Epistle to the Corinthians was written after St. Paul had determined to postpone his journey to Corinth; in other words, that the change of his purpose with respect to the course of his journey, though expressly mentioned only in the second epistle, had taken place before the writing of the first; the point which we made out to be implied in the history, by the order of the events there recorded, and the allusions to those events in the first epistle. Now this is a species of congruity of all others the most to be relied upon. It is not an agreement between two accounts of the same transaction, or between different statements of the same fact, for the fact is not stated; nothing that can be called an account is given; but it is the junction of two conclusions, deduced from independent sources, and deducible only by investigation and comparison.

SECTION V.

But if St. Paul had changed his purpose before the writing of the first epistle, why did he defer explaining himself to the Corinthians, concerning the reason of that change, until he wrote the second? This is a very fair question; and we are able, I think, to return to it a satisfactory answer. The real cause, and the cause at length assigned by St. Paul for postponing his visit to Corinth, and not travelling by the route which he had at first designed, was the disorderly state of the Corinthian church at the time, and the painful severities which he should have found himself obliged to exercise, if he had come amongst them during the existence of these irregularities. He was willing therefore to try, before he came in person, what a letter of authoritative oburgation would do amongst them, and to leave time for the operation of the experiment. That was his scheme in writing the first epistle. But it was not for him to acquaint them with the scheme. After the epistle had produced its effect (and to the utmost extent, as it should seem, of the apostle's hopes;) when he had wrought in them a deep sense of their fault, and an almost passionate solicitude to restore themselves to the approbation of their teacher; when Titus, (chap. vii. 6, 7, 11.) had brought him intelligence "of their earnest desire, their mourning, their fervent mind towards him, of their sorrow and their penitence; what carefulness, what clearing of themselves, what indignation,

EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

what fear, what vehement desire, what zeal, what revenge," his letter, and the general concern occasioned by it, had excited amongst them; he then opens himself fully upon the subject. The affectionate mind of the apostle is touched by this return of zeal and duty. He tells them that he did not visit them at the time proposed, lest their meeting should have been attended with mutual grief; and with grief to him embittered by the reflection, that he was giving pain to those, from whom alone he could receive comfort: "I determined this with myself, that I would not come again to you in heaviness; for, if I make you sorry, who is he that maketh me glad but the same which is made sorry by me?" (chap. ii. 1, 2.) that he had written his former epistle to warn them beforehand of their fault, "lest when he came he should have sorrow of them of whom he ought to rejoice;" (chap. ii. 3.) that he had the further view, though perhaps unperceived by them, of making an experiment of their fidelity, "to know the proof of them, whether they are obedient in all things," (chap. ii. 9.) This full discovery of his motive came very naturally from the apostle, after he had seen the success of his measures, but would not have been a seasonable communication before. The whole composes a train of sentiment and of conduct resulting from real situation, and from real circumstance; and as remote as possible from fiction or imposture.

SECTION VI.

Chap. xi. 9. "When I was present with you and wanted, I was chargeable to no man: for that which was lacking to me, the brethren which came from Macedonia supplied." The principal fact set forth in this passage, the arrival at Corinth of brethren from Macedonia during St. Paul's first residence in that city, is explicitly recorded, Acts, chap. xviii. 1, 6. "After these things Paul departed from Athens, and came to Corinth. And when Silas and Timotheus were come from Macedonia, Paul was pressed in spirit, and testified to the Jews that Jesus was Christ."

SECTION VII.

The above quotation from the Acts proves that Silas and Timotheus were assisting to St. Paul in preaching the Gospel at Corinth. With which correspond the words of the epistle (chap. i. 19.) "For the Son of God, Jesus Christ, who was preached among you by us, even by me, and Silvanus, and Timotheus, was not yea and nay, but in him was yea." I do admit that the correspondence, considered by itself, is too direct and obvious: and that an impostor, with the history before him, might, and probably would, produce agreements of the same kind. But let it be remembered, that this reference is found in a writing, which, from many discrepancies, and especially from those noted Sect. II. we may conclude, was not composed by any one who had consulted, and who pursued the history. Some observation also arises upon the variation of the name. We read Silas in the Acts, Silvanus in the epistle. The similitude of these two names, if they were the names of different persons, is greater than could easily have proceeded from accident; I mean that it is not probable, that two persons placed in situations so much alike, should bear names so nearly resembling each other. On the other hand, the difference of the name in the two passages negatives the supposition of either the passages, or the account contained in them, being transcribed from the other. That they were the same person, is further confirmed by 1 Thess. chap. i. 1. compared with Acts, chap. xvii. 10.

SECTION VIII.

Chap. ii. 12, 13. "When I came to Troas to preach Christ's Gospel, and a door was opened unto me of the Lord, I had no rest in my spirit, because I found not Titus my brother; but taking my leave of them, I went from thence into Macedonia."

To establish a conformity between this passage and the history, nothing more is necessary to be presumed, than that St. Paul proceeded from Ephesus to Macedonia, upon the same course by which he came back from Macedonia to Ephesus, or rather to Miletus, in the neighbourhood of Ephesus; in other words, that, in his journey to the peninsula of Greece, he went and returned the same way. St. Paul is now in Macedonia, where he had lately arrived from Ephesus. Our quotation imports, that in his journey he had stopt at Troas. Of this, the history says nothing, leaving us only the short account, that "Paul departed from Ephesus, for to go into Macedonia." But the history says, that in his return from Macedonia to Ephesus, "Paul sailed from Philippi to Troas! and that, when the disciples came together on the first day of the week to break bread, Paul preached unto them all night; that from Troas he went by land to Assos; from Assos, taking ship, and coasting along the front of Asia Minor, he came by Mitylene to Miletus." Which account proves, first, that Troas lay in the way by which St. Paul passed between Ephesus and Macedonia; secondly, that he had disciples there. In one journey between these two places, the epistle, and in another journey between the same places, the history makes him stop at this city. Of the first journey he is made to say, "that a door was in that city opened unto me of the Lord;" in the second, we find disciples there collected around him, and the apostle exercising his ministry, with what was even in him, more than ordinary zeal and labour. The epistle, therefore, is in this instance confirmed, if not by the terms, at least by the probability of the history; a species of confirmation by no means to be despised, because, as far as it reaches, it is evidently uncontrived.

SECTION IX.

Chap. xi. 24, 25. "Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one; thrice was I beaten with rods; once was I stoned; thrice I suffered shipwreck; a night and a day I have been in the deep."

INTRODUCTION TO THE SECOND

These particulars cannot be extracted out of the Acts of the Apostles; which proves, as hath been already observed, that the epistle was not framed from the history: yet they are consistent with it, which, considering how numerically circumstantial the account is, is more than could happen to arbitrary and independent fictions. When I say that these particulars are consistent with the history; I mean, first, that there is no article in the enumeration which is contradicted by the history; secondly, that the history, though silent with respect to many of the facts here enumerated, has left space for the existence of these facts, consistent with the fidelity of its own narration.

First, no contradiction is discoverable between the epistle and the history. When St. Paul says, thrice was I beaten with rods, although the history record only one beating with rods, viz. at Philippi, Acts xvi. 22. yet is there no contradiction. It is only the omission in one book of what is related in another. But had the history contained accounts of four beatings with rods at the time of writing this epistle, in which St. Paul says, that he had only suffered three, there would have been a contradiction properly so called. The same observation applies generally to the other parts of the enumeration, concerning which the history is silent: but there is one clause in the quotation particularly deserving of remark; because, when confronted with the history, it furnishes the nearest approach to a contradiction, without a contradiction being actually incurred, of any I remember to have met with. "Once," saith St. Paul, "was I stoned." Does the history relate that St. Paul, prior to the writing of this epistle, had been stoned more than once? The history mentions distinctly one occasion upon which St. Paul was stoned, viz. at Lystra in Lycaonia. "Then came thither certain Jews from Antioch and Iconium, who persuaded the people; and having stoned Paul, drew him out of the city, supposing he had been dead." (Chap. xiv. 19.) And it mentions also another occasion, in which "an assault was made both of the Gentiles, and also of the Jews with their rulers, to use them despitefully, and to stone them; but they were aware of it," the history proceeds to tell us, "and fled into Lystra and Derbe." This happened at Iconium prior to the date of the epistle. Now had the assault been completed; had the history related that a stone was thrown, as it relates that preparations were made both by Jews and Gentiles to stone Paul and his companions; or even had the account of this transaction stopped, without going on to inform us that Paul and his companions were "aware of their danger and fled, a contradiction between the history and the epistle would have ensued. Truth is necessarily consistent: but it is scarcely possible that independent accounts, not having truth to guide them, should thus advance to the very brink of contradiction without falling into it.

Secondly, I say, that if the Acts of the Apostles be silent concerning many of the instances enumerated in the epistle, this silence may be accounted for, from the plan and fabric of the history. The date of the epistle synchronises with the beginning of the twentieth chapter of the Acts. The part, therefore, of the history, which precedes the twentieth chapter, is the only part in which can be found any notice of the persecutions to which St. Paul refers. Now it does not appear that the author of the history was with St. Paul until his departure from Troas, on his way to Macedonia, as related chap. xvi. 10. or rather indeed the contrary appears. It is in this point of the history that the language changes. In the seventh and eighth verses of this chapter the third person is used. "After they were come to Mysia, they assayed to go into Bithynia, but the Spirit suffered them not; and they passing by Mysia came to Troas;" and the third person is in like manner constantly used throughout the foregoing part of the history. In the tenth verse of this chapter, the first person comes in: "After Paul had seen the vision, immediately we endeavoured to go into Macedonia; assuredly gathering that the Lord had called us to preach the Gospel unto them." Now, from this time to the writing of the epistle, the history occupies four chapters: yet it is in these, if in any, that a regular or continued account of the apostle's life is to be expected: for how succinctly his history is delivered in the preceding part of the book, that is to say, from the time of his conversion to the time when the historian joined him at Troas, except the particulars of his conversion itself, which are related circumstantially, may be understood from the following observations:

The history of a period of sixteen years is comprised in less than three chapters; and of these, a material part is taken up with discourses. After his conversion, he continued in the neighbourhood of Damascus, according to the history, for a certain considerable, though indefinite length of time, according to his own words (Gal. i. 18.) for three years; of which no other account is given than this short one, that "straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues, that he is the Son of God; that all that heard him were amazed, and said, Is not this he that destroyed them which called on this name in Jerusalem? that he increased the more in strength, and confounded the Jews which dwelt at Damascus; and that, after many days were fulfilled, the Jews took counsel to kill him." From Damascus he proceeded to Jerusalem: and of his residence there nothing more particular is recorded, than that "he was with the apostles, coming in and going out; that he spake boldly in the name of the Lord Jesus, and disputed against the Grecians, who went about to kill him." From Jerusalem the history sends him to his native city of Tarsus. (Acts, chap. ix. 30.) It seems probable, from the order and disposition of the history, that St. Paul's stay at Tarsus was of some continuance; for we hear nothing of him, until, after a long apparent interval, and much interjacent narrative, Barnabas, desirous of Paul's assistance upon the enlargement of the Christian mission, "went to Tarsus for to seek him." (Chap. xi. 25.) We cannot doubt that the new apostle had been busy in his ministry; yet of what he did, or what he suffered, during this period, which may include three or four years, the history professes not to deliver any information. As Tarsus was situated upon the sea-coast, and as, though Tarsus was his home, yet it is probable he visited from thence many other places, for the purpose of preaching the Gospel, it is not unlikely that in the course of three or four years he might undertake many short voyages to neighbouring countries, in the navigating of which we may be allowed to suppose that some of those disasters and shipwrecks befel him, to which he refers in the quotation before us, "thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been in the deep." This last clause I am inclined to interpret of his being obliged to take to an open boat, upon the loss of the ship, and his continuing out at sea in that dangerous situation, a night and a day. St. Paul is here recounting his sufferings, not relating miracles. From Tarsus, Barnabas brought Paul to Antioch, and there he remained a year: but of the transactions of that year no other description is given than what is contained in the last four verses of the eleventh chapter. After a more solemn dedication to the ministry, Barnabas and Paul proceeded from Antioch to Cilicia, and from thence they sailed to Cyprus, of which voyage no particulars are mentioned. Upon their return from Cyprus, they made a progress together through the Lesser Asia; and though two remarkable speeches be preserved, and a few incidents in the course of their travels circumstantially related, yet is the account of this progress, upon the whole, given professedly with conciseness; for instance, at Iconium it is said, that they abode a long time, (Chap. xiv. 3.) yet of this long abode, except concerning the manner in which they were driven away, no memoir is inserted in the history. The whole is wrapped up in one short summary, "They spake boldly in the Lord, which gave testimony unto the word of his grace, and granted signs and wonders to be done by their hands." Having completed their progress, the two apostles returned to Antioch, "and there they abode long time with the disciples." Here we have another large portion of time passed over in silence. To this succeeded a journey to Jerusalem, upon a dispute which then much agitated the Christian church, concerning the obligation of the law of Moses. When the object of that journey was completed, Paul proposed to Barnabas to go again and visit their brethren in every city where they had preached the word of the Lord. The execution of this plan carried our apostle through Syria, Cilicia, and many provinces of the Lesser Asia; yet is the account of the whole journey despatched in four verses of the sixteenth chapter.

EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

• SECTION X.

Chap. iii. 1. "Do we begin again to commend ourselves? or need we, as some others, epistles of commendation to you?"

"As some others." Turn to Acts xviii. 27. and you will find that, a short time before the writing of this epistle, Apollos had gone to Corinth with letters of commendation from the Ephesian Christians; "and when Apollos was disposed to pass into Achaia, the brethren wrote, exhorting the disciples to receive him." Here the words of the epistle bear the appearance of alluding to some specific instance, and the history supplies that instance; it supplies at least an instance as apposite as possible to the terms which the apostle uses, and to the date and direction of the epistle, in which they are found. The letter which Apollos carried from Ephesus, was precisely the letter of commendation which St. Paul meant; and it was to Achaia, of which Corinth was the capital, and indeed to Corinth itself, (Acts, chap. xix. 1.) that Apollos carried it; and it was about two years before the writing of this epistle. If St. Paul's words be rather thought to refer to some general usage which then obtained among Christian churches, the case of Apollos exemplifies that usage; and affords that species of confirmation to the epistle, which arises from seeing the manners of the age, in which it purports to be written, faithfully preserved.

SECTION XI.

Chap. xiii. 1. "This is the third time I am coming to you:" τριτον τειροσφομαλ.

Do not these words import that the writer had been at Corinth twice before? Yet, if they import this, they overset every congruity we have been endeavouring to establish. The Acts of the Apostles record only two journeys of St. Paul to Corinth. We have all along supposed, what every mark of time except this expression indicates, that the epistle was written between the first and second of these journeys. If St. Paul had been already twice at Corinth, this supposition must be given up: and every argument or observation which depends upon it, falls to the ground. Again, the Acts of the Apostles not only record no more than two journeys of St. Paul to Corinth, but do not allow us to suppose that more than two such journeys could be made or intended by him within the period which the history comprises; for, from his first journey into Greece to his first imprisonment at Rome, with which the history concludes, the apostle's time is accounted for. If, therefore, the epistle were written after the second journey to Corinth, and upon the view and expectation of a third, it must have been written after his first imprisonment at Rome, i. e. after the time to which the history extends. When I first read over this epistle, with the particular view of comparing it with the history, which I chose to do without consulting any commentary whatever, I own that I felt myself confounded by the text. It appeared to contradict the opinion which I had been led, by a great variety of circumstances, to form, concerning the date and occasion of the epistle. At length, however, it occurred to my thoughts to inquire, whether the passage did necessarily imply that St. Paul had been at Corinth twice; or, whether, when he says, "This is the third time I am coming to you," he might mean only that this was the third time that he was ready, that he was prepared, that he intended to set out upon his journey to Corinth. I recollected that he had once before this purposed to visit Corinth, and had been disappointed in this purpose; which disappointment forms the subject of much apology and protestation, in the first and second chapters of the epistle. Now, if the journey in which he had been disappointed was reckoned by him one of the times in which "he was coming to them," then the present would be the third time, i. e. of his being ready and prepared to come; although he had been actually at Corinth only once before. This conjecture being taken up, a further examination of the passage and the epistle, produced proofs which placed it beyond doubt. "This is the third time I am coming to you:" in the verse following these words, he adds, "I told you before, and foretell you, as if I were present the second time; and being absent, now I write to them which heretofore have sinned, and to all other, that, if I come again, I will not spare." In this verse, the apostle is declaring beforehand what he would do in his intended visit: his expression, therefore, "as if I were present the second time," relates to that visit. But, if his future visit would only make him present among them a second time, it follows that he had been already there but once.—Again, in the fifteenth verse of the first chapter, he tells them, "In this confidence I was minded to come unto you before, that ye might have a second benefit." Why a second, and not a third benefit? why δωτῆρας, and not τρίτου χάρις, if the τρίτου φημίαι in the thirteenth chapter, meant a third visit? for, though the visit in the first chapter be that visit in which he was disappointed, yet, as it is evident from the epistle, that he had never been at Corinth from the time of the disappointment to the time of writing the epistle, it follows, that if it were only a second visit in which he was disappointed then, it could only be a second visit which he proposed now. But the text which I think is decisive of the question, if any question remain upon the subject, is the fourteenth verse of the twelfth chapter: "Behold the third time I am ready to come to you:" ἰδὲ τρίτον ἑτοιμὸς εἶμι ἔλθειν. It is very clear that the τρίτον ἑτοιμὸς εἶμι ἔλθειν of the twelfth chapter, and the τρίτου τούτο φημίαι of the thirteenth chapter, are equivalent expressions, were intended to convey the same meaning, and to relate to the same journey. The comparison of these phrases gives us St. Paul's own explanation of his own words; and it is that very explanation which we are contending for, viz. that τρίτου τούτο φημίαι does not mean that he was coming a third time, but that this was the third time he was in readiness to come, τρίτου ἑτοιμὸς εἶμι. Upon the whole, the matter is sufficiently certain: nor do I propose it as a new interpretation of the text which contains the difficulty, for the same was given by Grotius long ago; but I thought it the clearest way of explaining the subject, to describe the manner in which the difficulty, the solution, and the proofs of that solution, successively presented themselves to my inquiries. Now, in historical researches, a reconciled inconsistency becomes a positive argument. First, because an impostor generally guards against the appearance of inconsistency; and, secondly, because, when apparent inconsistencies are found, it is seldom that any thing but truth renders them capable of reconciliation. The existence of the difficulty proves the want or absence of that caution, which usually accompanies the consciousness of fraud; and the solution proves, that it is not the collusion of fortuitous propositions which we have to deal with, but that a thread of truth winds through the whole, which preserves every circumstance in its place.

SECTION XII.

Chap. x. 14—16. "We are come as far as to you also, in preaching the Gospel of Christ; not boasting of things without our measure, that is, of other men's labours; but having hope, when your faith is increased, that we shall be enlarged by you, according to our rule, abundantly to preach the Gospel in the regions beyond you."

This quotation affords an indirect, and therefore unsuspecting, but at the same time a distinct and indubitable recognition of the truth and exactness of the history. I consider it to be implied by the words of the quotation, that Corinth was the extremity of St. Paul's travels hitherto. He expresses to the Corinthians his hope, that in some future visit, he might "preach the Gospel to the regions beyond them;" which imports that he had not hitherto proceeded "beyond them," but that Corinth was as yet the furthest point or boundary of his travels. Now, how is St. Paul's first journey into Europe, which was the only one he had taken before the writing of the epistle, traced out in the history? Sailing from Asia, he landed at Philippi: from Philippi, traversing the eastern coast of the peninsula, he passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia to Thessalonica: from thence through Berea to Athens, and from Athens to Corinth, where he stopped; and from whence, after a residence of a year and a half, he sailed back into Syria. So that Corinth was the last place which he visited in the peninsula; was the place from which he returned into Asia; and was, as such, the boundary and limit of his progress. He could not have said the same thing, viz. "I hope hereafter to visit the regions beyond you," in an epistle to the Philippians, or in an epistle to the Thessalonians, inasmuch as he must be deemed to have already visited the regions beyond them, having proceeded from those cities to other parts of Greece. But from Corinth he returned home; every part therefore beyond that city, might properly be said, as it is said in the passage before us, to be unvisited. Yet is this propriety the spontaneous effect of truth, and produced without meditation or design.

For St. Paul's journeys, the reader is referred to the Map which accompanies the Acts of the Apostles.

Dr. Lightfoot, in his Chronology of the New Testament, has made some good observations on the date of this epistle; and the circumstances by which that date is ascertained: collating, as Dr. Paley has done, the epistle with those parts of the history in the Acts, which refer to it.

The following is the substance of what he says on this subject:—

A new year being now entered, and Paul intending for Syria, as soon as the spring was a little up, he sends Titus beforehand to Corinth, to hasten their collections for the saints in Judea, that they might be ready against Paul should come thither. And with Titus he sends two other brethren; and by them all, he sends the second epistle to the Corinthians. The proof that it was written and sent at this time, and in this manner, is plain, by these places and passages in it: Chap. ix. 2, 3, 4. I know the forwardness of your mind, for which I boast of you to them of Macedonia: yet have I sent the brethren, lest our boasting of you should be in vain; lest haply they of Macedonia come with me, &c. Chap. iii. 14. Behold the third time I am coming to you. Chap. xiii. 1. This is the third time I am coming to you. And, Chap. viii. 16. But thanks be unto God, who put the same earnest care into the heart of Titus for you. Ver. 17. Being more forward of his own accord, he went unto you. Ver. 18. And with him we have sent the brother whose praise is in the Gospel. Ver. 22. And we have sent with them our brother, whom we have oftentimes proved diligent in many things, &c.

The apostle in this second epistle to Corinth, first excuses his not coming to them, according as he had promised in his first epistle, 1 Cor. xvi. 5. clearing himself from all lightness in making, and from all unfaithfulness in breaking, that promise; and fixing the principal reason upon themselves and their present condition: because he had not yet intelligence, when he went first into Macedonia, of any reformation among them of those enormities that he had reprov'd in his first epistle; therefore he was unwilling to come to them in heaviness, and with a scourge. This, his failing to come, according to his promise, had opened the mouths of several in his disgrace, and false teachers took any other occasion to vilify him, which he copiously satisfies, and vindicates himself all along in the epistle. His exceeding zealous plainness with them, and dealing so home and thoroughly against their misdemeanors as he did, was one advantage that his enemies took to open their mouths against him, and to withdraw the hearts of the Corinthians from him; and chiefly because he was so urgent against the works of the law as to justification, and those rites which the Jews, even the most of those that were converted to the Gospel, too much doated on.

After he had sent away this epistle by Titus, Erastus, and Mark, if our conjecture fail not, and had given notice to the Corinthians of his speedy coming to them, and warning them to get their collections ready against he came, he provided for his journey into Syria, which he had intended so long: partly to visit the churches in these parts, and partly to bring up the collections he had got for the poor of Judea; of which, he had promised to the three ministers of the circumcision, Peter, James, and John, that he would be careful, Gal. ii. 10.

Acts, Chap. xx. 4. And there accompanied him into Asia, Sopater, of Berea: and of the Thessalonians, Aristarchus and Secundus; and Gaius of Derbe, and Timotheus: and of Asia, Tychicus and Trophimus. Ver. 5. These going before tarried for us at Troas. Ver. 6. And we sailed away from Philippi, after the days of unleavened bread.

But when Paul, and this his company, are all going for Asia together, why should they not set out together; but these go before, and tarry at Troas, and Paul and some other of his company come after? Nay, they were all to meet at Troas, as it appeareth, ver. 6. Why might they not then have gone altogether to Troas.

The reason of this was, because Paul himself was to go by Corinth: and not minding to stay there but very little, because he hastened to Jerusalem, he would not take his whole train thither, but sends them off the next way they could go to Troas, himself promising and resolving to be speedily with them there. He had promised a long time to the church of Corinth to come unto them, and he had newly sent word in that epistle that he had lately sent, that now his coming would be speedy, 2 Cor. xii. 14. Behold the third time I am ready to come to you: and chap. xiii. 1. This is the third time that I am coming to you. Not that he had been there twice before, for since his first departing thence, (when he had stayed a long time together, at his first planting of the Gospel in that place,) there is neither mention nor probability of his being there again; but this was the third time that he was coming, having promised and intended a journey thither once before, but was prevented, 2 Cor. i. 15, 16, 17. But now he not only promises by the epistle that he will come, but staketh the three brethren that he had sent thither, for witnesses and sureties of that promise, 2 Cor. xiii. 1, 2. that in the mouth of these witnesses his promise might be established and assured. See the Introduction, Sect. xi.

Now the time is come that he makes good his promise; and whilst the rest of his company go directly to the next cut to Troas, he himself and Luke, and whom else he thought good to retain with him, go about by Corinth.

And now to look a little further into the reason of their thus parting company, and of Paul's short stay at Corinth when he came there, we may take into our thoughts, besides, (how much he hastened to Jerusalem) the jealousy that he had, lest he should not find all things at Corinth so comfortable to himself and so creditable to them, before those that should come with him, as he desired. He has many passages in the second epistle that he wrote to them, that glance that way: for though, as to the general, there was reformation wrought among them, upon the receiving his first epistle, and thereupon he speaks very excellent things of them; yet were there not a few that thought basely of him, 2 Cor. x. 12. and traduced him and his doctrine, Chap. xi. and xii. and gave him cause to suspect that his boasting of that church to the churches of Macedonia might come off but indifferently, if the Macedonians should come with him to see how all things were there, 2 Cor. ix. 4. And therefore it was but the good policy of just fear, grief, and prudence, to send them by another way, and he had very just cause to stay but a little while when he came there.

PREFACE

SECOND EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

IT is a general opinion among learned men, that this epistle was written about a year after the former: and this seems to be supported by the words, chap. ix. 2. Achaia was ready a year ago; for the apostle having given instructions for that collection, to which he refers in these words at the close of the preceding epistle, they would not have had the forwardness there mentioned, till a year had elapsed. As the apostle had purposed to stay at Ephesus till Pentecost, 1 Cor. xvi. 8. and he staid some time in Asia after his purpose to leave Ephesus, and go to Macedonia, Acts ix. 21, 22. and yet making here his apology for not wintering in Corinth, as he thought to do, 1 Cor. xvi. 6. this epistle must have been written after the winter; and consequently when a new year was begun. It, therefore, says Dr. Whitby, seems to have been written after his second coming to Macedonia, mentioned Acts xx. 3. For, (1.) it was written after he had been at Troas, and had left that place to return to Macedonia: now that was at his second going thither; see chap. ii. 12. (2.) It was written when Timothy was with him: now, when he left Ephesus to go into Macedonia, Timothy went not with him, but was sent before him, Acts xix. 22. but at his second going through Macedonia, Timothy was with him, Acts xx. 4. (3.) He speaks of some Macedonians, who were likely to accompany him, chap. ix. 4. Now, at his second going from Macedonia, there accompanied him Aristarchus, Secundus, and Gaius of Thessalonica, the metropolis of Macedonia, Acts xx. 4. (4.) The postscript says, that this epistle was written from Philippi, where Paul was till the days of unleavened bread, Acts xx. 6. it therefore seems to have been sent from thence to them by Titus, and some other person, not long before St. Paul's coming to them; which he speaks of as instant, chap. xiii. 1. and that which he was now ready to do, chap. xii. 14. And did, according to Dr. Lightfoot, in his journey from Philippi to Troas; he sailing about from Philippi to Corinth, to make good his promise; whilst the rest that were with him, Acts xx. 4. went directly the next cut to Troas, and there waited for him. See Whitby.

That the first epistle had produced powerful effects among the Corinthians, is evident, from what the apostle mentions in this. Titus had met him in Macedonia, and told him of the reformation produced by this epistle; see chap. vii. 5. that the church had excommunicated the incestuous man; that the epistle had overwhelmed them with great distress; had led them to a close examination of their conduct and state; and had filled them with respect and affection for their apostle, &c. Hearing this, St. Paul wrote this second epistle, to comfort, to commend them, and to complete the work which he had begun; by causing them to finish the contribution for the poor saints at Jerusalem: and also to vindicate his own apostolic character; and to unmask the pretended apostle, who had led them so long astray. See the preceding Introduction.

Its principal divisions are—

- I.—THE PREFACE, chap. i. ver. 1—7.
- II.—THE NARRATION, comprehending an account of what had happened to himself; his answer to their questions concerning the incestuous person, with different other matters; among which, the following are the chief:
 - (1.) The persecution which he had suffered in Asia, and from which he had been miraculously rescued, chap. i. 8—14.
 - (2.) His purpose to pay them a visit, chap. i. 15—24.
 - (3.) Concerning the sorrow which they had suffered, on account of the excommunication the incestuous person, chap. ii. and vii.
 - (4.) His own vindication against the false apostle; in which he gives an account of his doctrine, chap. iii. 6—18. His conduct, chap. iv. 1—6. His bodily infirmities, chap. iv. 7. and chap. v.
 - (5.) Strongly exhorts them to a holy life, chap vi. and vii.
- III. OF THE ALMS that had been collected, and were yet to be collected, chap. viii. and ix.
- IV.—HIS DEFENCE against the false apostle and his calumniators in general, chap. x—xiii.
- V.—MISCELLANEOUS matters, chap. xiii.

It may be remarked, once for all, that none of these, or such artificial divisions, are made by the apostle himself; no more than the divisions into chapters and verses. All these are the work of men: and certainly contribute nothing to a proper understanding of the epistle itself. The apostle appears to have sat down, and, under the influence of the Divine Spirit, he wrote on the different subjects treated of in the epistle, just in the order that these things occurred to his mind; without intending particular heads, divisions, or subdivisions. And as he probably wrote the whole with very little intermission of time; his sense will be best apprehended by those who carefully read over the whole at one sitting.

SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

Chronological Notes relative to this Epistle.

Year of the Constantinopolitan æra of the world, or that used by the Emperors of the East in their diplomata, &c. and thence also called the "civil æra of the Greeks," 5565.—Year of the Alexandrian æra of the world, or ecclesiastical epoch, of the Greeks, 5568.—Year of the Antiochian æra of the world, 5549.—Year of the Eusebian epoch of the creation, or that used in the Chronicon of Eusebius, and the Roman Martyrology, 4285.—Year of the Julian Period, 4765.—Year of the world according to Bedford and Kennedy, in their Scripture Chronology, 4065.—Year of the Ussherian æra of the world, or that used in the English Bibles, 4061.—Year of the world, according to Scaliger, 4001. The difference of sixty years in the æra of the world, as fixed by Scaliger and Ussher, arises from the former chronologer placing the birth of Abraham in the 70th, and the latter in the 130th year of the life of his father Terah. For Scaliger's computation, see on Gen. xi. 26.; and for Ussher's computation, see on Gen. xi. 26. and Gen. xi. 32. conferred with Acts vii. 4.—Year of the minor Jewish æra of the world, 3817.—Year of the greater Rabbinical æra of the world, 4416.—Year since the Deluge, according to Archbishop Ussher, and the English Bible, 2405.—Year of the Cali Yuga, or Indian æra of the Deluge, 3159.—Year of the æra of Iphitus, who re-established the Olympic Games, 338 years after their institution by Hercules, or about 884 years before the commencement of the Christian æra, 997.—Year of the two hundred and ninth Olympiad, 1. This epoch commenced, according to the most accurate calculations of some of the moderns, precisely 776 years before the Christian æra, and 23 years before the building of Rome; and computations of time by it, ceased about A. D. 440.—Year from the building of Rome, according to Fabius Pictor, who flourished about 225 years before Christ, and who is styled by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, an accurate writer, 804. (This epoch is used by Diodorus Siculus.)—Year from the building of Rome, according to Polybius, the historian, 808.—Year from the building of Rome, according to Cato and the Fasti Consulares, and adopted by Solinus, Eusebius, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, &c. 809.—Year from the building of Rome, according to Varro, which was that adopted by the Roman emperors in their proclamations; by Plutarch, Tacitus, Dio Cassius, Gellius, Censorinus, Onuphrius, Baronius, and by most modern chronologers, 810. N. B. Livy, Cicero, Pliny, and Velleius Paterculus, fluctuate between the Varronian and Catonian computations.—Year of the epoch of Nabonassar, king of Babylon, after the division of the Assyrian monarchy, or that used by Hipparchus, by Ptolemy in his astronomical observations, by Censorinus and others, 805. The years of this æra constantly contained 365 days, so that 1460 Julian were equal to 1461 Nabonassarean years. This epoch commenced on the fourth of the calends of March, (Feb. 26.) B. C. 747; and, consequently, the beginning of the 805th year of the æra of Nabonassar, coincided with the Vth of the Ides of August, (Aug. 9.) A. D. 57.—Year of the æra of the Seleucidæ, or since Seleucus, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, took Babylon, and ascended the Asiatic throne, sometimes called the Grecian æra, and the æra of Principalities, in reference to the division of Alexander's empire, 369.—Year of the Cæsarean æra of Antioch, 105.—Year of the Julian æra; or year since the Calendar of Numa Pompilius, the second Roman king, was reformed by Julius Cæsar, 102.—Year of the Spanish æra, or since the second division of the Roman provinces among the Triumviri, 95.—Year since the defeat of Pompey, by Julius Cæsar, at Pharsalia, called by Catrou and Rouillé, the commencement of the Roman empire, 105.—Year of the Actiac, or Actian æra, or proper epoch of the Roman Empire, commencing with the defeat of Antony by Augustus, at Actium, 87.—Year from the birth of Jesus Christ, 61.—Year of the vulgar æra of Christ's nativity, 57.—Year of the Dionysian Period, or Easter Cycle, 58.—Common Golden Number, or year of the Grecian or Metonic Cycle of 19 years, 1, or the first common year.—Jewish Golden Number, or year of the Rabbinical Cycle of nineteen years, 17, or the sixth Embolismic.—Year of the Solar Cycle, 10.—Dominical letter B; or, which is the same thing, the Calends of January, (Jan. 1.) happened on the Jewish Sabbath, or our Saturday.—Jewish Pass-over, (15th of Nisan, or Abib,) Tuesday, April 5, or on the

CHAPTER I.

St. Paul encourages them to trust in God in all adversities, from a consideration of the support which he had granted them already in times of afflictions; and expresses his strong confidence of their fidelity, 1—7. Mentions the heavy tribulation which he had passed through in Asia; as also his deliverance, 8—11. Shows in what the exultation of a genuine Christian consists, 12. Appeals to their own knowledge of the truth of the things which he wrote to them, 13, 14. Mentions his purpose of visiting them; and how sincere he was in forming it, and the reason why he did not come, as he had purposed, 15—24.

NOTES ON CHAP. I.

Verse 1. Paul, an apostle] Paul commissioned immediately by Jesus Christ himself, according to the will of God, to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles. See on 1-Cor. i. 1.

In all Achaia] The whole of the Peloponnesus, or that country separated from the main land, by the Isthmus of Corinth. From this we may learn, that this epistle was not only sent to the church of Corinth, but to all the churches in that country.

Verse 2. Grace be to you and peace] See on Rom. i. 7.

Verse 3. Blessed be God] Let God have universal and eternal praise: 1. Because he is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the gift of his endless love to man, John i. 16. 2. Because he is the Father of mercies, ὁ Πάτερ τῶν ἐλεησέων; the source whence all mercy flows, whether it respect the body or the soul; time or eternity: the source of tender mercy, for so the word implies. See on Rom. xii. 1. And, 3. Because he is the God of all comfort; the fountain whence all consolation, happiness, and bliss flow, to angels and to men.

Verse 4. Who comforteth us] Who shows himself to be the God of tender mercy, by condescending to notice us who have never deserved any good at his hand: and also the God of all consolation, by comforting us in all our tribulation; never leaving us a prey to anxiety, caring care, persecution, or temptation; but, by the comforts of his Spirit, bearing us up, in, through, and above all, our trials and difficulties.

That we may be able to comfort them] Even spiritual comforts are not given us for our use alone; they, like all the gifts of God, are given that they may be distributed, or become the instruments of help to others. A minister's trials and comforts are permitted and sent for the benefit of the church. What a miserable preacher must he be, who has all his divinity by study and learning, and nothing by experience! If his soul have not gone through all the travail of regeneration; if his heart have not felt the love of God shed abroad in it by the Holy Ghost, he can neither instruct the ignorant, nor comfort the distressed. See ver. 6.

Verse 5. The sufferings of Christ] Suffering endured for the cause of Christ; such as persecutions, hardships, and privations of different kinds.

Our consolation also aboundeth] We stood as well, as firmly, and as easily, in the heaviest trial, as in the lightest; because the consolation was always proportioned to the trial and difficulty. Hence we learn, that he who is upheld in a slight trial, need not fear a great one: for, if he be faithful, his consolation shall abound, as his sufferings abound. Is it not as easy for a man to lift one hundred pounds weight, as it is for an infant to lift a few ounces? The proportion of strength destroys the comparative difficulty.

Verse 6. And whether we be afflicted] See on ver. 4.

Which is effectual] There is a strange and unusual variation in the MSS. and Versions in this passage. Perhaps the whole should be read thus: For, if we be afflicted, it is for your encouragement and salvation; and if we be comforted, it is also for your encouragement, which exerted itself by enduring the same sufferings which we also suffer.

This transposition of the middle and last clause, is authorized by the best MSS. and Versions. The meaning seems to be this: While ye abide faithful to God, no suffering can be prejudicial to you; on the contrary, it will be advantageous. God having your comfort and salvation continually in view by all the dispensations of his Providence: and while you patiently endure, your salvation is advanced. Sufferings and consolations, all becoming energetic means of accomplishing the great design; for all things work together for good to them that love God. See the variations in Griesbach.

Verse 7. And our hope of you is steadfast] We have no doubt of your continuing in the truth; because we see that you have such a full experimental knowledge of it, that no sufferings or persecutions can turn you aside. And we are sure that, as ye suffer, so shall ye rejoice.

Verse 8. Our trouble which came to us in Asia] To what part of his history the apostle refers, we know not; some think it is to the Jews, lying in wait to kill him, Acts xx. 3.; others to the insurrection raised against him by Demetrius and his fellow-craftsmen, Acts xix. 23.; others, to his fighting with beasts at Ephesus, 1 Cor. xv. 32. which they understand literally; and others think that there is a reference here to some persecution which is not recorded in any part of the apostle's history.

We were pressed out of measure, above strength] The original is exceedingly emphatic, καὶ ὑπερβολὴν καταδύμενοι ὑπὲρ δύναμιν, we were weighed down beyond what is credible; even beyond what any natural strength could support. There is no part of St. Paul's history known to us, which can justify these strong expressions, except his being stoned at Lystra; which, if not what is here intended, the facts to which he refers are not on record. As Lystra was properly in Asia, (unless he mean Asia Minor,) and his stoning at Lystra did most evidently destroy his life; so that his being raised was an effect of the miraculous power of God, he might be supposed to refer to this. See the notes on Acts xiv. 19, &c. But it is very likely that the reference is to some terrible persecution which he had endured some short time before his writing this epistle: and, with the outlines of which, the Corinthians had been acquainted.

Verse 9. We had the sentence of death in ourselves] The tribulation was so violent and overwhelming, that he had no hope of escaping death.

That we should not trust in ourselves] The tribulation was of such a nature, as to take away all expectation of help, but from God alone.

But in God which raiseth the dead] This is very like the business at Lystra; and would be sufficient to fix the apostle's reference to that fact, could the time and other circumstances serve.

Verse 10. Who delivered us from so great a death] For the circumstances were such, that no human power could avail.

Will yet deliver us] Having had such a signal evidence of his interposition already, we will confide in him with an unshaken confidence, that he will continue to support and deliver.

Verse 11. Ye also helping together by prayer] Even an apostle felt the prayers of the church of God necessary for his comfort and support. What innumerable blessings do the prayers of the followers of God draw down on those who are the objects of them?

The gift bestowed—by the means of many persons] The blessings communicated by means of their prayers.

Thanks may be given by many] Then they who have prayed, hear that their prayers are so particularly answered, then all that have prayed will feel themselves led to praise God, for his gracious answers. Thus, the prayers of many, obtain the gift: and the thanksgivings of many, acknowledge the mercy.

The gift, or χάρισμα, which the apostle mentions, was his deliverance from the dangers and deaths to which he was exposed.

Verse 12. For our rejoicing is this] Η καυχῆσι; our boasting, exultation, subject of glorying.

The testimony of our conscience] Μαρτυροῦντες τῆς συνυπόσεως: that testimony or witness which conscience, under the light and influence of the Spirit of God, renders to the soul, of its state, sincerity, safety, &c.

In simplicity] Απλοῦντι: from ἀ, denoting unity, or together, and πλοῦς, to be, or from ἀ, negative, and πλοῦς, many, not compounded, having one end in view: having no sinister purpose, no bye end to answer. Instead of απλοῦντι, many MSS. and Versions have ἀγιότητα, holiness.

In godly sincerity] Εὐλαβίᾳ Θεοῦ; the sincerity of God: that is, such a sincerity as comes from his work in the soul. Εὐλαβίᾳ, sincerity, and Εὐλαβίᾳ, sincere, come from εὐλα, the splendour, or bright shining of the Sun, and here signifies such simplicity of intention, and purity of affection, as can stand the test of the light of God shining upon it, without the discovery being made of a single blemish or flaw.

Not with fleshly wisdom] The cunning and duplicity of man, who is uninfluenced by the Spirit of God, and has his secular interest, ease, profit, pleasure, and worldly honour in view.

But by the grace of God] Which alone can produce the simplicity and godly sincerity before-mentioned: and inspire the wisdom that comes from above.

Ch. 5. 12.— Phil. 2. 16. & 4. 1. 1 Thes. 2. 19, 20. c 1 Cor. 4. 19.

We have had our conversation] Ἀνεστραφημεν; we have conducted ourselves. The word properly refers to the whole tenor of a man's life; all that he does, says, and intends; and the object or end he has in view; and in reference to which he speaks, acts, and thinks; and is so used by the best Greek writers. The verb ἀνεστραφημεν, is compounded of ἀνα, again, and στραφω, to turn; a continual coming back again to the point from which he set out; a circulation; beginning, continuing, and ending every thing to the glory of God; setting out with divine views; and still maintaining them: beginning in the Spirit, and ending in the Spirit; acting in reference to God, as the planets do in reference to the sun, deriving all their light, heat and motion from him: and incessantly and regularly revolving round him. Thus acted Paul: thus acted the primitive Christians; and thus must every Christian act who expects to see God in his glory. The word conversation, is not an unapt Latiniſm for the Greek term, as conversatio comes from con, together, and verto, I turn, and is used by the Latins in precisely the same sense, as the other is by the Greeks, signifying the whole of a man's conduct, the tenor and practice of his life; and conversio astrorum, and conversiones caelestes, is by CICERO, used for the course of the stars and heavenly bodies.—De Leg. c. 8. Cælum una conversio atque eadem ipse circum se torquetur et vertitur.—Cic. de Univers. c. 8. "The heaven itself is, with one and the same revolution, whirled about, and revolves round itself."

In the world] Both among Jews and Gentiles, have we always acted—as seeing Him who is invisible.

More abundantly to you-ward.] That is, we have given the fullest proof of this in our conduct towards you; you have witnessed the holy manner in which we have always acted; and God is witness of the purity of the motives by which we have been actuated; and our conscience tells us, that we have lived in uprightness before him.

17 When I therefore was thus minded, did I use lightness? or the things that I purpose, do I purpose ^g according to the flesh, that with me

Ἄνε μωρε, may signify here, not in part, but some of you; and it is evident from the distracted state of the Corinthians, and the opposition raised there against the apostle, that it was only a part of them that did acknowledge him; and receive and profit by his epistles and advice.

We are your rejoicing, &c.] You boast of us as the ministers of Christ, through whom ye have believed; as we boast of you as genuine converts to the Christian faith, and worthy members of the church of God.

Verse 15. And in this confidence] Under the conviction or persuasion that this is the case that ye exult in us, as we do in you.

I was minded] I had purposed to come to you before, as he had intimated, 1 Cor. xvi. 5. for he had intended to call on them in his way from Macedonia, but this purpose he did not fulfil: and he gives the reason, ver. 23.

A second benefit] He had been with them once, and they had received an especial blessing in having the seed of life sown among them by the preaching of the Gospel: and he had purposed to visit them again, that they might have a second blessing, in having that seed watered. Instead of χαρῆς, grace, or benefit, several MSS. read χαρῆς, joy, pleasure: but the word grace, or benefit, seems to express the apostle's meaning best.

Verse 16. To pass by you into Macedonia] He had purposed to go to Macedonia first, and then from Macedonia return to them and probably winter in Corinth. Therefore we must understand the δι' υμῶν, by you, as implying that he would sail up the Ægean Sea, leaving Corinth to the west, though he might have taken it in his way, and have gone by land through Greece up to Macedonia. Some think that the meaning is, that he purposed to take Achaia in his way to Macedonia, without calling at Corinth; but Achaia was out of his way considerably; and he could scarcely go through Achaia without passing close by Corinth. I consider the words, therefore, as implying that he purposed not to call at Corinth at that time, but to pass by it, as before stated.

Verse 17. Did I use lightness] When I formed this purpose, was it without due consideration? and did I abandon it through fickleness of mind?

purposes, and falsify their engagements according as may seem best to their secular interest?

Verse 18. But as God is true] Setting the God of truth before my eyes, I could not act in this way: and as sure as he is true, so surely were my purposes sincere: and it was only my uncertainty about your state; that induced me to postpone my visit. See ver. 23.

Verse 19. For the Son of God, &c.] If I could have changed my purpose through carnal or secular interest, then I must have had the same interest in view when I first preached the Gospel to you, with Silvanus and Timotheus. But did not the whole of our conduct prove, that we neither had, nor could have, such interest in view?

Verse 20. For all the promises of God] Had we been light, fickle, worldly-minded persons; persons who could only be bound by our engagements as far as comported with our secular interest, would God have confirmed our testimony among you? Did we not lay before you the promises of God? And did not God fulfil those promises by us, by our instrumentality, to your salvation and his own glory? God is true; therefore, every promise of God is true, and, consequently, each must have its due fulfilment. God will not make use of trifling, worldly men, as the instruments by which he will fulfil his promises. But he has fulfilled them by us: therefore we are just and spiritual men, else God would not have used us.

In him are yea, and in him Amen] All the promises which God has made to mankind, are yea, true in themselves, and amen, faithfully fulfilled to them who believe in Jesus Christ. The promises are all made in reference to Christ: for it is only on the Gospel system that we can have promises of grace; for it is only on that system that we can have mercy. Therefore, the promise comes originally by Christ, and is yea: and it has its fulfilment through Christ, and is amen: and this is to the glory of God, by the preaching of the apostles.

From what the apostle says here, and the serious and solemn manner in which he vindicates himself, it appears, that his enemies at Corinth had made a handle of his not coming to Corinth, according to his proposal, to defame his character, and to depreciate his ministry: but he makes use of it as a means of exalting the truth and mercy of God through Christ Jesus: and to show that the promises of God not only come by him, but are fulfilled through him.

Verse 21. Now he which stablisheth us with you] It is God that has brought both us and you to this sure state of salvation through Christ; and he has anointed us, given us the extraordinary influences of the Holy Ghost, that we might be able effectually to administer this Gospel to your salvation. Through this unction we know and preach the truth; and are preserved by it from dissimulation and falsity of every kind.

Verse 22. Who hath also sealed us] Not only deeply impressed his truth and image upon our hearts; but by the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, attested the truth of our extraordinary unction or calling to the ministry.

And given us the earnest of the Spirit] Τὸ ἀρραβὸν τοῦ Πνεύματος; from this unction and sealing we have a clear testimony in our souls, the Divine Spirit dwelling constantly in us, of our acceptance with God, and that our ways please him. The arraβon of the apostle, is the same as the ἰσχυ ἀραβον of Moses, Gen. xxviii. 17, 18, and 20, which we there translate pledge. The word properly signifies an earnest of something promised, a part of the price agreed for between a buyer and seller; by giving and receiving of which, the bargain was ratified; or a deposit—which was to be restored when the thing promised was given. From the use of the term in Genesis, which the apostle puts here in Greek letters, we may at once see his meaning above; and in Eph. i. 14, the Holy Spirit being an earnest in the heart, and an earnest of the promised inheritance, means a security given in hand for the fulfilment of all God's promises relative to grace and eternal life. We may learn from this, that eternal life will be given in the great day, to all who can produce the arraβon or pledge. He who is found then, with the earnest of God's Spirit in his heart, shall not only be saved from death, but have that eternal life of which it is the pledge, the earnest, and the evidence. Without this arraβon there can be no glory. See the whole case of Judah and Tamar, Gen. xxviii. 13, &c. and the notes there.

Verse 23. I call God for a record upon my soul] The apostle here resumes the subject which he left, ver. 16. and in the most solemn manner calls God to witness, and consequently to punish, if he asserted any thing false; that it was through tenderness to them that he did not visit Corinth at the time proposed. As there were so many scandals among them, the apostle had reason to believe, that he should be obliged to use the severe and authoritative part of his function, in the excommunication of those who had sinned; and delivering them over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, &c. but to give them space to amend, and to see what effect his epistle might produce, (not having heard as yet from them) he purposed to delay his coming. It is plain, as several commentators have observed, 1. that St. Paul's doctrine had been opposed by some of Corinth, 1 Cor. xv. 12. His apostleship questioned, 1 Cor. ix. 1, 2. and 2 Cor. xiii. 13. 2. Himself despised, and treated as a person, who, because of the conciousness he had of his own worthlessness, dared not to come, 1 Cor. iv. 18. His letters, say they, are weighty and powerful, full of boastings of what he can, and what he will do: but his bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible, 2 Cor. x. 10. 3. This being the state in which his reputation was then at Corinth, and he having promised to come to them, 1 Cor. xvi. 5. he could not but think it necessary to vindicate his failing them, by reasons which should be both convincing and kind, such as those contained in the preceding verses. See Dodd and others.

Verse 24. Not for that we have dominion over your faith] I will not come to exercise my apostolical authority in punishing them who have acted sinfully and disorderly: for this would be, to several of you, a cause of distress, the delinquents being friends and relatives: but I hope to come to promote your joy, to increase your spiritual happiness, by watering the seed which I have already sown. This I think to be the meaning of the apostle. It is certain that the faith which they had already received, was preached by the apostles; and, therefore, in a certain sense, according to our meaning of the term, they had a right to propound to them the articles which they ought to believe: and to forbid them, in the most solemn manner, to believe any thing else as Christianity, which was opposed to those articles. In that sense they had dominion over their faith: and this dominion was essential to them as apostles.—But, shall any others, persons who are not apostles, who are not under the unerring and infallible influence of the Holy Ghost, arrogate to themselves this dominion over the faith of mankind? not only by insisting on them to receive new doctrines, taught no where by apostles or apostolic men; but also threatening them with perdition if they do not credit doctrines which are opposed to the very spirit and letter of the word of God? These things, men, not only not apostles, but wicked, profligate, and ignorant, have insisted on as their right. Did they succeed? Yes, for a time; and that time was a time of thick darkness: a darkness that might be felt; a darkness producing nothing but misery; and lengthening out and deepening the shadow of death. But the light of God shone; the Scriptures were read; those vain and wicked pretensions were brought to the eternal touchstone; and what was the consequence? The splendour of truth, pierced, dissipated, and annihilated them for ever!

British Protestants have learned, and Europe is learning, that the SACRED WRITINGS, and them alone, contain what is necessary to faith and practice; and that no man, number of men, society, church, council, presbytery, consistory, or conclave, has dominion over any man's faith. The word of God alone is his rule; and to its Author he is to give account of the use he has made of it.

For by faith ye stand] Ye believe not in us, but in God. We have prescribed to you, on his authority, what you are to believe; you received the Gospel as coming from him; and ye stand in and by that faith.

The subjects in this chapter, which are of the most importance, have been carefully considered in the preceding notes. That alone of the apostle's oath has been passed by with general observations only. But, that it is an oath, has been questioned by some. An oath, properly speaking, is an appeal to God, as the searcher of the heart, for the truth of what is spoken: and an appeal to him as the Judge of right and wrong, to punish the falsity and perjury. All this appears to me to be implied in the awful words above, I call God for a record upon my soul: and this is not the only place in which the apostle uses words of the same import. See Rom. i. 9. and ix. 1. and the note on this latter passage.

On this subject I have spoken pretty much at large, at the end of the vi. chap. of Deuteronomy; but as it appears that there I have made a mistake, in saying, that the people called Quakers hold up their hand in a court of justice, when called upon to make affirmation, I take this opportunity to correct that expression, and to give the form of the oath, for so the law considers it, which the statute 7 and 8 of William III. cap. 34. sect. 1. required of this sect of Christians;—"I, A. B. do declare in the presence of Almighty God, the witness of the truth of what I say." Though this Act was only intended at first, to continue in force for seven years, yet it was afterward made perpetual. See Burn, Vol. III. page 654.

A more solemn and more awful form of an oath, was never presented, nor taken by man than this; no kissing of the book, holding up of the hand, nor laying hand on the Bible, can add either solemnity or weight to such an oath! It is as awful, and as binding, as any thing can be; and him who would break this, no obligation can bind.

But the religious people in question, found their consciences aggrieved by this form, and made application to have another substituted for it: in consequence of this the form has undergone a little alteration, and the solemn affirmation, which is to stand instead of an oath, taken in the usual manner, as finally settled by the 8 Geo. cap. 6. is the following:—"I, A. B. do solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm." Burn, Vol. III. page 656.

It may be well to examine this solemn affirmation; and see whether it do not contain the essential principles of an oath, and whether it should not be reputed by all people, as being equal to any oath taken in the common form, and sufficiently binding on every conscience that entertains the belief of a God; and the doctrine of a future state. The word solemnly refers to the presence and omniscience of God, before whom the affirmation is made: and the word sincerely, to the consciousness that the person has of the uprightness of his own soul, and the total absence of guile and deceit: and the word truly, refers to the state of his understanding as to his knowledge of the fact in question. The word declare refers to the authority requiring, and the persons before whom this declaration is made: and the term affirm, refers back to the words solemnly, sincerely, and truly, on which the declaration and affirmation are founded. This, also, contains all that is vital to the spirit and essence of an oath; and the honest man who takes or makes it, feels that there is no form used among men, by which his conscience can be more solemnly bound. As to the particular form, as long as it is not absurd or superstitious, it is a matter of perfect indifference as to the thing itself, as long as the declaration or affirmation contains the spirit and essence of an oath; and that the law considers this as an oath, is evident from the following clause: "that if any one be convicted of having wilfully, or falsely made this declaration or affirmation, such offender shall incur the same penalties and forfeitures as are enacted against persons convicted of wilful and corrupt perjury." I believe it may be said with strict truth, that few instances can be produced where this affirmation, which I must consider as a most solemn oath, was corruptly made by any accredited member of that religious society, for whose peace and comfort it was enacted. And when this most solemn affirmation is properly considered, no man of reason will say that the persons who take it, are not bound by a sufficient and available oath.

CHAPTER II.

The apostle further explains the reasons why he did not pay his intended visit to the Corinthians, 1. And why he wrote to them in the manner he did, 2—5. He exhorts them also to forgive the incestuous person, who had become a true penitent; and therefore he had forgiven him in the name of Christ, 6—11. He mentions the disappointment he felt when he came to Troas, in not meeting with Titus, from whom he expected to have heard an account of the state of the Corinthian church, 12, 13. Gives thanks to God for the great success he had in preaching the Gospel, so that the influence of the name of Christ was felt in every place, 14. Shows that the Gospel is a savour of life to them that believe, and of death to them that believe not, 15, 16. And that he and his brethren, preached the pure, unadulterated doctrine of God among the people, 17.

NOTES ON CHAP. II.

Verse 1. But I determined this] The apostle continues to give further reasons why he did not visit them at the proposed time. Because of the scandals that were among them, he could not see them comfortably; and therefore he determined not to see them at all, till he had reason to believe that those evils were put away.

Verse 2. For, if I make you sorry] Should he have come, and used his apostolical authority, in inflicting punishment upon the transgressors, this would have been a common cause of distress. And though he might expect that the sound part of the church would be a cause of consolation to him, yet as all would be over-sorrow from them of whom I ought to rejoice; ^c having confidence in you all, that my joy is the joy of you all.

4 For, out of much affliction and anguish of heart I wrote unto you with many tears; ^d not that ye should be grieved, but that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you.

whelmed with trouble, at the punishment of the transgressors, he could not rejoice to see those whom he loved in distress.

Verse 3. And I wrote this same unto you] This, I particularly marked in my first epistle to you; earnestly desiring your reformation, lest, if I came before this had taken place, I must have come with a rod, and have inflicted punishment on the transgressors. See 1 Cor. v.

My joy is the joy of you all] I know that ye wish my comfort, as much as I wish yours.

Verse 4. For, out of much affliction, &c.] It is very likely that the apostle's enemies had represented him as a harsh, austere, authoritarian man; who was better pleased with inflicting

7 ^e So that contrariwise ye ought rather to forgive him, and comfort him, lest perhaps such a one should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow.

8 Wherefore I beseech you that ye would confirm your love toward him.

wounds than in healing them. But he vindicates himself from this charge, by solemnly asserting, that this was the most painful part of his office; and that the writing of his first epistle to them cost him much affliction and anguish of heart, and many tears.

Verse 5. But, if any have caused grief] Here he seems to refer particularly to the case of the incestuous person.

Grieved me but in part] I cannot help thinking that the εἰ μὴ and αὐτὸ μὴ, which we render in part, and which the apostle uses so frequently in these epistles, are to be referred to the people. A part of them had acknowledged the apostle, chap. i. 14. and here a part of them had given him cause of grief: and therefore he immediately adds, that I may not overcharge you all, as only a part of you has put me to pain, (viz. the transgressor, and those who had taken his part.) it would be unreasonable that I should load you all, εὐκαὶ πάντας υμᾶς, with the blame which attaches to that party alone.

Verse 6. Sufficient to such a man is this punishment] That is, the man has already suffered sufficiently. Here he gives a proof of his parental tenderness towards this great transgressor. He had been disowned by the church; he had deeply repented; and now the apostle pleads for him.

Verse 7. Ye ought rather to forgive him] He had now suffered enough: for the punishment inflicted had answered the end for which it was inflicted; and there was some danger that if this poor culprit were not restored to the bosom of the church, his distress and anguish would destroy his life, or drive him to despair.

Verse 8. That ye would confirm your love toward him.] You do love him, notwithstanding the reproach he has brought on the Gospel; and notwithstanding your love to him, ye were obliged to cut him off for the credit of the Gospel. Now that he has repented, I beseech you to confirm, εὐπιστάς, to ratify, by a public act of the church, your love to him; give him the fullest proof that ye do love him, by forgiving him, and restoring him to his place in the church.

Verse 9. For, to this end also did I write] Ἐπεὶ γὰρ, I have written this also, the advices and commands which I now give you; that I might know whether ye be obedient in all things.

Verse 10. To whom ye forgive any thing] Here he further shows them, that his sole object in the punishment inflicted on the transgressor was his amendment; and therefore promises to ratify, in the name and authority of Christ, the free pardon which he exhorts them to dispense.

In the person of Christ] As I believe Christ acts towards his penitent soul, so do I. Christ forgives his sin and takes him to his favour; let us forgive him his offence against the church, and restore him to its communion.

Verse 11. Lest Satan should get an advantage] If the man who has given sufficient proof of the sincerity of his repentance, be not restored, he may be overwhelmed with sorrow, and sink into despair: and then the discipline of the church will be represented, not as emendatory, but as leading to destruction. Of this, our enemies would most gladly avail themselves, as they wish to discredit this ministry: and there is always at hand a devil to suggest evil, and prompt men to do it; for in this respect we have a thorough acquaintance with his devices. Let us, therefore, be careful to remove both from Satan and his partizans all those occasions which might turn to the disadvantage or disparagement of the Gospel of Christ.

Verse 12. When I came to Troas] After having written the former epistle, and not having heard what effect it had produced on your minds; though the Lord had opened me a particular door to preach the Gospel, in which I so especially rejoice and glory.

Verse 13. I had no rest in my spirit] I was so concerned for you, through the love I bear you, that I was greatly distressed, because I did not find Titus returned to give me an account of your state.

But taking my leave of them] I went thence into Macedonia, expecting to find him there, and thither he did come, and gave me a joyous account of your state. See chap. vii. 6, 7.

Verse 14. Now, thanks be unto God] His coming dispelled all my fears, and was the cause of the highest satisfaction to my mind; and filled my heart with gratitude to God, who is the author of all good: and who always causeth us to triumph in Christ; not only gives us the victory, but such a victory as involves the total ruin of our enemies; and gives us cause of triumphing in him, through whom we have obtained this victory.

A triumph among the Romans, to which the apostle here alludes, was a public and solemn honour, conferred by them on a victorious general, by allowing him a magnificent procession through the city.

This was not granted by the senate, unless the general had gained a very signal and decisive victory; conquered a province, &c. On such occasions the general was usually clad in a rich purple robe, interwoven with figures of gold, setting forth the grandeur of his achievements: his buskins were beset with pearls, and he wore a crown, which at first was of laurel, but was afterwards of pure gold. In one hand he had a branch of laurel, the emblem of victory; and in the other his truncheon. He was carried in a magnificent chariot, adorned with ivory and plates of gold; and usually drawn by two white horses. Other animals were also used: when Pompey triumphed over Africa, his chariot was drawn by elephants; that of Mark Antony by lions; that of Heliogabalus by tigers; and that of Aurelius by deer. His children either sat at his feet in the chariot, or rode on the chariot horses. To keep him humble amidst these great honours, a slave stood at his back, casting out incessant railings and reproaches; and carefully enumerating all his vices. Musicians led up the procession, and played triumphal pieces in praise of the general; and these were followed by young men, who led the victims which were to be sacrificed on the occasion, with their horns gilded, and their heads and necks adorned with ribbands and garlands. Next followed carts loaded with the spoils taken from the enemy, with their horses, chariots, &c. These were followed by the kings, princes, or generals taken in the war, loaded with chains. Immediately after these came the triumphal chariot, before which, as it passed, the people strewed flowers, and shouted Io triumphe!

The triumphal chariot was followed by the senate, and the procession was closed by the priests and their attendants, with the different sacrificial utensils; and a white ox, which was to be the chief victim. They then passed through the triumphal arch, along the via sacra to the capitol, where the victims were slain.

During this time, all the temples were opened, and every altar smoked with offerings and incense.

The people at Corinth were sufficiently acquainted with the nature of a triumph: about 15 For we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ, ^b in them that are saved, and ^c in them that perish:

ninety years before this, Lucius Mummius, the Roman consul, had conquered all Achaia, destroyed Corinth, Thebes, and Chalcis; and, by order of the senate, had a grand triumph, and was surnamed Achaicus. St. Paul had now a triumph, (but of a widely different kind,) over the same people; his triumph was in Christ, and to Christ he gives all the glory; his sacrifice was that of thanksgiving to his Lord; and the incense offered on the occasion caused the savour of the knowledge of Christ to be manifested in every place. As the smoke of the victims, and incense offered on such an occasion, would fill the whole city with their perfume; so the odour of the name and doctrine of Christ filled the whole of Corinth, and the neighbouring regions; and the apostles appeared as triumphing, in and through Christ, over devils, idols, superstition, ignorance, and vice, wherever they came.

Verse 15. For we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ] The apostle still alludes to the case of a triumph; the conqueror always represented the person of Jupiter; as even the heathens supposed, that God alone could give the victory; and, as the punishment of death was inflicted on some of the captives, who had often rebelled and broken leagues and covenants; so others were spared, made tributaries, and often became allies: alluding to this, the apostle says, we are a sweet savour to God, we have fulfilled his will in faithfully proclaiming the Gospel, and fighting against sin. And as he has determined that those who believe shall be saved, and those who believe not shall perish; we are as equally acceptable to him, though we unsuccessfully preach the Gospel to some who obstinately reject it, and so perish; as we are in preaching to others who believe, and are saved.

Verse 16. To the one we are the savour of death unto death] There are several sayings among the ancient Jewish writers similar to this. In Debarim Rabba, sect. i. fol. 248, it is said, "As the bee brings home honey to its owner, but stings others; so is it with the words of the law;" וְכֵן הָיְתָה לִישְׂרָאֵל שֶׁמֶן חַיִּים לְיִשְׂרָאֵל; "They are a savour of lives to the Israelites:" וְכֵן הָיְתָה לְיִשְׂרָאֵל וְכֵן הָיְתָה לְיִשְׂרָאֵל לְמֹת חַיִּים; "And a savour of death to the people of this world." The learned reader may see much more to this effect in Schoetgen. The apostle's meaning is plain; those who believe and receive the Gospel, are saved; those who reject it, perish. The meaning of the rabbins is not less plain; the Israelites received the law and the prophets as from God; and thus possessed the means of salvation. The Gentiles ridiculed and despised them, and thus continued in the path of death. The same happens to the present day, to those who receive, and to those who reject the Gospel: it is the means of salva-

A. M. 4061. savour of life unto life. And
 A. D. 57. a who is sufficient for these tion to the former; it is the means of destruction to the latter; for they are not only not saved, because they do not believe the Gospel; but they are condemned because they reject it. For, how can they escape who neglect so great a salvation? The sun, which nourishes the tree that is planted in a good soil, decomposes and destroys it, if plucked up and laid on the surface.

That the saved, σωζόμενοι, and they that perish, ἀπολλυμένοι, mean those who receive and obey the Gospel, and those who reject it, and live and die in sin, needs no proof. No other kinds of reprobate and elect, in reference to the eternal world, are known in the Book of God; though they abound in the books of men. The Jews were possessed with such an exalted opinion of their own excellence, that they imagined that all the love and mercy of God were concentrated among themselves; and that God never would extend his grace to the Gentiles.

Such sentiments may become Jews; but when we find some Gentiles arrogating to themselves all the salvation of God, and endeavouring to prove that he has excluded the major part even of their own world, the Gentiles, from the possibility of obtaining mercy; and that God has made an eternal purpose, that the death of Christ shall never avail them; and that no saving grace shall ever be granted to them; and that they shall infallibly and eternally perish! What shall we say to such things? It is Judaism in its worst shape: Judaism with innumerable deteriorations. The propagators of such systems, must answer for them to God.

Who is sufficient for these things? Is it the false apostle that has been labouring to pervert you? Or, is it the men to whom God has given an extraordinary commission, and sealed it by the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost? That this is the apostle's meaning, is evident from the following verse.

Verse 17. For we are not as many, which corrupt the word of God. God has made us sufficient for these things, by giving us his own pure doctrine, the ministry of reconciliation, which we conscientiously preserve and preach; and we act, not like many among you, who, having received that doctrine, corrupt it; mingling with it their own inventions; and explaining away its force and influence, so as to accommodate it to men of carnal minds.

The words κατασκευαί, from κατασκευα, a tavern-keeper, signifies acting like an unprincipled vintner; for this class of men have ever been notorious for adulterating their wines; mixing them with liquors of no worth, that thereby they might increase their quantity; and thus the mixture was sold for the same price as the pure wine. Isai. i. 22. Thy wine is mixed with water; The Septuagint thus translate οἱ κερταί οὐ μισθούσι τοῖς οἴνοῖς ὕδατι, "Thy vintners mix thy wine with water." that is, thy false prophets which corrupt the word of God; but as of sincerity, but as of God, in the sight of God speak we in Christ.

and corrupt priests adulterate the word of God, and render it of none effect, by their explanations and traditions.

The word has been used, both among the Greeks and Latins, to signify a prostitution of what was right and just, for the sake of gain. So Herodian, lib. vi. cap. 11. Εμνην χρυσίου καπηλευοῦντας, "Making peace for money." So Cauponari Bellum, is "To make war for money." In short, the word is used to signify any artifice employed to get gain, by making a thing look more or better than it is: or mingling that which is excellent with what is not so, to promote the gain of the adulterator.

It is used by Aristophanes, Pluto, Act. iv. scen. 5. ver. 1064. to express an old woman, who was patched and painted, to hide her deformity.

Οὐ δὴτ', ἐπι μὴ νυξ καπηλευοῦσιν·
 Εἰ δ' ἀπλυνταί τούτο το ψιμυθίον, Ὁψι καταδῆλα τοῦ προσώπου γέ τα ραχῆ.

Not at all; the old woman is painted: If the paint were washed off, then you would plainly see her wrinkled face.

Where see the note of the scholiast, who observes, that the term is applied to those who deal in clothes, patching, mending, &c. as well as to those who mix bad wine with good. Κατασκευαί εχιν' Πανοργίμικ' ἐπι οἱ καταλοι χρισί και ἀναποιού τα κινάτια ὑδατι, καὶ τοῖς οἴνοῖς δι' ἀδουλοῦσι, συμμειγνυταί αὐτῶ σαπρῶν. Vid. Kusteri Aristoph. pag. 45.

But as of sincerity] Εξ ἀληθινῆς. See the note on chap. i. ver. 12. We receive the doctrine pure from God: we keep it pure: and deliver it in its purity to mankind. For we speak in Christ, in the things of his Gospel, as being in the sight of God; our whole souls, and all their motives, being known to him. As the unprincipled vintner knows that he adulterates the wine, his conscience testifying this: so we know that we deliver the sincere truth of God, our conscience witnessing that we deliver it to you, as we receive it by the inspiration of the Spirit of truth.

1. That St. Paul was a man of a very tender and loving spirit, is evident from all his epistles; but especially from this; and particularly from the chapter before us. It was not an easy thing with him to give a reproof; and nothing but a sense of his duty to God and his church could have led him to use his apostolical power, to inflict spiritual punishment on transgressors. He felt like a loving and tender father, who, being obliged to correct his froward and disobedient child, feels in his own heart the pain of a hundred blows, for that occasioned by one laid on the body of his son. There are some ministers who think nothing of cutting off members from the church of Christ; they seem to do it, if not cheerfully, yet with indifference and unconcern! How can this be? Nothing but absolute duty to God should induce any man to separate from the visible church any person ; and then, it must be on the conviction that the case is totally hopeless. And who, even in those circumstances, that knows the worth of a soul, can do it without torture of heart !

2. We must not only love the doctrines, but also the morality of the Gospel. He who loves this, will not corrupt it : but as Quemel says truly, in order to love the truth, a man must practise it ; as, in order to practise it, he must love it. That a minister, says he, may preach the word of God in such a manner as is worthy of him ; he must, with St. Paul, be always mindful of these three things : 1. That he be sent by God, and that he speak directly from him ; and as his ambassador. 2. That he speak as in his presence, and under his immediate inspection. 3. That he consider himself as being in the place of Christ, and endeavour to minister to the souls of men, as he has reason to believe Christ would do, were he in the place ; and, as he knows Christ did, when he sojourned among men. The minister of the Gospel is Christ's ambassador : and he prays men in Christ's stead to be reconciled to God.—See chap. v. 20. The people should consider the nature of this ambassage ; receive it as coming immediately from God, that it may accomplish the end for which he has sent it.

CHAPTER III.

The apostle shows, in opposition to his detractors, that the faith and salvation of the Corinthians was a sufficient testimony of his Divine mission ; that he needed no letters of recommendation, the Christian converts, at Corinth being a manifest proof that he was an apostle of Christ, 1—3. He extols the Christian ministry as being infinitely more excellent than that of Moses, 4—12. Compares the different modes of announcing the truth, under the Law and under the Gospel ; in the former it was obscurely delivered ; and the veil of darkness typified by the veil which Moses wore, is still on the hearts of the Jews ; but when they turn to Christ, this veil shall be taken away, 13—16. On the contrary, the Gospel dispensation is spiritual ; leads to the nearest views of heavenly things ; and those who receive it, are changed into the glorious likeness of God, by the agency of his Spirit, 17, 18.

NOTES ON CHAP. III.

Verse 1. Do we begin again to commend ourselves ? [By speaking thus of our sincerity, Divine mission, &c. is it with a design to conciliate your esteem, or ingratiate ourselves in your affections ? By no means.

Or need we—epistles of commendation] Are so destitute of ministerial abilities, and Divine influence, that we need, in order to be received in different churches, to have letters of recommendation ? Certainly not. God causes us to triumph through Christ in every place ; and your conversion is such an evident seal to our ministry, as leaves no doubt that God is with us.

Letters of commendation] Were frequent in the primitive church, and were also in use in the apostolic church ; as we learn from this place. But these were, in all probability, not used by the apostles ; their helpers, successors, and those who had not the miraculous gifts of the Spirit, needed such letters : and they were necessary to prevent the churches from being imposed on by false teachers. But when apostles came, they brought their own testimonials, the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit.

Known and read of all men] For wherever I go, I mention you ; speak of your various gifts and graces, and praise your knowledge in the Gospel.

Verse 3. Manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ] Ye are in our hearts ; and Christ has written you there : but yourselves are the epistle of Christ ; the change produced in your hearts and lives, and the salvation which you have received, are as truly the work of Christ, as a letter dictated and written by a man is his work.

Ministered by us] Ye are the writing, but Christ used me as the pen ; Christ dictated and I wrote ; and the divine characters are not made with ink, but by the Spirit of the living God ; for the gifts and graces that constitute the mind that was in Christ, are produced in you by the Holy Ghost.

manifested without. See the parts of this figurative speech: 1. Jesus Christ dictates. 2. The apostle writes. 3. The hearts of the Corinthians are the substance on which the writing is made.
 And, 4. The Holy Spirit produces that influence by which the traces are made, and the mark becomes evident. Here is not only an allusion to making inscriptions on stones, where one dictates the matter, and another cuts the letters; and probably there were certain cases where some colouring matter was used to make the inscription the more legible; and when the stone was engraved, it was set up in some public place, as monuments, inscriptions, and contracts were, that they might be seen, known, and read of all men. The apostle may here refer to the ten commandments written by the finger of God, upon two tables of stone: which writing was an evidence of the divine mission of Moses, as the conversion of the Corinthians was an evidence of the mission of St. Paul. But it may be as well to take the words in a general sense, as the expression is not unfrequent either in the Old Testament, or in the rabbinical writers. See Schoetgen.

Verse 4. Such trust have we] We have the fullest conviction that God hath thus accredited our ministry; and that ye are thus converted unto him; and are monuments of his mercy, and proofs of the truth of our ministry.

Verse 5. Not that we are sufficient of ourselves] We do not arrogate to ourselves any power to enlighten the mind or change the heart: we are only instruments in the hand of God. Nor was it possible for us apostles to think, to invent such a scheme of salvation as is the Gospel: and, if we even had been equal to the invention, how could we have fulfilled such promises as this scheme of salvation abounds with? God alone could fulfil these promises:
 and he fulfils only those which he makes himself. All these promises have been amen; ratified and fulfilled to you who have believed on Christ Jesus, according to our preaching.
 Therefore, ye are God's workmanship; and it is only by God's sufficiency, that we have been able to do any thing: this I believe to be the apostle's meaning in this place; and that he speaks here merely of the Gospel scheme; and the inability of human wisdom to invent it: and the words λογισαμεθα τι, which we translate think any thing, signify properly, to find any thing out by reasoning: and as the Gospel scheme of salvation is the subject in hand, to that subject the words are to be referred and limited. The words, however, contain also a general truth; we ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves; but ^d our sufficiency is of God;

6 Who also hath made us able ^e ministers of ^f the new testament; can neither think, act, nor be without God. From him we have received all our powers, whether of body or of mind; and without him we can do nothing. But we may abuse both our power of thinking and acting; for the power to think, and the power to act, are widely different from the act of thinking, and the act of doing. God gives us the power or capacity to think and act, but he neither thinks nor acts for us. It is on this ground that we may abuse our powers, and think evil, and act wickedly; and it is on this ground that we are accountable for our thoughts, words, and deeds.

Verse 6. Who hath made us able ministers] This is a more formal answer to the question, Who is sufficient for these things? απο ταυτα τις ικανος; chap. ii. 16. God, says the apostle, has made us able ministers; ικανων μας διακονου, he has made us sufficient for these things; for the reader will observe, that he uses the same word in both places. We apostles execute, under the Divine influence, what God himself has devised. We are ministers of the new covenant; of this new dispensation of truth, light, and life, by Christ Jesus. A system which not only proves itself to have come from God; but necessarily implies, that God himself by his own Spirit, is a continual agent in it; ever bringing its mighty purposes to pass. On the words και διακονου, new covenant, see the PREFACE to the Gospel of St. Matthew.

Not of the letter, but of the spirit] The apostle does not mean here, as some have imagined, that he states himself to be a minister of the New Testament, in opposition to the Old; and that it is the Old Testament that kills, and the New that gives life; but that the New Testament gives the proper meaning of the Old; for the old covenant had its letter and its spirit; its literal and its spiritual meaning. The law was founded on the very supposition of the Gospel; and all its sacrifices, types, and ceremonies, refer to the Gospel. The Jews rested in the letter, which not only afforded no means of life, but killed, by condemning every transgressor to death. They did not look at the spirit; did not endeavour to find out the spiritual meaning; and therefore they rejected Christ, who was the end of the law for justification; and so, for redemption from death, to every one that believes. The new covenant set all these spiritual things at once before their eyes; and showed them the end, object, and design of the law: and thus the apostles who preached it, were ministters of that Spirit which gives life.

A. M. 4061. 7 But, if ^a the ministration of death, ^b written and engraven in stones, was glorious, ^c so that the children of Israel could not steadfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance; which glory was to be done away:

8 How shall not ^d the ministration of the Spirit be rather glorious?

^a Rom. 7. 10. — ^b Exod. 34. 1, 28. Deut. 10. 1, &c.

Every institution has its letter as well as its spirit; as, every word must refer to something, of which it is the sign or significator. The Gospel has both its letter and its spirit; and multitudes of professing Christians, by resting in the LETTER, receive not the life which it is calculated to impart. Water, in baptism, is the letter that points out the purification of the soul; they who rest in this letter, are without this purification; and dying in that state, they die eternally. Bread and wine, in the sacrament of the Lord's supper, are the letter; the atonement efficacy of the death of Jesus, and the grace, communicated by this to the soul of a believer, are the spirit. Multitudes rest in this letter; simply receiving these symbols, without reference to the atonement, or to their guilt; and thus lose the benefit of the atonement and the salvation of their souls. The whole Christian life is comprehended by our Lord under the letter follow me. Does not any one see, that a man, taking up this letter only, and following Christ through Judea, Galilee, Samaria, &c. to the city, temple, villages, sea-coast, mountains, &c. fulfilled no part of the spirit, and might, with all this following, lose his soul? Whereas the SPIRIT, viz. receive my doctrine, believe my sayings, look by faith, for the fulfilment of my promises, imitate my example, would necessarily lead him to life eternal. It may be safely asserted, that the Jews, in no period of their history, ever rested more in the letter of their law; than the vast majority of Christians are doing in the letter of their Gospel. Unto multitudes of Christians Christ may truly say, Ye will not come unto me that ye may have life.

Verse 7. The ministration of death] Here the apostle evidently intends the law. It was a ministration δικαιωσις, or service of death. It was the province of the law to ascertain the duty of man; to assign his duties; to fix penalties for transgressions, &c. and by it is the knowledge of sin. As man is prone to sin, and is continually committing it; this law was to him a continual ministration of death. Its letter killed; and it was only the Gospel, to which it referred, that could give life; because that Gospel held out the only available atonement.

Yet, this ministration of death, the ten commandments, written on stones, a part of the Mosaic institution, being put for the whole, was glorious; was full of splendour; for the apostle refers to the thunderings and lightnings, and luminous apparitions, which took place in the giving of the law; so that the very body of Moses partook of the effulgence in such a manner that the children of Israel could not look upon his face; and he, to hide it, was obliged to use a veil. All this was intended to show the excellency of that law, as an institution coming immediately from God: and the apostle gives it all its heightenings, that he may compare it to the Gospel, and thereby prove, that glorious as it was, it had no glory that could be compared with the Gospel: and that even the glory it had was a glory that was to be done away: to be absorbed as the light of the stars, planets, and moon, are absorbed in the splendour of the sun. See the notes on the viiith chap. of Romans; and see those on Exod. xix. xx. and xxxiv. 29, &c. where this subject is treated in all its details.

Verse 8. The ministration of the spirit] The Gospel dispensation, which gives the true spiritual sense of the law.

Be rather glorious] Forasmuch as the thing signified is of infinitely more consequence than that by which it is signified. The raising bread, will preserve a man alive: the word bread, can give life to nothing.

Verse 9. The ministration of condemnation] The law which ascertained sin, and condemned it to just punishment.

The ministration of righteousness] The Gospel, the grand business of which was to proclaim the doctrine, δικαιοσύνη, of justification; and to show how God could be just, and yet the justifier of him who believeth in Jesus.

Exceed in glory] For great, glorious, and awful as the law may be, in its opposition to sin, which is a reproach to man, and a dishonour to God; and in its punishment of sin; yet, it must be vastly exceeded by that system which evidencing an equal abhorrence of sin, finds out a method to forgive it; to take away its guilt from the conscience; and remove all its infection from the soul. That this could be done, the law pointed out by its blood of bulls and of goats; but every considerate mind must see, that it was impossible for these to take away sin; it is the Gospel that does what the law signified; and, forasmuch as the performance of a promise is greater than the promise itself, and the substance of a man is greater than the shadow projected by that substance; so is the Gospel of Jesus Christ greater than the law, with all its promises, types, ceremonies, and shadows.

Verse 10. For, even that which was made glorious] The law, which was exhibited for a time in great glory and splendour; partly when it was given, and partly by the splendour of God in the tabernacle, and first temple; but all this ceased, and was done away; was intended to give place to the Gospel; and has actually given place to that system; so that now, in no part of the world, is that law performed, even by the people who are attached to it, and reject the Gospel.

The glory that excelleth.] The Gospel dispensation, giving supereminent displays of the justice, holiness, goodness, mercy, and majesty of God.

Verse 11. For, if that which is done away, &c.] Here is another striking difference between the law and the Gospel. The former is termed καταργησυστων, that which is counter-worked and abolished: the latter το μωρον, that which continues, which is not for a particular time, place, and people, as the law was: but for ALL times, all places, and all people. As a great, universal, and permanent good vastly excels a good that is small, partial, and transitory, so does the Gospel dispensation that of the law.

Verse 12. Seeing—we have such hope] Such glorious prospects as those blessings which the Gospel sets before us; producing such confidence, as the fulfilment of so many promises has already done; and that God will still continue to work for us and by us.

We use great plainness of speech] Πολλή και απροσμεθεα, we speak not only with all confidence, but with all imaginable plainness; keeping back nothing; disguising nothing; concealing nothing; and here we differ greatly from the Jewish doctors, and from the Gentile philosophers, who affect obscurity; and endeavour, by figures, metaphors, and allegories, to hide every thing from the vulgar. But we wish that all may hear; and we speak so, that all may understand.

Verse 13. And not as Moses] The splendour of Moses' countenance was so great, that the Israelites could not bear to look upon his face; and therefore he was obliged to veil his face: this, it appears he did typically, to represent the types and shadows by which the whole dispensation of which he was the minister, was covered. So that the Israelites could not steadfastly look, could not then have the full view or discernment of that, in which the Mosaic dispensation should issue and terminate.

Verse 14. But their minds were blinded] By resting in the letter, shutting their eyes against the light that was granted to them, they contracted a hardness or stupidity of heart. And the veil that was on the face of Moses, which prevented the glory of his face from shining out, may be considered as emblematical of the veil of darkness and ignorance that is on their hearts; and which hinders the glory of the Gospel from shining in.

Until this day, remaineth the same veil] They are still ignorant of the spiritual meaning and intention of their own law, called here παλαια διαθηκη, the old covenant. See the word explained in the Preface to St. Matthew.

In the reading of the Old Testament] Here is an evident allusion to the conduct of the Jews in their synagogues: when they read the law, they cover their whole head with a veil, which they term the טלית takith, veil, from טלל talal, to cover; and this voluntary usage of theirs, the apostle tells us, is an emblem of the darkness of their hearts, while they are employed even in sacred duties.

Which veil is done away in Christ] It is only by acknowledging Christ, that the darkness is removed; and the end and spiritual meaning of the law discerned.

Verse 16. When it shall turn to the Lord] When the Israelitish nation shall turn to the Lord Jesus, the veil shall be taken away; the true light shall shine; and they shall see all things clearly.

There is an evident allusion here to the case of Moses, mentioned Exod. xxxiv. 34. When he came from the Lord, and spoke to the Israelites, he put the veil over his face; but when he returned to speak with the Lord, then he took off the veil. So, when the Israelitish nation shall return to speak with, and pray to the Lord Jesus, the veil of darkness and ignorance shall be taken away from their hearts; but never before that time. The words seem to imply:

1. That there will be a conversion of the Jews to Christianity; and, 2. That this conversion will be en masse: that a time will come, when the whole nation of the Jews, in every place, shall turn to Christ; and then the Gentiles and Jews make one fold, under one Shepherd and Bishop of all souls.

Verse 17. Now the Lord is that Spirit] In ver. 6 and 8. the word πνευμα, spirit, evidently signifies the Gospel; so called, because it points out the spiritual nature and meaning of the law; because it produces spiritual effects; and because it is especially the dispensation of the Spirit of God. Here Jesus Christ is represented as that Spirit, because he is the end of the law for justification to every one that believes; and because the residue of the Spirit is with him; and he is the dispenser of all its gifts, graces, and influences.

And where the Spirit of the Lord is] Wherever this Gospel is received, there the Spirit of the Lord is given: and wherever that Spirit lives and works, there is liberty not only from the Jewish bondage, but from the slavery of sin; from its power, its guilt, and its pollution. See John viii. 33—36. and the notes there.

Verse 18. But we all, with open face] The Jews were not able to look on the face of Moses, the mediator of the old covenant; and therefore he was obliged to veil it: but all we Christians, with faces uncovered, behold, as clearly as we can see our own natural face in a mirror, the glorious promises and privileges of the Gospel of Christ; and while we contemplate, we anticipate them by desire and hope, and apprehend them by faith; and are changed from the glory there represented, to the enjoyment of the thing which is represented; even the glorious Image (righteousness and true holiness,) of the God of glory.

As by the Spirit of the Lord] By the energy of that Spirit of Christ which gives life and being to all the promises of the Gospel; and thus we are made partakers of the Divine nature, and escape all the corruptions that are in the world. This appears to me to be the general sense of this verse: its peculiar terms may be more particularly explained.

The word κατοπτριζομεθα, which we translate beholding in a glass, comes from κατα, against, and στρομα, I look; and properly conveys the sense of looking into a mirror. Now as mirrors, among the Jews, Greeks, and Romans, were made of highly polished metal, (see the note on 1 Cor. xiii. 12.) it would often happen, especially in strong light, that the face would be greatly illuminated, and to this circumstance the apostle seems here to allude. So, by earnestly contemplating the Gospel of Jesus, and believing on him who is its author, the soul becomes illuminated with his Divine splendour, and we see the glorious form after which our minds are to be fashioned; and, by believing and receiving the influence of his Spirit, μεταμορφουμεθα, our form is changed, εν αυτην εικονα, into the same image which we behold there; and this is the Image of God, lost by our fall, and now recovered and restored by Jesus Christ: for, the shining of the face of God upon us, i. e. approbation, through Christ, is the cause of our transformation into the Divine image.

Dr. Whitby, in his notes on this chapter, produces six instances in which the apostle shows the Gospel to be superior to the law: I shall transcribe them, with further illustrations.

1. The glory appearing on Mount Sinai, made the people afraid of death, saying, Let not God speak to us any more, lest we die, Exod. xx. 19. Deut. xviii. 16. and thus they received the spirit of bondage to fear, Rom. viii. 15. Whilst we have given to us the spirit of power, and love, and of a sound mind, 2 Tim. i. 7. and the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry Abba Father! and to this difference the Epistle to the Hebrews alludes, chap. xii. 18—24.

2. Moses, with all his glory, was only the minister of the law written on tables of stone; the apostles are ministers of the Gospel, written on the hearts of believers. Moses gave the Jews only the letter that killeth: the apostles gave the Gospel, which is accompanied with the spirit that gives life.

3. The glory which Moses received at the giving of the law, did more and more diminish, because his law was to vanish away; but the glory which is received from Christ, is an increasing glory; the doctrine and the Divine influence remaining for ever.

4. The law was veiled under types and shadows; but the Gospel has scarcely any ceremonies; baptism and the Lord's supper being all that can be properly called such: and BELIEVE, LOVE, OBEY, the great precepts of the Gospel, are delivered with the utmost perspicuity. And indeed the whole doctrine of Christ crucified, is made as plain as human language can make it.

5. The Jews only saw the shining of the face of Moses through a veil; but we behold the glory of the Gospel of Christ in the person of Christ our lawgiver, with open face.

6. They saw it through a veil, which prevented the reflection, or shining of it, upon them; and so this glory shone only on the face of Moses, but not at all upon the people. Whereas, the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ, shines as in a mirror, which reflects the image upon Christian believers, so that they are transformed into the same image, deriving the glorious gifts and graces of the Spirit, with the Gospel, from Christ the Lord and distributor of them, 1 Cor. xii. 5. and so, the glory which he had from the Father, he has given to his genuine followers, John xvii. 22. It is, therefore, rather with true Christians, as it was with Moses himself, concerning whom God speaks thus: With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches: and the similitude of the Lord, εν δεξαν κοπιω, the glory of the Lord, shall he behold, Numb. xii. 8. For, as he saw the glory of God apparently, so we with open face behold the glory of the Lord: as he, by seeing of this glory, was changed into the same likeness, and his face shone, or was δεδοξαμην, made glorious; so we, beholding the glory of the Lord in the face of Jesus Christ, chap. iv. 6. are changed into the same glory.

Thus we find that in every thing, the Gospel has a decided superiority over the law and its institutions.

CHAPTER IV.

St. Paul shows the integrity with which he had preached the Gospel of Christ, 1, 2. And, that if it was unprofitable to any who had heard it, it was because their unbelieving hearts were blinded, 3, 4. How he preached, and how he was qualified for the work, 5-7. The troubles and difficulties he met with in his labours, and the hope and consolations by which he was supported, 8-15. And the prospect he had of eternal blessedness, 16-18.

NOTES ON CHAP. IV.

Verse 1. Seeing we have this ministry] The Gospel, of which he gave that noble account which we read in the preceding chapter.

We faint not] We meet with many tribulations, but are supported in and through all by the grace of the Gospel. Instead of οὐκ ἠσχυνόμεν, we faint not; οὐκ ἠμαρτήσαμεν, we act not wickedly, is the reading of ADFG. and some others. Wakefield thinks it the genuine reading; it certainly makes a very good sense with what goes before and what follows. If we follow this reading, the whole verse may be read thus: Wherefore, as we have obtained mercy, or been graciously entrusted μετ' ἡμῶν, with this ministry, we do not act wickedly, but have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, &c.

Verse 2. But have renounced] ἀπιστάμεθα, we have disclaimed the hidden things of dishonesty; τα κρυπτά τῆς ἀσχημίας, the hidden things of shame; those things which wicked men do; and which they are ashamed to have known, and ashamed to own. Dr. Whitby thinks that the apostle refers to carnal abominations, of which the Jews and their rabbins were notoriously guilty. And it does appear, from the first epistle, that there were persons in Corinth who taught that fornication was no sin: and it appears also, that several had taken the part of the incestuous person.

Not walking in craftiness] Πικροῦργον; in subtilty, and clever cunning, as the false teachers did; who were accomplished fellows, and capable of any thing. The word is compounded of πικρ, all, and ἔργον, work.

Not handling the word of God deceitfully] Not using the doctrines of the Gospel to serve any secular or carnal purpose; nor explaining away their force, so as to palliate or excuse sin; nor generalizing its precepts, so as to excuse many, in particular circumstances, from obedience; especially in that which most crossed their inclinations. There were deceitful handlers of this kind, in Corinth; and there are many of them still in the garb of Christian ministers: persons who disguise that part of their creed, which, though they believe is of God, yet would make them unpopular; affecting moderation, in order to procure a larger au-

God deceitfully; but by manifestation of the truth, commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God.

3 But, if our Gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost;

e Ch. 6. 4, 7. & 7. 14. f Ch. 5. 11. g 1 Cor. 1. 18. Ch. 15. 2 Thess. 2. 10.

dience, and more extensive support. Not attacking prevalent and popular vices; calling disipation of mind, relaxation; and worldly and carnal pleasures, innocent amusements, &c. In a word, turning with the tide, and shifting with the wind of popular opinion, prejudice, fashion, &c.

But by manifestation of the truth] An open explicit acknowledgment of what we know to be the truth; what we are assured is the Gospel of Jesus; concealing nothing; blunting the edge of no truth; explaining spiritual things, not in the words of man's wisdom, but in those taught by the Spirit of God.

Commending ourselves to every man's conscience] Speaking so, that every man's conscience shall bear its testimony that we proclaim the truth of God. This is one characteristic of Divine truth; even every man's conscience will acknowledge it, though it speak decidedly against his own practices.

In the sight of God] Whose eye is ever on the heart and conscience of man; and who always bears testimony to his own word.

Verse 3. But if our Gospel be hid] Κεκαλυμμένον, veiled; he refers to the subject that he had treated so particularly in the conclusion of the preceding chapter. If there be a veil on the Gospel, it is only to the wilfully blind; and if any man's heart be veiled that hears this Gospel, it is a proof that he is among the lost, ἀπολλόμενοι; those who are fully under the power of sin; who have given up themselves to work wickedness; persons who are mere heathens, or live like such: and yet such as Jesus Christ came to seek and save: for the word does not necessarily imply those that will perish eternally; but is a common epithet to point out a man without the Gospel, and without God in the world. Christ commands his disciples in preaching the Gospel, to go πρόβατα τα ἀπολωλότα to the lost sheep of the house of Israel: Matt. vi. 10. for himself says, Matt. xviii. 11. and Luke xix. 10. The Son of man is come, ζητῆσαι καὶ σῶσαι τὸ ἀπολωλός, to seek and to save that which is lost. And such persons he represents under the parable of the lost sheep; for to find, τὸ ἀπολωλός, that which is lost, the good shepherd leaves the ninety and nine in the wilderness, and goes in search of it.

Matt. xviii. 12. Luke xv. 4. The word more properly signifies in all those connexions, and in the parallel passages, not those who ARE LOST, but those who are perishing; and will perish, if not sought and saved.

Verse 4. In whom the god of this world, &c.] We see here that those whose minds were blinded, are they who believe not; and because they believe not, their minds continue in darkness; and are proper subjects for Satan to work on; and he deepens the darkness; and increases the hardness. But who is meant by the god of this world? It is generally answered, the same who is called the Prince of this world, John xvi. 11. But the question recurs, who is the Prince of this world? and the answer to both is, SATAN. The reader will do well to consult the notes on John xii. 31. and the concluding observations on John xiv. I must own I feel considerable reluctance to assign the epithet, ὁ Θεός, THE God, to Satan; and were there not a rooted prejudice in favour of the common opinion, the contrary might be well vindicated, viz. that by the God of this world, the Supreme Being is meant, who in his judgment gave over the minds of the unbelieving Jews to spiritual darkness, so that destruction came upon them to the uttermost. Satan, it is true, has said that the kingdoms of the world and their glory are his; and that he gives them to whomsoever he will: Matt. iv. 8, 9. but has God ever said so? and are we to take this assertion of the boasting devil and father of lies for truth? certainly not. We are not willing to attribute the blinding of men's minds to God, because we sometimes forget that he is the God of justice, and may in judgment remove mercies from those that abuse them: but this is repeatedly attributed to him in the Bible; and the expression before us is quite a parallel to the following, Isa. vi. 9.—Go and tell this people; hear ye indeed, but understand not; and see ye indeed, but perceive not. MAKE THE HEART of this PEOPLE FAT, and MAKE their EARS HEAVY, and SHUT their EYES, LEST they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, &c. and see the parallel places, Matt. xiii. 14, 15. Mark iv. 12. John xii. 40. and particularly Rom. xi. 8—10. GOD HATH GIVEN THEM THE SPIRIT of SLUMBER, EYES that they SHOULD NOT SEE, and EARS that they SHOULD NOT HEAR; let their EYES be DARKENED, &c. Now all this is spoken of the same people, in the same circumstances of wilful rebellion, and obstinate unbelief; and the great God of heaven and earth, is he who judicially blinds their eyes; makes their hearts fat, i. e. stupid; gives them the spirit of slumber, and bows down their back, &c. On these very grounds it is exceedingly likely, that the apostle means the true God, by the words the God of this world.

And as to the expression this world, αἰῶνος, τῆς τῆς, we are not to imagine that it necessarily means wicked men, or a wicked age; for it is frequently used to express the whole mundane system, and all that is called time: Whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him neither in this world, nor in the world to come, Matt. xii. 32. In Luke xx. 34. the children υἱοὶ τῆς αἰῶνος τῆς τῆς, of THIS WORLD, mean simply mankind at large, in their state of probation in this lower world, in opposition to their state in the world to come. The same meaning the word has in several other places, to which I need not refer; it simply implying the present state of things, governed by the Divine Providence, in contradistinction from the eternal state: and it is very remarkable that in 1 Tim. i. 17. God himself is called βασιλεὺς τῆς αἰῶνος, the king of the world; what we call king eternal; but here evidently means Him who governs both worlds; and rules in time and eternity. This character among the Asiatics is considered essential to God; and therefore in the very first sura of the Koran he is called رب العالمين Rubbi alâlameen, "The Lord of both worlds," an expression perfectly similar to that above. But it is needless to multiply examples, they exist in abundance. Some, and particularly the ancient fathers, have connected τῶν αἰῶνων τῆς τῆς, with τῶν αἰῶνων, and have read the verse—But God hath blinded the minds of the unbelievers of this world, &c. Irenæus, Tertullian, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Photius, Theophylact, and Augustin, all plead for the above meaning; and St. Augustin says, that it was the opinion of almost all the ancients.

Lest the light of the glorious Gospel] They have resisted the grace which God gave them; and have refused to yield to the evidence which amply prove the Messiahship of Jesus; and therefore their eyes were judicially darkened; as it is said in the prophet, He hath closed their eyes, and hath given them the spirit of slumber. That is, they have shut their eyes against the light, and their blindness and stupor are the consequence.

By glorious Gospel, we are to understand the luminous Gospel; that which comes with so much light and evidence to every candid mind.

Who is the image of God] Christ is called, Heb. i. 3. the brightness of God's glory, and the express image of his person. See the note there.

Verse 5. For we preach not ourselves] We neither proclaim our own wisdom nor power; we have nothing but what we have received; we do not wish to establish our own authority; nor to procure our own emolument.

But Christ Jesus the Lord] We proclaim the author of this glorious Gospel as CHRIST, ὁ Χριστός, the same as ὁ μεσσίας ha-mashiach, the MESSIAH, the anointed one; Him of whom the prophets wrote; and who is the expectation, as he is the glory of Israel. We proclaim him as JESUS υἱοῦ Υεβοῦσῶα, the Saviour and Deliverer, who saves men from their sins. See Matt. i. 21. And we proclaim Jesus, of Nazareth to be the long expected Messiah; and that there will be none other. And further, we proclaim this Jesus, the Messiah, to be the LORD, ὁ ΚΥΡΙΟΣ, the great Ruler who has all power in heaven and earth; who made and governs the world; and who can save to the uttermost all that come to God through him. Such was the Redeemer preached by St. Paul.

And ourselves your servants] Labouring as fervently and as faithfully for your eternal interests, as your most trusty slaves can do for your secular welfare. And we do this for Christ's sake; for although we, by our labour, show ourselves to be your servants; yea, your slaves, δούλοι, yet it is a voluntary service; and we are neither employed by you, nor receive our wages from you. We belong to Jesus; and are your servants on his account, and by his order.

Verse 6. For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness] The apostle refers here to Gen. i. 3. For, when God created the heavens and the earth, DARKNESS was on the face of the deep; and God said, let THERE BE LIGHT, and there was light. Thus he caused the light to shine out of darkness.

Hath shined in our hearts] He has given our hearts the glorious light of the Gospel; as he has given the world the glorious light of the sun. As sure, therefore, as God is the author of the light, and the creator of the universe, so sure is he the author of the Gospel: it is no human invention; and is as far beyond the power of man's wisdom and might, as the creation of the world is beyond all created power, energy, and skill.

The light of the knowledge] To give us that light, that we might enlighten others; this appears to me to be the design of the apostle's προς ἑαυτοὺς τῆς γνώσεως τῆς δόξης τοῦ Θεοῦ, or, as Dr. Whitby paraphrases it, to give us, and enable us to give to others, the light of the knowledge of God through Christ.

In the face of Jesus Christ.] It is in and through Jesus that we can receive the Divine light: and it is in and by him that we can be made partakers of the Divine glory. The light, mercy, holiness, and glory of God, are reflected upon, and communicated to us through Jesus the Christ. And it is in προσῶπον, in the appearance and person of Jesus Christ, that these blessings are communicated to us.

Verse 7. But we have this treasure in earthen vessels.] The original ὀστρακοὶ σκευαί, signifies, more literally, vessels made of shells, which are very brittle; and as a shell is the outward part of a fish, it is very fit, as Dr. Hammond observes, to resemble our bodies in which our souls dwell. The Platonists make two bodies of a man; the one they call ἄχρη, the hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

chariot of the soul; the other, that which we see and touch; and this they call ὀστρακον, which is the same to us, as the shell is to the fish. The word ὀστρακον, not only signifies a shell, or vessel made of shell, but also πηλοσ σκευαίον, an earthen vessel, which has been burnt in the kiln; and earthen vessels, or pottery in general: the difference between σκευα ὀστρακίνα, earthen ware, and σκευα κηραμικῆς, the potter's vessel, is this: the latter implies the vessel as it comes out of the hands of the potter, BEFORE it is burnt; and the other is the vessel AFTER it has passed through the kiln. St. Chrysostom, speaking of this difference, observes, that the vessels once baked in the kiln, if broken, are incapable of being restored, δια τῆς ἐκ τῆς πυρῆς, ἠγγεμισθῆσθαι αὐτοῖς ἀπὸ ἀπυρίας, because of the hardness once gotten by fire; whereas the other are of clay unbroken; if they be spoiled, ῥαδίως προς τὸ δυνάτον ἐλατῆθαι σχημα, they may easily, by the skill of the potter, be restored to some second form. See Hammond. This comports excellently with the idea of St. Paul: our bodies are in a recoverable form; they are very frail, and easily marred; but by the skill of the workman, they may be easily built up anew, and made like unto his glorious body. The light and salvation of God in the soul of man, is a heavenly treasure in a very mean casket.

The rabbins have a mode of speech very similar to this. "The daughter of the emperor thus addressed Rab. Joshua, the son of Chananiah:—Oh! how great is thy skill in the law, and yet how deformed thou art! what a great deal of wisdom is laid up in a sordid vessel! The rabbin answered, Tell me, I pray thee, of what are those vessels in which you keep your wines? She answered,—they are earthen vessels. He replied,—how is it, seeing ye are rich, that ye do not lay up your wine in silver vessels, for the common people lay up their wine in earthen vessels? She returned to her father, and persuaded him to have all the wine put into silver vessels; but the wine turned acid; and when the emperor heard it, he inquired of his daughter, who it was that had given her that advice? she told him that it was Rabbi Joshua. The rabbi told the whole story to the emperor, and added this sentence:—The wisdom and study of the law cannot dwell in a comely man. Cæsar objected, and said—There are comely persons who have made great progress in the study of the law. The rabbi answered—Had they not been so comely, they would have made greater progress: for a man who is comely, has not a humble mind; and therefore he soon forgets the whole law." See Schoelgen. There is a great deal of good sense in this allegory; and the most superficial reader may find it out.

we have received: and we receive every necessary supply, just when it is necessary; and have nothing at our own command. The good, therefore, that is done, is so evidently from the power of God, that none can pretend to share the glory with him.

Verse 8. We are troubled on every side] We have already seen in the notes on the ninth chapter of the preceding epistle, that St. Paul has made several allusions to those public games which were celebrated every fifth year at the Isthmus of Corinth: and those games have been in that place, particularly described. In this, and the three following verses, the apostle makes allusion to the contests at those games; and the terms which he employs in these verses cannot be understood, but in reference to those agonistical exercises to which he alludes. Dr. Hammond has explained the whole on this ground; and I shall here borrow his help. There are four pairs of expressions taken from the customs of the agones. 1. Troubled on every side, yet not distressed. 2. Perplexed, but not in despair. 3. Persecuted, but not forsaken. 4. Cast down, but not destroyed. Three of these pairs belong to the customs of wrestling; the fourth, to that of running in the race.

Troubled on every side, &c.] Εἰ παντὶ θλιβόμενοι—The word θλιβόμενος, belongs clearly to πάλη, wrestling. So says Aristotle, Rhet. lib. i. cap. 5. (and the scholiast on that place) οὐ γὰρ δύναμις—θλιβῶν, κατὰ τὴν πάλην. "He that can gripe his adversary, and take him up, is a good wrestler;" there being two dexterities in that exercise; 1. To gripe, and, 2. To throw down, which Hesy chius calls ἄνω, and ἔρπαιον—the first of these is here mentioned, and expressed by θλιβόμενος, to be pressed down; to which is here opposed, as in a higher degree, ἐνοχλησθεῖς, to be brought to distress, as when one cannot get out of his antagonist's hands, nor make any resistance against him. So Isai. xxviii. 20. σπῶχεσθε ὑμεῖς ὡς δυνάμεις μαχόμενοι, we are brought to such extremities that we can fight no longer.

Perplexed, but not in despair] Ἀπεριουμένοι, ἀλλ' οὐκ ἐξαπορούμενοι. The word ἀπεριουθῆναι, to be in perplexity, is fit for the wrestler, who being puzzled by his antagonist's skill, knows not what to do: so in Hesy chius, ἀπεριουθῆναι, ἀμυχανουθῆναι, they that are not able to do or attempt any thing, yet are not ἐξαπορούμενοι, they miscarry not finally, ὀρθοὶ ἱστῆσαντες, stand after all upright; οὐκ ἀπορῶσκοντες καὶ πτωμένοι, despair not, nor are they overcome, but find a happy issue out of all, being at last conquerors.

Verse 9. Persecuted, but not forsaken] Διωκόμενοι ἀλλ' οὐκ ἐρηκταλιπτόμενοι. The διωκόμενοι, pursued, is peculiar to the δρόμος, or race, when one being foremost, others pursue, and get up close after him, endeavouring to outstrip him, but cannot succeed: this is the meaning of ἐρηκταλιπτόμενοι, not out-stripped, or out-gone, as the word implies. So in PLUTARCH, τὰς ἀπολυθεῖντας οὐ σφαιραῖσι, they do not crown them that are distanced, or left behind. So says the apostle, 1 Cor. ix. all run, but only ONE receiveth the PRIZE.

Cast down, but not destroyed] Καταβαλλόμενοι ἀλλ' οὐκ ἀπολλύμενοι. This also belongs to wrestling, where he that throws the other first, is conqueror. And so Hesy chius, καταβαλὼν, νικῶν, ρίψας, to cast down is to overcome, to throw.—And then, the being not destroyed, signifies, that although they were thrown down, cast into troubles and difficulties, yet they rose again, and surmounted them all.

Verse 10. Always bearing about in the body, &c.] Being every moment in danger of losing our lives in the cause of truth, as Jesus Christ was. We, in a word, bear his cross, and are ready to offer up our lives for him. There is probably an allusion here to the marks, wounds, and bruises, which the contenders in those games got, and continued to carry throughout life.

That the life also of Jesus might be made manifest] That in our preservation, the success of our ministry, and the miracles we work, we might be able to give the fullest demonstration, that Jesus is risen again from the dead; and that we are strengthened by him to do all these mighty works.

Verse 11. For we which live] And yet, although we are preserved alive, we are in such continual dangers, that we carry our life in our hands, and are constantly in the spirit of sacrifice. But the life, the preserving power of Christ, is manifest in our continual support.

Verse 12. Death worketh in us, &c.] We apostles are in continual danger, and live a dying life; while you who have received this Gospel from us, are in no danger.

Verse 13. We having the same spirit of faith] As David had when he wrote Psal. cxvi. 10. I believe, therefore have I spoken; we also believe that we shall receive the fulfilment of all God's promises; and being fully convinced of the truth of the Christian religion, we speak, and testify, that our deliverance is from God; that he does not fail those who trust in him; and that he saves to the uttermost, them who come unto him through Christ Jesus.

Verse 14. Knowing, that he which raised up the Lord, &c.] And though we shall at last, seal this truth with our blood; we fear not, being persuaded that as the body of Christ was raised from the dead by the power of the Father, so shall our bodies be raised: and that we shall have an eternal life with him in glory.

Verse 15. For, all things are for your sakes] We proclaim all these truths, and bear all these sufferings for your sakes; thinking all our sufferings nothing if we can gain converts to Christ, and build believers up on their most holy faith.

That the abundant grace] Η χαρις πλεονασσα; the abundant benefit; the copious outpouring of the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit by which you have been favoured and enriched; may, through the thanksgiving of many, redound to the glory of God: i. e. that gratitude of the multitudes which have been converted, may keep pace with the blessings which they have received, and πλεονασσει, abound, as these blessings have abounded.

Verse 16. For which cause we faint not] Ουκ αμαρτανωμεσθα. See on verse 1. Here we have the same various reading σωματων, we do no wickedness; and it is supported by BDEFG. and some others; but it is remarkable that Mr. Wakefield follows the common reading here, though the various reading is at least as well supported in this verse as in verse first. The common reading, faint not, appears to agree best with the apostle's meaning.

But though our outward man] That is, our body: that part of us that can be seen, heard, and felt—perish, be slowly consumed by continual trials and afflictions; and be martyred at last:

Yet the inward man] Our soul; that which cannot be felt or seen by others; is renewed, is revived, and receives a daily increase of light and life from God: so that we grow more holy, more happy, and more meet for glory every day.

It was an opinion among the Jews, that even spirits stood in need of continual renovation. They say that "God renews the angels daily, by putting them into the fiery river from which they proceeded, and then gives them the same name they had before." And they add, that in like manner, he renews the hearts of the Israelites every year, when they turn to him by repentance. It is a good antidote against the fear of death, to find, as the body grows old and decays, the soul grows young, and is invigorated. By the outward man, and the inward man, St. Paul shows that he was no materialist; he believed that we have both a body and a soul; and so far was he from supposing that when the body dies, the whole man is decomposed, and continues so to the resurrection; that he asserts that the decays of the one, lead to the invigorating of the other; and that the very decomposition of the body itself leaves the soul in the state of renewed youth. The vile doctrine of materialism, is not apostolic.

Verse 17. For our light affliction, &c.] Mr. Blackwall, in his sacred classics, has well illustrated this passage. I shall here produce his paraphrase as quoted by Dr. Dodd:—"This is one of the most emphatic passages in all St. Paul's writings, in which he speaks as much like an orator, as he does as an apostle. The lightness of the trial is expressed by το ελαφρον τας θλιψεις, the lightness of our affliction; as if he had said, it is even levity itself in such a comparison. On the other hand, the καθ' υπερβολην, which we render far more exceeding, is infinitely emphatical, and cannot be fully expressed by any translation. It signifies that all hyperboles fall short of describing that weight of eternal glory, so solid and lasting, that you may pass from hyperbole to hyperbole, and yet when you have gained the last, are infinitely below it. It is every where visible what influence St. Paul's Hebrew had on his Greek: כבד cabad, signifies to be heavy, and to be glorious: the apostle in his Greek, unites these two significations, and says WEIGHT OF GLORY.

St. Chrysostom's observations on these words are in his very best manner; and are both judicious and beautiful: ΤΙΘΗΣΙ παραλλαλα τα παρορτα τοις μελλουσι το παρ αυτις προς το αειβιον το ελαφρον προς το βαρυ του θλιψιν προς την δεραν και ουδεν τουτοις αραιται, αλλ' υπεραν τιθεις λαβην, διαπλασιζει αυτην, και λεγει, καθ' υπερβολην εις υπερβολην τουτοις, μεγαλοσ υπερβολικος υπερβολικον.

"The apostle opposes things present, to things future: a moment, to eternity: lightness, to weight: affliction, to glory. Nor is he satisfied with this; but he adds another word, and doubles it, saying, καθ' υπερβολην, καθ' υπερβολην: this is a magnitude excessively exceeding." See Parkhurst, sub voce υπερβολη.

Verse 18. While we look not at the things which are seen] Mn exoourotos; while we aim not at the things which are seen; do not make them our object; are not striving to obtain them, for they are not worthy the pursuit of an immortal spirit, because they are seen: they are objects to which the natural eye can reach; and they are prohaimena, temporary; they are to have a short duration; and must have an end. But the things which we make our scope and aim, are not seen; they are spiritual, and therefore invisible to the eye of the body; and besides, they are a ienai, eternal, things that are permanent; that can have no end: they are things which belong to God; holiness, happiness, and the endless communication and fruition of himself.

But we must remark, that the light afflictions work out this far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, only to those who do not look at the things which are seen. A man may be grievously afflicted, and yet have his eye bent on temporal good; from his afflictions he can derive no benefit; though many think that their glorification must be a necessary consequence of their afflictions; and hence we do not unfre-quently hear among the afflicted poor—"Well, we shall not suffer both here and in the other world too." Afflictions may be means of preparing us for glory, if during them, we receive grace to save the soul: but afflictions of themselves, have no spiritual nor saving tendency: on the contrary, they sour the unregenerated mind, and cause murmurings against the dispensations of Divine Providence. Let us therefore, look to God, that they may be sanctified; and when they are, then we may say exultingly, these light afflictions, which are but for a moment, work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. O world to come, in exchange for the present! O eternity, for a moment! O eternal communion in the holy blessed and eternal life of God, for the sacrifice of a poor, miserable, and corrupted life here on earth!—Whoever sets no value on this seed of a blessed eternity, knows not what it comprehends. That which the eyes of the flesh are capable of perceiving, is not worthy of a soul capable of possessing God. Nothing which is of a perishable nature can be the chief good of a being that was made for eternity! Quærel

CHAPTER V.

The apostle's strong hope of eternal glory, and earnest longings after that state of blessedness, 1—4. The assurance that he had of it from the Holy Spirit, and his carefulness to be always found pleasing to the Lord, 5—9. All must appear before the judgment seat of Christ, 10. Knowing that this awful event must take place, he laboured to convince men of the necessity of being prepared to meet the Lord, being influenced to this work by his love of Christ, 11—13. Jesus Christ having died for all, is a proof that all were dead, 14. Those for whom he died, should live to him, 15. We should know no man after the flesh, 16. NOTES ON CHAP. V.

Verse 1. If our earthly house of this tabernacle] By earthly house, the apostle most evidently means the body in which the soul is represented as dwelling or sojourning for a time; and from which it is to be liberated at death: for, as death dissolves the tabernacle, it can then be no habitation for the soul. The apostle also alludes here to the ancient Jewish tabernacle, which, on all removals of the congregation, was dissolved, and taken in pieces; and the ark of the covenant, covered with its own curtains, was carried by itself; and when they came to the place of rest, then the dissolved parts of the tabernacle were put together as before. When we consider this simile, in connexion with the doctrine of the resurrection, which the apostle has treated of so much at large in these epistles; and which he keeps constantly in view; then we shall see that he intends to convey the following meaning: that, as the tabernacle was taken down in order to be again put together, so the body is to be dissolved, in order to be re-edified: that, as the ark of the covenant subsisted by itself, while the tabernacle was down, so can the soul, when separated from the body. That, as the ark had then its own veil for its covering, Exod. xl. 21. so the soul is to have some vehicle in which it shall subsist, till it receives its body at the resurrection.

 A. D. 57. which is from heaven :

A building of God] Some think this refers to a certain celestial vehicle with which God invests holy souls on their dismissal from the body : others suppose it relates to the resurrection body : and some imagine that it relates merely to the state of blessedness which the saints shall possess in the kingdom of glory. See the following note.

Verse 2. For in this we groan] While in this state, and in this body, we are encompassed with many infirmities, and exposed to many trials, so that life is a state of discipline and affliction ; and every thing within and around us says, "Arise and depart, for this is not your rest!" Those who apply these words to what they call the apostle's sense of in dwelling sin, abuse the passage. There is nothing of the kind either mentioned or intended.

Desiring to be clothed upon with our house] This, and the following verses are, in themselves, exceedingly obscure, and can be only interpreted by considering that the expressions used by the apostle are all Jewish, and should be interpreted according to their use of them. Schoetgen has entered largely into the argument here employed by the apostle, and brought forth much useful information.

He observes first, that the Hebrew word לבוש labash, which answers to the apostle's εὐδωσάμενοι, to be clothed, signifies to be surrounded, covered, or invested with any thing. So, to be clothed with the uncircumcision, signifies to be uncircumcised. Yalcut Rubeni, fol. 163.

On the words Exod. xxiv. 18. Moses went into the midst of the cloud, and gat him up into the mount, Sohar, Exod. fol. 77. has these words, He went into the midst of the cloud, as if one put on a garment : so he was CLOTHED with the cloud. Sohar Levit. fol. 29. "The righteous are in the terrestrial Paradise, where their souls are clothed with the lucid crown;" i. e. they are surrounded, encompassed, with light, &c.

2. The word בית beith, HOUSE, in Hebrew, often denotes a cover, case, or clothing. So in the Targum, of Onkelos, בית הוא אפי, the house of the face, is a VEIL; and בית אצבעים beith atsabim, the HOUSE of the FINGERS; and בית יד beith yad, the HOUSE of the HAND; signify gloves; בית רגלים beith regalim, the HOUSE of the FEET; shoes. Therefore, εὐδωσάμενοι, to be clothed on with a house, may signify any particular qualities of the soul; what we, following the very same form of speech, call a habit; i. e. a coat or vestment. So we say the man has got a habit of vice, a habit of virtue, a habit of swearing, of humility, &c. &c.

3. The Jews attribute garments to the soul, both in this and the other world : and as they do groan, being burdened : not for that we would be unclothed, but ^b clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life.

5 Now ^c he that hath wrought us for

hold that all human souls pre-exist, they say that previously to their being appointed to bodies, they have a covering which answers the same end to them, before they come into life, as their bodies do afterward. And they state, that the design of God, in sending souls into the world is, that they may get themselves a garment by the study of the law, and good works. See several proofs in Schoetgen.

4. It is plain also, that, by this garment or covering of the soul, they mean simply what we understand by acquiring the image of God; being made holy. This image they assert "Adam lost by his fall, and they represent man in a sinful state, as being naked." So they represent the Israelites before their making the molten calf, as having received holy garments from Mount Sinai : but afterward having worshipped the calf, they were stripped of these and left naked.

5. But notwithstanding they speak of this clothing as implying righteous and holy dispositions, and heavenly qualities; yet they all agree in assigning certain vehicles to separate spirits, in which they act; but of these vehicles, they have strange notions; yet they acknowledge that without them, whether they be of light, fire, &c. or whatever else, they cannot see and contemplate the Supreme Wisdom. In Synopsis Sohar, pag. 137. we have these words—"When the time draws near in which man is to depart from this world, the angel of death takes off his mortal garment, and clothes him with one from Paradise, in which he may see and contemplate the Supreme Wisdom : and therefore the angel of death is said to be very kind to man, because he takes off from him the garment of this world, and clothes him with a much more precious one prepared in Paradise."

When the apostle says that they earnestly desired to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven, he certainly means, that the great concern of all the genuine followers of God, was to be fully prepared to enjoy the beatific vision of their Maker and Redeemer.

Verse 3. If so be, that being clothed] That is, fully prepared in this life for the glory of God.

We shall not be found naked.] Destitute in that future state, of that Divine Image, which shall render us capable of enjoying an endless glory.

Verse 4. For we that are in this tabernacle] We who are in this state of trial and difficulty, do groan being burdened; as if he had said, the whole of human life is a state of suffering; and especially our lot, who are troubled on every side; perplexed, persecuted, cast down; bearing about in the body the dying of our Lord Jesus; and being always delivered unto death on the account of Jesus, chap. iv. 8.—11. These were sufficient burdens, and sufficient causes of groaning.

Not for that we would be unclothed] We do not desire death, nor to die, (even with the full prospect of eternal glory before our eyes,) an hour before that time which God in his wisdom has assigned :

But clothed upon] To have the fullest preparation for eternal glory. We wish not to die, whatever tribulation we may be called to pass through, till the whole will of God is accomplished in us and by us.

That mortality might be swallowed up of life.] Being fully prepared for the eternal state, we shall scarcely be said to die; all that is mortal being absorbed and annihilated by immortality and glory. See the notes on 1 Cor. xv. 51—56. From the use of these expressions among the Jews, this seems to be the general meaning of the apostle.

Verse 5. Now he that hath wrought us for the selfsame thing] God has given us our being and our body for this very purpose; that both might be made immortal, and both be glorified together. Or, God himself has given us this insatiable hungering and thirsting after righteousness and immortality. Mr. Addison has made a beautiful paraphrase of the sense of the apostle, whether he had his words in view or not :

—“ Whence this pleasing hope, this fond desire,

This longing after immortality?
Or, whence this secret dread and inward horror,
Of falling into nought? Why shrinks the soul
Back on herself, and startles at destruction?
'Tis the Divinity that stirs within us :

'Tis heaven itself that points out an hereafter,
And intimates Eternity to man.—

The soul secured in her existence, smiles
At the drawn dagger, and defies its point.
The stars shall fade away, the sun himself
Grow dim with age, and Nature sink in years;
But thou shalt flourish in immortal youth,
Unhurt, amidst the war of elements,
The wreck of matter, and the crush of worlds.”

The earnest of the Spirit.] See the note on chap. i. 22.

Verse 6. We are always confident] Θειστης εν παντι, we are always full of courage; we never despond: we know where our help lies; and, having the earnest of the Spirit, we have the full assurance of hope.

Whilst we are at home in the body, &c.] The original words in this sentence are very emphatic; ενδημιον, signifies to dwell among one's own people; παρεμιον, to be a sojourner among a strange people. Heaven is the home of every genuine Christian, and is claimed by them as such: see Phil. i. 23. Yet, while here below, the body is the proper home of the soul; but, as the soul is made for eternal glory, that glory is its country: and, therefore, it is considered as being from its proper home while below in the body. As all human souls are made for this glory, therefore all are considered, while here, to be absent from their own country. And it is not heaven merely that they have in view, but the Lord; without whom, to an immortal spirit, possessed of infinite desires, heaven would neither be a home nor a place of rest. We see plainly that the apostle gives no intimation of an intermediate state between being at home in the body, and being present with the Lord. There is not the slightest intimation here that the soul sleeps: or, rather, that there is no soul; and when the body is decomposed, that there is no more of the man till the resurrection. I mean according to the sentiments of those who do condescend to allow us a resurrection, though they deny us a soul. But this is a philosophy in which St. Paul got no lessons, either from Gamaliel, Jesus Christ, the Holy Ghost, or in the third heavens, where he heard even unutterable things.

Verse 7. For we walk by faith] While we are in the present state, faith supplies the place of direct vision. In the future world we shall have sight, the utmost evidence of spiritual and eternal things; as we shall be present with them, and live in them. Here, we have the testimony of God, and believe in their reality, because we cannot doubt his word. And, to make this more convincing, he gives us the earnest of his Spirit: which is a foretaste of glory.

Verse 8. We are confident] We are of good courage, notwithstanding our many difficulties; because we have this earnest of the Spirit, and the unfailing testimony of God. And, notwithstanding this, we are willing, rather to be absent from the body; we certainly prefer a state of glory to a state of suffering; and the enjoyment of the beatific vision, to even the anticipation of it, by faith and hope: but as Christians, we cannot desire to die before our time.

Verse 9. Wherefore we labour] φιλοτιμουμεθα, from φιλος, loving, and τιμη, honour: we act at all times on the principles of honour; we are, in the proper sense of the word, ambitious to do and say every thing consistently with our high vocation: and, as we claim kindred to the inhabitants of heaven, to act as they do.

We may be accepted of him.] Ευαγγελισθησθε, to be pleasing to him. Through the love we have to God, we study and labour to please him. This is, and will be our heaven, to study to love, please, and serve him from whom we have received both our being and its blessing.

10 ^a For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; ^b that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.

11 Knowing therefore ^c the terror of the Lord, we persuade men; but ^d we are made manifest unto God; and I trust also are made manifest in your consciences.

Verse 10. For we must all appear before the judgment seat] We labour to walk so as to please Him, because we know that we shall give a solemn account of ourselves before the judgment seat of Christ; where He, whose religion we profess, will judge us according to its precepts: and according to the light and grace which it affords.

That every one may receive the things] Κομισται μαρτι, that each may receive to himself, into his own hand, his own reward and his own wages.

The things done in his body] That is, while he was in this lower state; for in this sense the term body is taken, often in this epistle. We may observe also, that the soul is the grand agent: the body is but its instrument. And it shall receive, according to what it has done in the body.

Verse 11. Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord] This, I think, is too harsh a translation of αδρανη τον τον φοβου του Κυριου, which should be rendered, knowing therefore the fear of the Lord; which, strange as it may at first appear, often signifies the worship of the Lord, or that religious reverence which we owe to him. Acts ix. 31. Rom. iii. 18. xiii. 7. 1 Pet. i. 17. ii. 18. iii. 2. As we know therefore what God requires of man, because we are favoured with his own revelation; we persuade men to become Christians, and to labour to be acceptable to him; because they must all stand before the judgment seat; and if they receive not the grace of the Gospel here, they must there give up their accounts with sorrow, and not with joy. In short, a man who is not saved from his sin in this life, will be separated from God and the glory of his power in the world to come. This is a powerful motive to persuade men to accept the salvation provided for them by Christ Jesus. The fear of God is the beginning of wisdom; the terror of God confounds and overpowers the soul. We lead men to God through his fear and love; and with the fear of God, the love of God is ever consistent: but where the terror of the Lord reigns, there can neither be fear, faith, nor love; nay, nor hope either. Men who vindicate their constant declamations on hell and perdition, by quoting this text, know little of its meaning; and, what is worse, seem to know but little of the nature of man, and perhaps less of the spirit of the Gospel of Christ. Let them go and learn a lesson from Christ weeping over Jerusalem.—“O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how oft would I have gathered you together, as a hen would her brood under her wings?” And another, from his last words on the cross, “Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!”

But we are made manifest unto God] God who searches the heart, knows that we are upright in our endeavours to please him; and because we are fully persuaded of the reality of eternal things: therefore, we are fully in earnest to get sinners converted to him.

Manifest in your consciences] We have reason to believe, that you have had such proof of our integrity and disinterestedness, that your consciences must acquit us of every unworthy motive, and of every sinister view.

Verse 12. For we commend not ourselves] I do not say these things to bespeak your good opinion, to procure your praise; but to give you an occasion to glory; to exult on our behalf; and to furnish you with an answer to all those who either malign us or our ministry; and who only glory in appearance, have no solid ground of exultation; and whose heart is dishonest and impure; St. Paul probably speaks here concerning the false apostle, who had been dividing the church, and endeavoured to raise a party to himself, by vilifying both the apostle and his doctrine.

Verse 13. Beside ourselves] Probably he was reputed by some to be deranged; Festus thought so; Paul, thou art beside thyself; too much learning hath made thee mad. And his enemies at Corinth might insinuate not only that he was deranged, but attribute his derangement to a less worthy cause than intense study and deep learning.

It is to God] If we do appear, in speaking of the glories of the eternal world, to be transported beyond ourselves, it is through the good hand of our God upon us; and we do it to promote his honour.

Whether we be sober] Speak of divine things in a more cool and dispassionate manner; it is, that we may the better instruct and encourage you.

hearts; and this causes us to love God intensely; and to love and labour for the salvation of men. And it is the effects produced by this love, which συνχυσίμας, bears us away with itself; which causes us to love after the similitude of that love by which we are influenced; and, as God so loved the world as to give his Son for it; and as Christ so loved the world as to pour out his life for it; so we, influenced by the very same love, desire to spend, and be spent, for the glory of God, and the salvation of immortal souls.

[If one died for all, then were all dead] The first position the apostle takes for granted: viz. that Jesus Christ died for ALL mankind. This, no apostolic man, or primitive Christian, ever did doubt, or could doubt.

The second position he infers from the first, and justly too; for if all had not been guilty, and consigned to eternal death, because of their sin, there could have been no need of his death. Therefore, as he most certainly died for ALL; then, all were dead, and needed his sacrifice, and the quickening power of his Spirit.

Verse 15. And that he died for all, that they which live, &c.] This third position he draws from the preceding: If all were dead, and in danger of endless perdition, and he died for all, to save them from that perdition; then it justly follows, that they are not their own, that they are bought by his blood; and should not live unto themselves; for this is the way to final ruin: but unto him who died for them, and thus made an atonement for their sins: and rose again for their justification.

Verse 16. Know we no man after the flesh] As we know that all have sinned and come short of the glory of God; and as we know that all are alienated from God, and are dead in trespasses and sin, therefore we esteem no man on account of his family relations; or the stock whence he proceeded; because we see all are shut up in unbelief, and all are children of wrath.

Yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh] We cannot esteem a man who is a sinner, were he even allied to the blood royal of David; and were of the same family with the man Christ himself; nor can we prize a man because he has seen Christ in the flesh, for many have seen him in the flesh to whom he will say, Depart from me, for I never knew you: so we—nothing weighs with us; nor in the sight of God, but redemption from this death, and living to him who died for them.

We know that the Jews valued themselves much in having Abraham for their father; and some of the Judaizing teachers at Corinth might value themselves in having seen Christ in the flesh, which certainly St. Paul did not: hence he takes occasion to say here, that this kind of privilege availed nothing; for the old creature, however noble, or well descended in the sight of men, is under the curse: and the new creature only is such as God can approve.

Verse 17. If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature] It is vain for a man to profess affinity to Christ, according to the flesh, while he is unchanged in his heart and life; and dead in trespasses and sins: for he that is in Christ, that is, a genuine Christian, having Christ dwelling in his heart by faith, is a new creature; his old state is changed; he was a child of Satan; he is now a child of God. He was a slave of sin, and his works were death: he is now made free from sin, and has his fruit unto holiness; and the end, everlasting life. He was before full of pride and wrath; he is now meek and humble. He formerly had his portion in this life, and lived for this world alone: he now has God for his portion; and he looks not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are eternal. Therefore, old things are passed away.

Behold, all things are become new] The man is not only mended, but he is new made; he is a new creature; καινὴ κτίσις, a new creation, a little world in himself: formerly, all was in chaotic disorder; now, there is a new creation, which God himself owns as his workmanship; and which he can look on and pronounce very good. The conversion of a man from idolatry and wickedness, was among the Jews denominated a new creation. He who converts a man to the true religion, is the same, says R. Eliezer, as if he had created him.

Verse 18. And all things are of God] As the thorough conversion of the soul is compared to a new creation; and creation is the proper work of an all-wise Almighty Being; then, this total change of heart, soul, and life, which takes place under the preaching of the Gospel, is effected by the power and grace of God: this is salvation; and salvation must ever be of the Lord; and therefore men should apply to Him, who alone can work this wondrous change.

Who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ] Having given Jesus Christ to die for sinners, they have through him access unto God: for his sake and on his account, God can receive them: and it is only by the grace and Spirit of Christ, that the proud, fierce, and diabolic nature of man, can be changed and reconciled to God; and by and through this sacrifice, God can be propitious to them. There is an enmity in the heart of man against sacred things! the grace of Christ alone can remove this enmity.

The ministry of reconciliation] Διακονια της καταλλαγης; The office or function of this reconciliation; called, ver. 19. the word: του λογου της καταλλαγης; the doctrine of this reconciliation. Καταλλαγη, reconciliation, comes from καταλλασσω, to change thoroughly: and the grand object of the Gospel is to make a complete change in men's minds and manners; but the first object is the removal of enmity from the heart of man, that he may be disposed to accept of the salvation God has provided for him, on the terms which God has promised. The enmity in the heart of man is the grand hindrance to his salvation.

Verse 19. That God was in Christ] This is the doctrine which this ministry of reconciliation holds out; and the doctrine which it uses to bring about the reconciliation itself.

God was in Christ—1. Christ is the same as Messiah, the anointed One; who was to be prophet, priest, and king to the human race; not to the Jews only, but also to the Gentiles. There had been prophets, priests, and kings, among the Jews and their ancestors; and some who had been priest and prophet; king and priest; and king and prophet: but none had ever sustained, in his own person, the three-fold office, but Christ; for none had ever ministered in reference to the whole world but Himself. The functions of all the others were restrained to the ancient people of God alone. 2. Now all the others were appointed of God, in reference to this Christ; and as his types, or representatives, till the fullness of the time should come: 3. And that this Christ might be adequate to the great work of reconciling the whole human race to God, by making atonement for their sins, God was in him. The man Jesus was the temple and shrine of the eternal Divinity; for in him dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, Col. ii. 9. and he made peace by the blood of his cross. 4. Christ, by his offering upon the cross, made atonement for the sins of the world: and therefore one important branch of the doctrine of this reconciliation was, to show that God would not impute or account their trespasses to them, so as to exact the penalty; because this Jesus had died in their stead.

The whole of this important doctrine was short, simple, and plain. Let us consider it in all its connexions: 1. You believe there is a God. 2. You know he has made you. 3. He requires you to love and serve him. 4. To show you how to do this, He has given a revelation of himself, which is contained in his law, &c. 5. You have broken this law, and incurred the penalty, which is death. 6. Far from being able to undo your offences, or make reparation to the offended majesty of God, your hearts, through the deceitfulness and influence of sin, are blinded, hardened, and filled with enmity against your Father and your Judge. 7. To redeem you out of this most wretched and accursed state, God, in his endless love, has given his Son for you; who has assumed your nature, and died in your stead. 8. In consequence of this, he has commanded repentance towards God; and remission of sins to be published in his name in all the earth. 9. All who repent and believe in Christ as having died for them as a sin-offering, ver. 21. shall receive remission of sins. 10. And if they abide in Him, they shall have an eternal inheritance among them that are sanctified.

Verse 20. We are ambassadors for Christ] Ἔστε Χριστων—πρεσβυτεροι; we execute the function of ambassadors in Christ's stead. He came from the Father to mankind on this important embassy. He has left the world, and appointed us in his place.

Ambassador is a person sent from one sovereign power to another: and is supposed to represent the person of the sovereign by whom he is deputed. Christ, while on earth, represented the person of the Sovereign of the world: his apostles, and their successors, represent the person of Christ. Christ declared the will of the Father to mankind: apostles, &c. declare the will of Christ to the world; we are ambassadors for Christ.

As though God did beseech you by us] What we say to you, we say on the authority of God; our entreaties are his entreaties; our warm love to you, a faint reflection of his infinite love; we pray you to return to God; it is his will that you should do so; we promise you remission of sins; we are authorized to do so by God himself. In Christ's stead we pray you to lay aside your enmity, and be reconciled to God; i. e. accept pardon, peace, holiness, and heaven, which are all procured for you by his blood; and offered to you on his own authority.

What unparalleled condescension, and divinely tender mercies, are displayed in this verse? Did the judge ever beseech a condemned criminal to accept of pardon? Does the creditor ever beseech a ruined debtor to receive an acquittance in full? Yet our almighty Lord, and our eternal Judge, not only vouchsafes to offer these blessings, but invites us, entreats us, and with the most tender importunity, solicits us not to reject them." The Rev. J. Wesley's Notes in loc.

This sentiment is further expressed in the following beautiful poetic version of this place, by the Rev. Charles Wesley.

Verse 21. For he hath made him to be sin for us Τοῦ μὲν ἑαυτὸν ἁμαρτίαν, ὡς ἡμῶν ἁμαρτίαν ἐκμετρώσας, He made him who knew no sin, (who was innocent,) a sin-offering for us. The word ἁμαρτία occurs here twice; in the first place, it means sin; i. e. transgression and guilt: and of Christ it is said, he knew no sin; i. e. was innocent: for not to know sin, is the same as to be conscious of innocence; so, nil conscire sibi, to be conscious of nothing against one's self; is the same as, nullâ pâllescere culpâ, to be unimpeachable.

In the second place, it signifies a sin-offering, or sacrifice for sin, and answers to the זבח חטאת and זבח חטאת of the Hebrew text; which signifies both sin and sin-offering, in a great variety of places in the Pentateuch. The Septuagint translate the Hebrew word by ἁμαρτία in ninety-four places in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, where a sin-offering is meant; and where our version translates the word not sin, but an offering for sin. Had our translators attended to their own method of translating the word in other places, where it means the same as here, they would not have given this false view of a passage which has been made the foundation of a most blasphemous doctrine; viz. that our sins were imputed to Christ, and that he was a proper object of the indignation of Divine justice, because he was blackened with imputed sin: and some have proceeded so far in this blasphemous career, as to say, that Christ may be considered as the greatest of sinners, because all the sins of mankind, or of the elect, as they say, were imputed to him, and reckoned as his own. One of these writers translates the passage thus, Deus Christum pro maximo peccatore habuit, ut nos essemus maxime justî, God accounted Christ the greatest of sinners, that we might be supremely righteous. Thus they have confounded sin with the punishment due to sin: Christ suffered in our stead; died for us; bore our sins, (the punishment due to them), in his own body upon the tree, for the Lord laid upon him the iniquities of us all; that is, the punishment due to them; explained by making his soul, his life, an offering for sin; and healing us by his stripes.

But that it may be plainly seen that sin-offering, not sin, is the meaning of the word in this verse, I shall set down the places from the Septuagint, where the word occurs: and where it answers to the Hebrew words already quoted; and where our translators have rendered correctly what they render here incorrectly.

In Exodus, chap. xxix. 14, 36: LEVITICUS, chap. iv. 3, 8, 20, 21, 24, 25, and 29 twice, 32, 33, and 34; chap. v. 6, 7, 8, 9 twice, 11 twice, 12; chap. vi. 17, 25 twice, 30; chap. vii. 7, 37; chap. viii. 2, 14 twice; chap. ix. 2, 3, 7, 8, 10, 15, 22; chap. x. 16, 17, 19 twice; chap. xii. 6, 8; chap. xiv. 13 twice, 19, 22, 31; chap. xv. 15, 30; chap. xvi. 3, 5, 6, 9, 11 twice, 15, 25, 27 twice; chap. xxiii. 19. NUMBERS, chap. vi. 11, 14, 16; chap. vii. 16, 22, 28, 34, 40, 46, 52, 58, 70, 76, 82, 87; chap. viii. 8, 12; chap. xv. 24, 25, 27; chap. xviii. 9; chap. xxviii. 15, 22; chap. xxix. 5, 11, 16, 22, 25, 28, 31, 34, 38.

Besides the above places, it occurs in the same signification, and is properly translated in our version, in the following places:

2 CHRONICLES, chap. xxix. 21, 23, 24; EZRA, chap. vi. 17; chap. viii. 36; NEHEMIAH, chap. x. 33; JOB, chap. i. 5; EZEKIEL, chap. xliii. 19, 22, 25; chap. xlv. 27, 29; chap. xlv. 17, 19, 22, 23, 25. In all, one hundred and eight places, which, in the course of my own reading in the Septuagint, I have marked.

That we might be made the righteousness of God in him.] The righteousness of God signifies here the salvation of God, as comprehending justification through the blood of Christ; and sanctification through his Spirit: or, as the mountains of God, the hail of God, the wind of God; mean exceeding high mountains, extraordinary hail, and most tempestuous wind; so here the righteousness of God may mean a thorough righteousness; complete justification, complete sanctification; such as none but God can give; such as the sinful nature and guilty conscience of man require: and such as is worthy of God to impart. And all this righteousness, justification, and holiness, we receive in, by, for, and through HIM; as the grand, sacrificial, procuring, and meritorious cause of these, and every other blessing.

In many respects, this is a most important and instructive chapter.

1. The terms house, building, tabernacle, and others connected with them, have already been explained from the Jewish writings. But it has been thought by some, that the apostle mentions these as readily offering themselves to him, from his own avocation, that of a tent-maker: and it is supposed that he borrows these terms from his own trade, in order to illustrate his doctrine. This supposition would be natural enough, if we had not full evidence that these terms were used in the Jewish theology, precisely in the sense in which the apostle uses them here. Therefore, it is more likely that he borrowed them from that theology, than from his own trade.

2. In the terms tabernacle, building of God, &c. he may refer also to the tabernacle in the wilderness, which was a building of God, and a house of God: and as God dwelt in that building, so he will dwell in the souls of those who believe in, love, and obey him. And this will be his transitory temple till mortality is swallowed up of life, and we have a glorified body and soul to be his eternal residence.

3. The doctrines of the resurrection of the same body; the witness of the Spirit; the immateriality of the soul; the fall and miserable condition of all mankind; the death of Jesus, as an atonement for the sins of the whole world; the necessity of obedience to the Divine will, and of the total change of the human heart, are all introduced here: and, although only a few words are spoken on each, yet these are so plain and so forcible, as to set those important doctrines in the most clear and striking point of view.

4. The chapter concludes with such a view of the mercy and goodness of God in the ministry of reconciliation, as is nowhere else to be found. He has here set forth the Divine mercy in all its heightenings: and who can take this view of it without having his heart melted down with love and gratitude to God, who has called him to such a state of salvation?

5. It is exceedingly remarkable that, through the whole of this chapter, the apostle speaks of himself in the first person plural: and though he may intend other apostles, and the Christians in general, yet it is very evident that he uses this form when only himself can be meant, as in verses 12 and 13. as well as in several places of the following chapter. This may be esteemed rather more curious than important.

NOTES ON CHAP. VI.

Verse 1. We then, as workers together with him] Συμπουρωτες, δε και παρακαλουμιν. The two last words, with him, are not in the text, and some supply the place thus: we then, as workers together WITH YOU, and the Armenian version seems to have read it so: but no MS. has this reading; and no other version. For my own part, I see nothing wanting in the text if we only suppose the term apostles; we (i. e. apostles), being fellow-workers, also entreat you not to receive the grace of God in vain.

By the grace of God, τω χαρι του Θεου, this grace, or benefit of God, the apostle certainly means the grand sacrificial offering of Christ, for the sin of the world, which he had just before mentioned in speaking of the ministry of reconciliation. We learn, therefore, that it was possible to receive the grace of God, and not ultimately benefit by it; or, in other words, to begin in the Spirit and end in the flesh. Should any one say, that it is the ministry of reconciliation, that is, the benefit of apostolic preaching, that they might receive in vain: I answer, that the apostolic preaching, and the whole ministry of reconciliation, could be no benefit to any man, further than it might have been a means of conveying to him the salvation of God. And it is most evident that the apostle has in view that grace or benefit which reconciles us to God, and makes us divinely righteous. And this, and all other benefits of the death of Christ, may be received in vain.

Verse 2. For he saith] That is, God hath said it, by the prophet Isaiah, chap. xlix 8. which place the apostle quotes verbatim et literatim from the Septuagint. And from this we may at once see, what is the accepted time; and what the day of salvation. The advent of the Messiah was the יומ יראתו et ration, the time of God's pleasure, or benevolence; for which all the faithful were in expectation: and the day of salvation, יומ ישועה yom yeshu'ah, was the time in which this salvation should be manifested and applied. The apostle, therefore, informs them that this is the time predicted by the prophet: and, the ministry of reconciliation being exercised in full force, is a proof that the prophecy is fulfilled: and therefore the apostle confidently asserts, Behold, now is this accepted time; now, the Messiah reigns; now, is the Gospel dispensation; and, therefore, now is the day of salvation: that is, the very time in which the power of God is present to heal; and in which every sinner, believing on the Lord Jesus, may be saved.

I rather think that this second verse should be read immediately after the last verse of the preceding chapter; as, where it now stands, it greatly disturbs the connexion between the first and the third verses. I will set down the whole in the order in which I think they should stand. Chap. v. 20. Now then, we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead to be reconciled to God. For he hath made him a sin-offering for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him: for he saith, "I have heard thee in a time accepted, and in the day of salvation have I succoured thee:" Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation. Immediately after this, the sixth chapter will very properly commence, and we shall see that the connexion will be then undisturbed.
